Mr. PETTIT, in behalf of a minority of the same committee, submitted a report, which was also read a first time and passed to a second reading on to-morrow.

Mr. NAVE, as a member of the committee on the organization of the courts of justice, said he desired to present the following minority report or dissent from the report of the majority, embracing a plan for the organization of the judiciary of the State; and he hoped the Convention would allow it to be entered upon the journal.

The paper was read by the Secretary, and is as follows:

"I dissent from the report of the majority of said committee, just read, in the following particulars, viz: 1st, Said committee propose the appointment of the Clerk to the Supreme Court, when said Clerk should be elected by the qualified electors; 2d, Said committee propose to give to the Supreme Court original jurisdiction, when said Court should only be clothed with appellate jurisdiction; 3d, Said committee also propose to district the State into twenty circuits, thereby increasing the expense greatly of the administration of the law, and setting by the organic law, a subject that properly belongs to the representatives of the people, to be by them fixed from time to time as necessity may demand."

The PRESIDENT. Under a resolution of the Convention, the minority of a committee can only report articles or propositions.

Mr. NILES. I wish to set myself right in regard to one point. I wish to say to the Convention that I was in favor of electing the Clerks by the people, and dissented only in that one particular from the report of the majority.

Mr. NAVE (to the President). Cannot my paper be received in the form of a protest?

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman has no right to protest against the report of a committee. Under the first resolution of the Convention upon this subject, the Chair decided that a minority had only the right to set forth reasons for their dissent from the majority. But under a subsequent resolution of the Convention, the minority is placed upon the same footing with the majority, having only the right to report propositions.

Mr. NAVE. Then I will withdraw the paper.

CORRECTION.

Mr. GORDON rose to a privileged question. He desired a correction to be made in the Journal of the Convention for Thursday, October 31. Pending the question upon the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Franklin (Mr. Shoup) to the first section of the article reported by the committee on State officers other than the Executive and Judiciary, so as to extend the tenure of the office of Secretary of State from two to four years, upon taking the yeas and nays upon this question, he (Mr. G.) voted in the negative; but in the printed copy before him which he supposed was copied from the Journal, his name was not recorded at all.

It was also stated below that that amendment was rejected, whilst the figures above were,—yeas 76, nays 56. He was inclined to think from this that the amendment was adopted; and he desired a correction of the Journal in both particulars.

Upon examination of the Journal by the Secretary, it was found that the printed copy of the yeas and nays had been correctly taken from the Secretary's list; but that the incorrect printed statement below the list was not copied from the Journal of the Convention.

The PRESIDENT. The Journal shows that the amendment was adopted. The Chair would remark that we cannot be responsible for the inaccuracies of the reporters.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

Mr. OWEN, from the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of the State, asked and obtained leave to make the following report under special instructions to the committee to amend their former report, and asked that it be incorporated in the first article of the amended Constitution, to wit:

"There shall be no imprisonment for debt, except in case of fraud."

Mr. OWEN asked if this report could not be now taken up and ordered to be engrossed?

The PRESIDENT said, he supposed the whole Article would have to be taken together upon the question of engrossment.

RIGHTS.

The PRESIDENT announced the consideration of the order of the day, namely: the consideration of the third section of the article submitted by the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of this State, on the 26th of October. It is as follows:

SEC. —. No man's personal services shall be demanded without just compensation. No man's property shall be taken by law, without just compensation first assessed by a jury of freeholders and tendered, together with the expenses of the proceeding, to the owner, by the person to be benefited. But such tender, if rejected, shall not bar the right of appeal.

To this section, Mr. KILGORE had offered the following amendment:

Strike out all after the word "taken," in the second line, and insert "or applied to public use without the consent of his representatives, or without a just compensation being made therefor."

The question being upon the following amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. HOLMAN,

Strike out from the amendment the words "without the consent of his representatives or," and insert the word "first" after the word "being" and before the word "made" in the third line, so that it will read "without a just compensation being first made therefor."

Mr. KILGORE said: Mr. PRESIDENT: The proposed amendment is intended at once to destroy the object I had in view in offering the amendment first submitted. Indeed, the section as reported by the committee, would be less objectionable than it would be if the amendment of the gentleman over the way (Mr. Holman) should be adopted.

The great inconvenience which the public would have to encounter is this, that all incorporated companies would have to tender the value of the damages before the property could be taken. This is one of the objections which I make to the original section. The article, as proposed to be amended by myself, would require a just compensation to be paid before the property could be taken or applied to the public use. But how are we to arrive at a conclusion that will be just and satisfactory, both to the public and to the party claiming damages? Who is to fix the value of the property? The public would certainly not be disposed to pay an exorbitant price for the property, and the individual might ask an exorbitant price. How is the matter to be settled? The amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Holman) requires that a just compensation shall be first paid; that is the company shall first tender a reasonable compensation, which the adverse party would be compelled to accept; so that the first party would be required first to pay the value of the damages before they could proceed. Hence the amendment would be much more exceptionable than the language of the original section.

I have no interest, sir, as a director of the Bellefontaine Railroad. So far as that work is concerned, I am able to state that we are through with our difficulties. We have secured the right of way—in most instances, amicably. But I have in view, not only the interests and rights of other corporate bodies, but the interests of the State, and of the whole country, when I say that we should be careful about what is to be inserted in the Constitution.

Gentleman have spoken of the construction which has been given to the words of this section in the old Constitution, by which its whole force and effect has been taken away! Why, sir, the courts have said which of these opposing interests should give way; they have decided that the public may acquire and possess property for the public good, and that a public work may not be delayed till the value of such property shall be ascertained; for the reason that a great public injury might be the result. Suppose a canal lock had given way, or a railroad bridge was broken down; and it became necessary to take timber for the re-construction of such lock or such bridge; would it be right that everything should stand still till the parties might ascertain what amount of damages should be tendered? Would it be right and proper that everything should be made thrs to stand still until they could come to the true value of the property before the property could either be taken or applied? Would it not be much more reasonable and right, that the public should first take the property, and after ascertaining what amount would be necessary to prepare the bridge or lock, then to pay for it. No man, it seems to me, has a right to ask pay for his property in such a case, till after it shall have been appropriated or applied.

Mr PETTIT (interposing). Will the gentleman allow me to make one suggestion here?

Mr. KILGORE. Certainly.

Mr. PETTIT. It does seem to me that the company, or the State, need not be delayed by the example which the gentleman gives. It would certainly be fair and equal for the State, or the corporation, wanting timber for repairs, to take their money and go at once to the farmer and purchase, just as an individual might do, if his barn were burnt down. He could go to his neighbor and buy the lumber which might be required to rebuild it.

Mr. KILGORE (resuming). The gentleman takes the case of an individual interest, and compares it with the State, or any public interest. But suppose the owner of the property would not be willing to sell at a fair price; and I have often found this to be the case, that, after a public work had been established, and prosecuted far towards completion, the directors have been met by farmers who would ask three prices for the timber necessary to prosecute their work. The farmer, knowing that the company were bound to have his timber, at some price, would be willing to extort upon them. If the State requires the property of the citizen to be applied to public use, I ask if it is right to sustain that citizen in demanding an exorbitant price? Would it not be better to let the Legislature prescribe the manner of assessing his damages, and the time when the same shall be paid—leaving the whole matter open, just as the old Constitution has left it? Surely experience has proved that there can be no danger in doing that.

I repeat now what I intimated on yesterday, that gentlemen seem to desire to keep corporations, particularly, under the most severe restrictions: But so far as corporations are concerned, I have but very little to say in defence of them. This provision, however, would not only affect the interests of corporations, but the interests of the State also. Gentlemen can see how the rule applies detrimentally to the construction of railroads, turnpikes, plank roads, and every work of public improvement in which the State might engage. Under this provision the State will have no right to timber for the construction of bridges, nor to gravel for the public highways. It is to operate as much to the prejudice of the State as to the prejudice of corporations.

I believe in the old maxim, that it is right to take individual property for public good. The public interest should be always considered as above private interest. If private interests were to be respected in all cases of public improvement, it would be hard for any public work to be carried on. And there is no better way to get rid of the difficulty than to allow the Legislature to point out the manner of assessing the damages and the time of payment; so that the State may not stay her hand in taking possession of private property and applying it to public use.

Exceptionable as the present section is, so far as I am concerned, I would not very strenuously object to it, with the modification suggested by the gentleman from Jefferson, in relation to personal services. With the word "freeholder" stricken out, I repeat that I would prefer it to the form which is now proposed to be given to it by the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Holman).

Mr. MORRISON of Marion said, I have before expressed my desire that the section should remain as near as possible in its present shape. I have yet heard no argument which could change this impression. The suggestion of the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) was a full and complete answer to the argument of the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. Kilgore,) with reference to the idea that a bridge company or a canal company should have the right to take private property by a forcible hand, without having first made a just compensation to the owner. For, if a railroad company, or any other corporation, wanted my horse upon the same principle which is supported by the gentleman from Delaware, they might go, by their agent, and demand my horse to make up their team; if I refused because I would not receive what they thought a fair price, they might take him at any rate upon the appraisement of a jury; or if my neighbor wanted another man's horse, and tendered a price which the owner would not choose to accept, upon the same principle of appraisement, he, also, could be compelled to sell his horse to my neighbor, and get another one for himself.

How frequently has it been the case that a farmer who has saved with great care, a spot of valuable timber for the use or the ornament of his premises, has lost every stick of it by the unequal advantage which the law gives to the proprietors of some public enterprise, enabling them to take and possess property upon the valuation of an interested jury. Now, sir, this is not right. Our farmers should be entitled to a jury of free-holders to value the property; and they should be made sure of the payment of a just compensation, before their property may be taken.

The gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Kilgore) desires that the Legislature shall have the power to prescribe the means of assessing the damages, and the time of payment. But I do most strenuously object to that; for the gentleman knows very well that no corporation can be formed without some law being passed for their advantage. But very few corporations are called into existence for the public good; but they are generally formed for the advancement of private interests, and whenever you set them up as guardians of the public interests, you will find that every effort made by them will be to fill their own pockets. This has been my experience in the operations of these companies, and it is also true that these corporations have become so numerous that the Legislature can hardly protect the rights of the citizen against their encroachments.

But why would the gentleman strike out the word "freeholder," for who so well knows what is the value of timber, stone, or land, condemned by corporations, as farmers, or the owners of land, who are similarly situated? and who so likely to protect the interests of farmers from those who are endeavoring continually to clutch many of the most valuable ingredients and products of the soil, and even the soil itself? But if you permit the contractor for the corporation to select a jury from all classes of men, he will be able to get just such a verdict as he may desire. Hence, the necessity for the appeal, and that security be given or pre-payment made. Under this view of the case, Mr. President, I think the Convention would not be acting very circumspectly in this matter by striking out these words.

In all the new State Constitutions, as far as I have observed, the most cautious guards and restrictions have been put in with reference to this very matter, and I think in view of the number of incorporations which we have already, and in view of the prospect for many more companies to be formed for private benefit, that it would be protecting the public interest to restrict their powers; for the highest public advantage is the advantage of the citizens generally. For these reasons I am against giving to incorporated companies any advantages which they do not pay for.

Mr. MURRAY. I have a little practical knowledge upon this subject. It is often the case that a contractor upon a public work has two or three hundred hands employed and under pay, and I would ask if it is reasonable to require such a man to stand still with all this force and not allow him to move one inch till a jury can fix upon the value of the property upon which he must operate? Sir, if this restriction is to prevail, it will be impossible for the State to construct a railroad, or a canal, or any other great work of public improvement. The exorbitant price which will be demanded for right of way, and for timber, would put an end to the progress of public improvements, either by the State or by incorporated companies. It seems to me that in consideration of the great public advantage of these works of improvement, when the interest of the individual conflicts with the public interest, that the individual ought to surrender, in some degree, to the general good. And especially ought this to be required at the present day, when these works are found to conduce so much to the public good. I should be very unwilling, always, to enter upon any private property and take it for the benefit of any public enterprise, nevertheless I know practically that there are numerous cases in which the public good requires that this thing should be done—that the assessment of the value of private property should be made by a jury. I hold that individual advantage should not stand in the way of any great public advantage.

Mr. ALLEN. The difficulty suggested by the gentleman can be easily obviated by the company or corporation securing the right of way before they commence the work.

I think it requisite and proper that incorporated companies should be allowed to take private property without first paying or tendering its assessed value to the owner. I know, from the experience of the people in our part of the State, that some additional restraints of law upon this subject are necessary. The history of our own State works has demonstrated this. There are many individuals known to me who have suffered severely in consequence of these public enterprizes, and have acquiesced in their losses rather than resort to the slow and tedious process of a lawsuit. I know of many cases in the community where I reside where they have entered upon and taken the property of individuals, the value of which was so small, that it would not justify a resort to a legal process for indemnity, so that they might as well have been left wholly without a remedy, and yet their property to a considerable amount in value had been taken, and for which gentlemen contend they had a remedy; but, sir, they would not resort to the remedy given them because they knew the remedy would cost so much as to be utterly worthless; they knew that if they prosecuted these trespassers upon their property, they would resort to any finesse to avoid and to put off payment until they would cause more perplexity about it than the value of the amount of damages would be worth when recovered. Sir, I have known thousands of dollars worth of property taken in this way from individuals with impunity, and when they complained were told that they had a remedy. These, sir, are some of the reasons why I would incorporate into the Constitution the principle establishing the right of the citizen to have his damages assessed and tendered to him, before his property could be taken away from him. I desire to protect the people in future from all such unreasonable and unrighteous aggressions.

Mr. TAGUE said—Mr. PRESIDENT: After so much has been said, I would merely remark that I am willing to accept of the section as it now stands with a very slight amendment. I have been surprised to find so many members here advocating the rights of the State, and the rights and interests of incorporated companies, and forgetting the interests of individuals. For my part I prefer to look as much to the protection of the individual, as to the protection of corporations, especially since it is obvious that an individual cannot ordinarily contend in an action of law upon an equal footing against a wealthy company, with a capital of a hundred thousand dollars. Not one man in ten has obtained justice who has sought after it in this way, at the hand of an incorporated company. Whenever one of these companies get possession of a man's property, it has been the case heretofore, that rather than pay the value of it, they would appeal from court to court until the costs would amount to more than the property in dispute was worth, and at last the suitor would not get enough to pay his lawyer fees. It is in this way that incorporated wealth has the advantage of the individual citizen.

Mr. President, if the Convention will indulge me to say a word (by way of digression) with reference to the order of business—[Cries of "go on" "go on."]

Mr. President, we have been here now almost five weeks, and much discussion has taken place upon various subjects. I think, sir, we have been here already too long; and I am of opinion that if we continue here five or six weeks longer without some change in the order of business, the Convention will be found so much involved in the details of business before them, that we shall feel ourselves to be no nearer the close of our labors than we now are. It is my notion, sir, that a change should take place in our proceedings here; although I am aware that several resolutions have been offered upon this subject and promptly voted down. My reason for advocating a change in the order of business is this: thirty-four years ago the citizens of this State met by their delegates in Convention; and in three week's time they produced the Constitution which we have since lived under—which, I believe, it has been conceded on all hands, is a tolerably good one. Well sir, we have been sent up here to make a few amendments to this Constitution, which was made by the former Convention and handed over to the people in eighteen day's time: and here we have been almost five weeks trying to make the amendments and I do not yet see any place of starting. We have not yet set a single stake. I would like to be able to see some place of beginning—some starting point. But instead of this we are all tangled up amidst propositions and conflicting notions upon various subjects; and the probability is that if we sit here even six or eight weeks longer we shall be no nearer the close of our labors than we are now, unless some change takes place in the order of business. I will therefore ask the indulgence of the Convention, to suspend the consideration of the regular order of business, in order to enable me to offer a resolution relative to this subject.

I am a poor reader, Mr. President, and would like that the resolution should go up and be read at the table. [Cries of "consent."]

The resolution was now read by the Secretary, for information, and it is as follows:

Resolved, That the President of this Convention appoint a committee of nine on each article of the Constitution, whose duty it shall be to consider and report to this Convention, on all such matters as may be referred to them by said Convention; and that the Convention now take up the Constitution and have it read by the Secretary at his desk; and that this Convention then proceed to amend each section as they think proper.

The motion being entertained by the Chair, and the question being taken thereon,

The Convention refused to suspend the rules.

Mr. NAVE. Mr. President, after what has fallen from the gentleman from Hancock, (Mr. Tague,) I cannot forbear to make the reflection how strange it is, that gentlemen will rise in their places here and make speeches against time, abusing the Convention because they have not done anything. The true policy for us to pursue, it seems to me, is, to discuss all questions presented for our consideration with all fairness and calmness, and with all the patience and deliberation which their importance demands.

The section before us embraces two most important questions. The first branch of the subject presented for our consideration, is, that no man's personal services shall be demanded without just compensation. That is, no individual citizen of the State of Indiana shall ever be called upon to render any service whatever, without just compensation. Let us inquire for a moment what effect this provision would have upon the administration of justice. It seems to my mind, that, if we incorporate this provision in our bill of rights, the people will be deprived of one of the most important means for the suppression of vice and immorality. In the old Constitution the words of this section are: "No man's peculiar services," &c. The word "peculiar" is technical in its meaning, and it is the same as to say: No man's services, except for the benefit of society, shall be demanded, &c. Then, where society demands service, the individual, as a good citizen, should surrender his natural right in the case for the benefit of the whole. He should be willing to appear before the tribunals of justice as a witness, or do whatsoever else the public good might demand of him. But this proposition prescribes that no man shall be called upon to subserve the public good in any way without a just remuneration. For example, we suppose an infamous crime has been committed in some neighborhood: according to this provision, an individual called upon to testify before the Grand Jury as a witness in the case, cannot be had unless he is paid for that service. Is it not plain that such a provision would hold out inducements to every loafer about the grog shops to make himself a standing witness in all such cases, for money to buy his grog? And I would ask further, whether such a provision would not greatly increase the expenses of the administration of the law? I believe, sir, it would increase those expenses three fold. It seems to me a most unreasonable and preposterous proposition, imposing a most onerous burden upon the people. It seems to me that it would be laying the foundation for a growing evil, which would become more and more burthensome, until the whole people would cry aloud for a change in the Constitution.

I am opposed to this change, and in favor of the section as it now stands in our bill of rights, which is equivalent to the amendment to this clause proposed by the gentleman from Jefferson.

The second branch of this section is: "No man's property shall be taken by law without just compensation, first assessed by a jury of freeholders, and tendered, together with the expenses of the proceeding, to the owner by the person to be benefited. But such tender, if rejected, shall not bar the right of appeal." If we adopt this branch of the section, Mr. President, it will virtually put a stop to the progress of internal improvements in the State. It will be the same as to say that no public improvements shall hereafter be made in the State of Indiana. It would be a provision directed against the interests of all incorporated companies which may be formed for the purpose of constructing railroads, plank roads, turnpikes, and bridges. I should think, that, under such a provision, a man of any sense would never take stock in any such enterprise until the right of way should be first secured along the whole line through which the road had to pass. The prohibition is, that no set of men shall make a highway over any man's land, without first tendering the amount of damages, to be assessed by a jury of freeholders. Sir, I ask you if the provision of the old Constitution is not far better than this? I ask you, sir, if, in the assessment of such damages, it is not right and proper to take into consideration the additional value which the public improvement will confer upon the property of the land holder? For example, we suppose that a plank road company have constructed a road over some portion of the lands of the gentleman from Posey; and previous to this location we suppose the piece of land to be worth one thousand dollars, and that the construction of this road has enhanced its value to two thousand dollars; I ask if such company should be required to pay damages to that gentleman for doubling the value of his property? Is there any principle of justice upon which he can ask for damages? None whatever. I hold, therefore, that the Supreme Court have settled this principle correctly, and upon the foundation of the eternal principles of justice. The argument, that the damage is commonly so small to each land holder, that it is not worth contending for in an action at law. But this argument falls to the ground; because the law does provide a remedy for every trespass; and whoever will not resort to his proper remedy must be supposed himself to rest satisfied that he has received more than an equivalent for his damages, on account of the advantage of the improvement, as well as the additional value which it has given to his property.

Mr. BASCOM. In my county we have had some difficulty with corporations contending with individuals for the right of way. I believe it is the desire of the people there, that this principle should be settled. We believe that the landholder should be first compensated for his property, and I think it would be well to adopt some such section as this. It is not the interest of the State nor the interest of these soulless corporations that we should be most careful to guard. These corporations have no regard for the rights of individuals, if, by oppressing them, they can put money in their own pockets. On the contrary, it is my wish to guard the rights of the individual citizen. I hold that, in most cases, where corporations are organized for the construction of splendid works of improvement, their first object is not for the benefit of the public generally, so much as for filling the pockets of the corporators. I hold, also, that corporate bodies can have no just right to claim the land of an individual citizen, or take his property of any description, without first making him a just compensation therefor. Nor do I conceive it necessary to give any power or privilege to those companies for the construction of the public works, beyond what are allowed to individual citizens. Therefore it should certainly be required of them that a jury of freeholders should assess the damages, and that the money should be first tendered to the owner of the property. I think they could not justly ask anything more than this. I think they should possess no power to take away the property of the individual, beyond that which the law confers upon one individual to take away the property of another individual. I cannot see the reason why a corporate company should claim exclusive rights, and powers, and privileges, beyond and above those belonging to the individual citizen of the State. I am opposed to the principle of monopoly in any shape; and especially am I opposed to placing extraordinary powers in the hands of incorporated companies. Therefore, it is my judgment that they should first remunerate the citizen—first give him the full value of his property before they can dispossess him. This would be such a near approach to justice, that, I think, there could be no reasonable complaint against it. I have no objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Bright,) so far as regards the payment of the assessed value in money; but I must insist that this value should be first tendered to the owner by the person to be benefited by the taking away of the property. Because a public highway comes along over a man's land, there is no reason why that should authorize a trespass on the part of the proprietors of the road, by taking timber, or stone, or soil—this constitutes no reason why this landholder alone should be taxed for the benefit of the public, or to benefit the treasury of a great State. I hope, therefore, that the section will be adopted as originally reported, believing that its provisions will advance and protect the best interests of the State as well as the individual citizen.

Mr. NILES. Mr. President, as I am a member of the committee which reported this section, and was compelled to dissent from the action of the majority, I hope that I may be indulged in a few remarks before the vote is taken. From present indications, I am fearful that the views which I hold will not be acceptable to the majority of this Convention. If I correctly understand the amendment and the amendment to the amendment now pending, I am opposed to both of them, as I certainly am to the original section. And should it, at any time, come in order, I shall offer a substitute for the committee's section, which I will now read as part of my remarks. It is, that no man's particular services shall be demanded or property taken and applied to public use, without just compensation being made therefor. This is the section, as we find it in the present Constitution, except the words "or with the consent of his representatives." As that seems to be very clearly the sentiment of the Convention, I am willing to go with the gentleman from Cass (Mr. Biddle) and others, so far as to say that no man shall be compelled to serve as a road supervisor, as a juror, or as a witness for the State in a criminal prosecution, without being entitled to reasonable pay. I prefer the old word particular to the word personal used by the committee, as it will distinguish between such services and those general services which all good citizens owe to the State in protecting the interests and preserving the good order of society. As to the right to take private property for public use, I desire to leave it upon the broad basis of simple justice. What more can be desired? If its spirit is carried out by the Legislature, by courts and juries, what provision could be more sound and wholesome, than the one I have suggested?

It has often been said in this Hall, and in my judgment, with great propriety, that it is the business of a Constitutional Convention, not to legislate or adopt specific and restrictive provisions, but to incorporate into the organic law, broad general principles, which are sound and safe now, and which will remain sound and safe for the next generation and in all coming time. We should adhere as far as practicable to that rule. No safer general rule for the government of our action could be adopted. I object, then, to the section reported by the committee and to the pending amendments, because they embody restrictive legislative provisions which may work badly in practice, and must tend to gross injustice.

Gentlemen insist that hard cases upon individuals have arisen under the present Constitution, and that private property has sometimes been taken for public use, under circumstances of great injustice. All that may be very true. But how have such cases occurred? Either at the instance of the State itself or of corporations created by special acts. No one doubts that under the present system, the State has suffered from hasty and inconsiderate legislation. By a method of log-rolling, to use a cant term, bills have often been passed through the General Assembly without being once read, without their true character being understood, without the yeas and nays being entered upon the journal, and without men being placed in a position to be held responsible for their acts. In such a way, power may sometimes have been given to corporations which ought not to be intrusted to any man or set of men. I take it for granted that the new Constitution will prevent such evils, by providing that corporations shall exist only under general laws, which must be enacted deliberately, with the consent of not less than a majority of all the members elected to the House, and upon a call of the yeas and nays; and these general laws will probably be left subject to prospective modification or repeal. Then I would ask whether, with such guards thrown around their action, and when we require the members of the General Assembly to swear, in effect, that no man's property shall be taken for public use without just compensation, there can be danger in committing the legislative details to them? Will it not be far more safe for all interests than to undertake here to incorporate legislative provisions into the organic law of the State?

It has been said in this debate, that these corporations are organized more for purposes of private gain than for the public good. But, I apprehend that, on a moment's reflection, it will be admitted that the highest public interests are involved in their success. Look, for example, at a single plank road, in the county of Laporte, only sixteen miles in length. That one road has added three or four cents to the value of every bushel of wheat and corn raised in the county. I can speak confidently for the small portion of the State which I in part represent, when I say that, instead of looking with suspicion upon public improvements, we will be glad to have persons come among us and invest their money for such purposes. I should regret exceedingly, to see any provision incorporated in the Constitution, which would indicate jealousy of such improvements, or which would place corporations, organized for such purposes, at the mercy of a few unreasonable individuals.

It has been intimated by gentlemen, that the owners of property will not unreasonably stand in the way of public improvements. But we know the contrary from experience; and it is on account of the few unreasonable men that it is necessary that the right exist to take private property for public use. Many members of this Convention will remember the action of New Hampshire on this subject. There, they went so far at one time, as to say that no corporation should take private property even for public use, without the owner's consent. It was found that a few men stood for years in the way of all public improvements, and, while the rest of New England was being intersected with railroads in all directions, New Hampshire had nothing of the kind. And, except for abandoning such a doctrine, that State would soon have been left little else than a barren waste of granite rocks. I should regret to see anything of that spirit prevailing here. These public improvements are doubling the value of the property of all our fellow-citizens. They are an essential element in the march of civilization, and I trust that this Convention will do nothing to impede their progress. One of the evils likely to arise under the section reported by the committee, was well illustrated by the gentleman from Jefferson. I trust, sir, that in this particular, we will confine ourselves to the plain, palpable duty of a Constitutional Convention, and leave the whole matter upon the broad platform of simple justice.

Mr. OWEN. I have but a few words to say in reply to the observations of the gentleman from Laporte. In some of his remarks I cordially concur. For example, in a general way, I believe that these public improvements are quite as much in favor of the public interests, as they are in favor of the interests of the corporators. As in the case the gentleman has cited, so it is in regard to a plank road, now nearly completed, from the town in which I live, New Harmony, to Mount Vernon, on the Ohio river. I believe that those of us who subscribed to the stock of the road, did so far more from considerations connected with the great advantages to be derived to the community around us, than from any belief that we would obtain a large dividend on the stock. So far, then, I agree with the gentleman.

In regard to another matter, I dissent from his remarks; and I think that, upon a further review of the subject, he may be induced to change his opinion. He says that, at the present time, when we pass acts of incorporation singly, it often happens that too ample privileges are conferred by these acts, but that he supposes, under the general acts of incorporation, which will hereafter be adopted, no such abuse will prevail. But let us consider that, if there be a question of but one act of incorporation, then few men, comparatively, will be interested in the passage of the law; while, if it be a general act of incorporation, then all who desire to become members of incorporated bodies under the act, may unite their interests and obtain almost what they desire. Is not this combination of interests a dangerous thing, unless we guard it here, and say it shall not claim too much? We must be careful, then, in regard to this matter. It was considered one of the most important topics that came before the committee, and it was carefully debated there during two whole days, before it was finally reported upon, in the present section.

Let me ask what the restriction, imposed upon corporations by this article, amounts to, in practice? It says, there shall be cash payments. Is that so great a hardship? When we enter a store and buy goods and pay down for what we receive, is that regarded as a case of hardship? How much delay will there probably be, in organizing a jury of free-holders? They can be convened in a day or two, and give their decision in a few hours. It is not likely, at the farthest, that there will be necessity for a delay of more than a week; and is the delay of a week so fatal that we must endanger the rights of citizens, in order to avoid it? The provision says that, if a company desire the privilege of a right of way through any man's land, they must first tender the amount of damages assessed by a jury of free-holders. Is there wrong done in this? If a man or a company desire to obtain a thing, they ought to have the money ready to pay for it; and, if they have it ready, what hardship in tendering it? They offer to the owner the amount decided upon by the jury, and if, after tendering the money, the owner is not satisfied, then the law may permit the company to take possession without payment: the owner following up his appeal.

Here, then, is simply a cash payment, and the possible delay of a week. Is it not, I ask again, worth while to make such a sacrifice as that, in order to protect the rights of the citizen? It cannot truly be said, that such a sacrifice as that will retard internal improvements,—those improvements to which our State is yet to owe much, and to which all the States of this Union owe, or will owe, a large portion of their prosperity.

Mr. BARBOUR. I understand this proposition, that a part of the section is retained—that relating to the assessment by a jury of free-holders—and if this clause is to be retained in this section, I have one objection to it. I think that the mode of assessment should be left to the discretion of the Legislature. The section provides that an assessment is to be taken by a jury of freeholders, in the first instance, and then the amount assessed is to be tendered, together with the expenses of the proceeding, to the owner, by the person to be benefited. In other words, putting the entire expense of the assessment, which may be fifty or a hundred dollars, upon the company or State who may desire to make use of the property for public purposes. I object entirely to this mode of proceeding.

The company or State should be allowed, in the first instance, before an assessment is made, to tender what in their judgment would be a fair compensation. In case the tender be refused, and legal proceedings follow to adjust the compensation, if the owner of the property fails to recover more than was tendered to him, he should pay the cost of the proceedings for his unjust claim.

We all know that claimants for damages done by public improvements, never claim too little, and as a general rule, a little more than they ought to have. The consequence would be, that an assessment would be made in every case, and the company or State subjected to a heavy expense.

If you allow a tender to be made in advance of any assessment, and if that tender be just and sufficient, it is right and proper, if an assessment follow, that it be at the expense of the claimant. If the tender should prove insufficient, then the company or State should bear the expense. This is my view of this branch of the question.

I should prefer that these articles be left out of the Constitution, and left to the good sense of the legislative authority. But if a provision of the kind be retained in the Constitution, I desire to see it modified in accordance with these views.

Mr. PETTIT stated, that as he had already made a speech upon this subject yesterday, he would not further debate it. He would simply ask for the yeas and nays upon the question.

The yeas and nays being ordered, were taken with the following result—yeas 120, nays 9:

Those voting in the affirmative were,

Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Badger, Balingall, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Bryant, Butler, Chapman, Chenoweth, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Edmonston, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Holiday, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Warren, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mathis, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannón, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Terry, Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Vanbenthusen, Wallace, Walpole, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Zenor.—120.

Those voting in the negative were,

Messrs. Farrow, Hall, Holman, Kilgore, Nave, Newman, Smith of Ripley, Watts, and Mr. President.—9.

So the pending amendments were laid upon the table.

The question recurring upon the adoption of the third section, submitted by the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of the State—

Mr. NILES moved to amend by striking out all after the word "section" and inserting, "No man's particular services shall be demanded, or property taken and applied to public use, without just compensation being made therefor.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe moved to amend the amendment offered by the gentleman from Laporte, (Mr. Niles,) by adding the following:

"But the General Assembly shall enact no law which may authorize any incorporation to take the property of any man without just compensation first made to the owner in such manner as may be prescribed by law."

Mr. MAGUIRE. I believe it is in order to perfect the original section offered by the committee, and I propose to add to it the following:

"Provided, however, That any company or association desiring to construct a railroad or any other public improvement, shall have the right to locate such railroad or other improvement before the assessment is made for damages."

I desire to make a single remark, only, in connection with this amendment; and that is, that it appears to me, by the terms of the original section, that you cannot enter upon land at all, for you cannot make a location until after the assessment for damages, and you cannot ascertain the amount of damages until you know the land on which to locate. I throw out this proposition for the consideration of the Convention, and if they think well of it, it can be embodied in the section.

Mr. BIDDLE. I shall vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Clark) to the amendment of the gentleman from Laporte, (Mr. Niles,) considering that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Laporte will accomplish the object desirable to be attained. He has adopted the section of the old Constitution on the subject, simply striking out the words "without the consent of his representatives," so that the representative shall not have the power to take the property of the citizen without compensation. This will leave the question whether the payment shall be first made, or afterwards, to subsequent legislation, as the interests of the State and the citizen may demand; but it will take from the representative the power to demand his services or take his property without compensation.

Mr. BORDEN. I think, Mr. President, that we have spent time enough in the discussion of this question, and with a view of getting a vote on the main proposition—the one reported by the committee, which I am satisfied the majority of the Convention are in favor of—I move to lay the pending amendments upon the table.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Allen can only move to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Marion (Mr. Maguire) on the table.

Mr. BORDEN. At the request of several members, I withdraw my motion.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe. I hope, sir, that the vote will not be taken on this question until the members of the Convention thoroughly understand it, or at least until we have had opportunity to discuss the character of the provision. Now, all the arguments I have heard against this authority being granted to the State, during this debate, have been directed against that exercise of sovereignty which the State has or may depute to corporations. It is alleged that this power has been improperly extended to those legal associations. This may be true. Abuses, no doubt, have occurred from careless legislation in this, as in other classes of laws. But for this reason are we to divest the State itself of all right of sovereign domain, or so restrict its exercise as greatly to embarrass or impede the exercise of the necessary purposes of government? I do not think the Convention is prepared to deny the State itself the possession of such power. This has never been denied to any sovereignty. No State can exist without this sovereign authority. If you take away this right, you take away the right of the State itself to exist; and I apprehend that gentlemen do not wish to go that far.

We should be exceedingly careful in restricting the sovereignty of the State, which is its authority to exercise the functions of government according to the design of its institution. The right of self-defense in a government, may be said to be a natural, an essential right. It must have the sovereign power to maintain its own existence, on precisely the same principle that an individual is supposed always to have the right of self-defense. This sovereignty pervades and sanctions the powers of the government in all its various ramifications. How many occasions may arise in which its exercise will be essential for the preservation of society, it is almost impossible to foresee. In a city, the public authorities may be compelled to order a house to be blown up or pulled to pieces, in order to stay the course of a destructive fire. Here every one perceives how preposterous it would be, to think of summoning a jury to assess the damage, before the sovereignty could exercise authority over individual property. Again, is there not great truth in the remarks of the gentleman from Hendricks (Mr. Nave)? If the State is compelled to pay all witnesses, all officers' fees—if no man's personal services is to be commanded, in the prosecution of public offenses by the State, may we not prevent the punishment of crime by the vast expense imposed on the State? If, in these matters, every duty performed by the citizen is to be paid for, may we not so overburthen the Government as to defeat its purposes altogether? There are duties which all citizens are occasionally called on to perform; services which the necessities of the State demand alike from all; obligations which all citizens owe to their Government, the common defense of all. These are personal services, and would be embraced under the provisions of the section reported by the committee. Can we safely provide that all the duties required from the citizen, to be performed for the State, shall be paid for in advance? We must invest the State with the power and the means of maintaining itself, or it must cease to exist.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Believing that the object of the amendment I offered, can be effected by the Legislature, I withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDENT. The question now before the Convention is upon the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Clark,) to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles).

Mr. LOCKHART. I am entirely satisfied with the amendment offered as a substitute for the original section, by the gentleman from Laporte, (Mr. Niles,) and I will therefore move to lay the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, on the table.

The question being taken upon the motion of the gentleman from Vanderburgh, (Mr. Lockhart,) it was decided in the affirmative.

The question then recurring upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Laporte, as a substitute for the original section,

Mr. BRIGHT moved to amend by inserting between the words "compensation" and "being" the words, "in money irrespective of intrinsic benefits."

Mr. B. said, I desire, Mr. President, to trouble the Convention with a few remarks in reference to this proposed amendment. I believe, sir, with the gentleman from Laporte, that we ought not here to perform the duties of the Legislature in relation to this subject, and that we should as far as possible, adopt the provisions of the old Constitution which refer to the subject. If gentlemen will turn to the seventh section of the first article of the Constitution, they will find it is in the language of the present amendment, except so far as regards the compensation in money, irrespective of extrinsic benefits. This then is the addition I propose to make, and I do it for this reason: a true and liberal construction of the Constitution as it is, would show, in my opinion, that the compensation is to be made in money. The language of the Constitution is, "that no man's services shall be demanded or property taken for the public service, without compensation being made therefor." Now, sir, if the language of this instrument had not been interfered with by judicial construction, there is hardly a gentleman on this floor that would, for a moment, doubt that the compensation was intended by the terms of the Constitution to be made in money.

How different has been the construction of this clause of the Constitution? A construction has been made which I conceive to be in utter violation of the instrument itself. The language of the Constitution is plain enough—the compensation of the individual shall be in money. He shall be compensated in money for his property or services, taken for the public use.

In 1836 when we entered into our mammoth system of internal improvements, the Legislature, fearing perhaps that this compensation being in money would be made to a greater extent than was desirable, engrafted in the law of 1836 what I have always considered to be a violation of the Constitution. They provided in that law how the compensation was to be paid, and how the damages were to be assessed that an individual might sustain. They also provided that in all cases of assessment of damages, as it is provided in the section before us, that the assessing jury shall take into consideration the benefit resulting to the claimant from the construction of the work. Thus, instead of leaving the question entirely open for the sole action of the jury, they passed an unconstitutional rule by which those damages were to be ascertained. The jury are to make compensation for what an individual's services or property may be worth, taking into consideration the extrinsic advantages that may result to him from the proposed improvement. Such a rule of course operates to the disadvantage of the individual whose property is taken possession of, for he has to pay for an improvement which results to the benefit of his neighbors. The individual whose property is to be taken is a part of the body politic—a component portion of the community, and if the community are to be benefited by any improvement made upon his property, he of course is entitled to a proportion of the benefits, as well as his neighbors. If, then, you take from the individual his property, and then deduct from his compensation the supposed value the improvement may confer on the remainder of his property, you confer on the other portion of the community an advantage which he does not enjoy. He has to pay for their benefit. The individual may not desire to sell his property, he may wish to keep it, yet you take it from him and compel him to pay for the improvement that is proposed to be made, giving as a reason for so doing that the improvement will add to the value of his adjoining property. It is an unjust and an unauthorized construction of the article of the Constitution relating to the subject.

Mr. President, it is proposed to make a distinction in regard to this matter between corporations and the State. So far as this question is concerned I do not see why any difference should be made between corporations and the State—for the State no more than individuals can take the property of individuals except for public purposes. No member of the community can be compelled to part with property except for public use. It is a power of sovereignty which the State should be careful in exercising, and it is a power which the State delegates frequently to corporations, and they exercise it in the same manner that the State exercises it. A corporation cannot be invested by the State with the power to take private property except for public purposes, for corporations are created for public purposes or at least should be the design of their organization.

We have a law relating to public roads under which individuals may combine together and construct roads; yet these roads must be constructed for public purposes and not for private gain. As the power is the same whether exercised by the State or delegated to a corporation and exercised by them, I hold there should be no distinction drawn in this matter, for the benefit of the State.

I hope, sir, that the proposition I have offered will be engrafted in the Constitution. It is the proposition which was originally intended by the framers of the present article in the Constitution pertaining to the subject, to be carried out; so that every individual whose property may be taken for the public use shall be fully compensated for his damages in money without regard to the advantages that may result to the remainder of his property from such improvement. If you will say to the citizen that he shall have compensation for damages done to his property by any new public improvement without reference to any extrinsic benefits supposed to be conferred on him by such improvement, you meet my views of what should be adopted as a Constitutional provision.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. PRESIDENT: I am opposed to the proposition of the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Bright,) and shall be obliged to vote against it. I do not think that the effect of such a provision would be to secure equal justice to the citizens of the State. Individuals living in the vicinity of railroads, plank roads and canals, will be benefitted, and sometimes at the expense of the people of other portions of the State.

To illustrate more clearly the view which I take of this proposition and its practical operation, I will suppose a case. A. and B. are citizens of Indiana, having farms lying on the line of a contemplated public improvement—say a canal. It runs along on the line of A.'s farm, but does not touch his land. But the canal is cut directly through the farm of B.—perhaps lengthwise. Before the canal was projected the two farms were worth two thousand dollars each, but by the construction of this public work by the State, A.'s land is enhanced in value one thousand dollars, so that it is now worth three thousand dollars. On the other hand, B.'s farm is not enhanced in value and is still worth but two thousand dollars, and he has damages assessed to him to the amount of one thousand dollars in consequence of the canal running through the farm.

The proposition of the gentleman from Jefferson is to tax C., who has a farm one hundred miles from the line of the canal, to pay this one thousand dollars to A., in order that his farm may be as much benefited by the canal as that of B. A., living on the line of the canal, has his property benefited to an amount equivalent to the damage sustained, because he has greater facilities for transporting his produce to market, while C., is not benefited to the amount of a dollar, because he lives so far from the canal that he takes his produce to market by another route.

That, sir, in my estimation, is the state of the case under a provision like the one embraced in the pending amendment. If a man, through whose land a railroad or any other public improvement is made, is benefited to twice the amount of his assessed damages, the amount of damages awarded must be paid in money, irrespective of the benefits derived—the accruing benefits must not be taken into account. In the case which I put, neither party is injured; both, on the contrary, are positively benefited. Shall we, aside from the benefit, tax the people of the State to pay the one an additional amount of money so that both may be equally benefited?

But the gentleman from Jefferson says that the individual, through whose property a public improvement may be built, should receive the amount of his assessed damages in money, irrespective of the benefits accruing to his other property because he may not desire to sell it, and therefore its enhanced value is not an immediate and tangible benefit. I reply, sir, that it is no matter whether he desires to sell that property or not, it is enhanced in value and the owner so much the richer.

I hope the amendment of the gentleman (Mr. Bright) may not prevail.

Mr. WALPOLE. I differ, sir, with the gentleman from Jefferson, with regard to the propriety of his proposition. In order that I may be understood, I will read the following motion, which I would make if in order. I would move to recommit the third section of the report of the committee on the rights and privileges of the citizens of the State, to the same committee, with instructions to so modify said section as to substitute the word "particular" in the first line of the section, also amend by proper words, so "that the Jury in assessing damages, shall not make any abatement for supposed advantages to result to the citizen, in contemplation of the construction of any public improvements to be made by any incorporated company.

I would suggest to the gentleman from Jefferson, whether he accomplishes his object by the language of his amendment?

Mr. TAGUE. I move to lay the amendment and the amendment to the amendment on the table, and to recommit the section to the committee which reported it.

SEVERAL VOICES. No, no, withdraw the motion.

Mr. ZENOR. MR. PRESIDENT, I believe that question is divisible; is it not!

The PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. ZENOR. I then call for a division of the question.

The PRESIDENT stated the question to be upon laying the amendments on the table.

Mr. RARIDEN. Is the motion to lay both amendments upon the table?

The PRESIDENT. That is the motion.

Mr. RARIDEN. I would like to vote to lay the amendment to the amendment on the table, if I knew "how to get at it."

Mr. TAGUE. MR. PRESIDENT, Upon this question I call for the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number demanding the yeas and nays, the same were ordered and, being taken, resulted as follows:

AYES.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Beeson, Berry, Borden, Bracken, Chapman, Dick, Duzan, Edmonston, Foster, Garvin, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Harbolt, Jones, Kent, March, Mathis, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Owen, Pettit, Ristine, Shoup, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Tague, Terry, Trimble, Walpole, Wheeler, Wiley, and Wunderlich—43.

NOES.—Messrs. Badger, Barbour, Beach, Beard, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bright, Bryant, Butler, Carter, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Frisbie, Gordon, Gregg, Hall, Holliday, Hamilton, Hardin, Hawkins, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Kendall of Warren, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, May, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Morgan, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sims, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Vanbenthusen, Wallace, Watts, Wolfe, Yocum, and Zenor—33.

So the motion was disagreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question is now upon the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WATTS. I move to lay the amendment to the amendment on the table.

Mr. RARIDEN remarked that this was the proper motion.

The yeas and nays being demanded upon the motion of Mr. WATTS, the same were ordered, and, being taken, resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Badger, Balingall, Barbour, Bascom, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Bryant, Butler, Chenowith, Clark of Tippecanoe, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Frisbie, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hawkins, Helmer, Howe, Johnson, Kent, Kendall of Warren, Kilgore, Kinley, Maguire, Mathis, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Newman, Niles, Pettit, Rariden, Read of Clark, Ristine, Robinson, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Tague, Thomas, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Yocum, and Zenor—65.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Blythe, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Carter, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Edmonston, Foster, Garvin, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Holliday, Hardin, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Jones, Lockhart, March, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Gibson, Moore, Murray, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Smiley, Spann, Stevenson, Terry, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Vanbenthusen, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Wunderlich, and Mr. President—63.

Mr. BORDEN remarked that he did not vote to lay on the table, because he was opposed to the proposition itself.

Mr. MURRAY desired to give a reason for his vote. It was due to the committee with whom he was associated, to say that he made objections to the report when it was under discussion, but after some amendments tacitly consented to the report. Reflection and discussion had confirmed his objections—he was satisfied they were valid.

Mr. KENT moved to re-commit the section to the committee on the rights and privileges of the citizens of the State, with certain instructions.

Mr. WATTS asked if this motion was not also divisible.

The PRESIDENT. The motion to re-commit may be separated from the motion to instruct.

Mr. WATTS. Then I will ask for a division of the question.

The question being divided and being taken first upon re-committing, the Convention refused to re-commit.

Mr. PETTIT moved to re-commit the section to the same committee from which it was reported, with certain instructions.

Mr. WATTS. I rise to a question of order.

A MEMBER. The Convention has just refused to re-commit the section.

Mr. PETTIT. Yes, but my motion is in order, for it is to re-commit for a different purpose.

Mr. RARIDEN. MR. PRESIDENT: I can see no necessity for re-committing this section. It is obvious to every member that the matter now in controversy between gentlemen is the simple question "shall we provide in the new Constitution that the amount of damages assessed to the owner of property taken for public use shall be paid before the property can be taken?" That, sir, is the question, and it is nothing else. There is no variety of opinion in this Chamber as to the rights to which individuals are entitled.

A motion was made to adjourn, but was disagreed to.

Mr. BERRY offered the following:

Add after the word "therefor" "and when taken for the benefit or use of incorporated companies shall be first paid."

Mr. WOLFE. I am decidedly opposed to that amendment. It will not do to adopt such stringent provisions with regard to the right of way; it will be in effect to arrest the construction of all public works in the State. What gentleman on this floor does not know how much the State depends upon her public works and internal improvements for the prosperity of her people? I believe that the Convention is too well aware of the deleterious effects of such an amendment as the one just offered, and I move to lay it upon the table;

Which motion was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. PETTIT, the Convention adjourned until nine o'clock to-morrow morning.

FRIDAY, Nov. 8, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. ———.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. COOKERLY moved a suspension of the regular order of business to enable him to introduce a resolution.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. KENT, from the committee on matters pertaining to criminal law, submitted the following report:

MR. PRESIDENT:

The committee on criminal law, to whom was referred a resolution, have had the same under consideration, and have directed me to report the following section for the consideration of the Convention.

Your committee ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject:

SEC. —. Every person who shall give or accept a challenge to fight a duel, or who shall knowingly carry to another person a challenge to fight a duel, or who shall agree to go out of the State to fight a duel, shall be ineligible to hold any office of trust or profit.

The report was concurred in, and the section was read a first time and passed to a second reading to-morrow.

Mr. BORDEN, from the committee on the practice of law and law reform, submitted the following report:

MR. PRESIDENT:

The committee on "the practice of law and law reform," to whom were referred sundry resolutions on the subject of a reform in the practice and proceedings of the courts of this State, have had these subjects under consideration, and instructed me to report the section herewith submitted, to be incorporated in its proper place in the amended Constitution.

The resolutions are herewith reported back with the recommendation that they be laid upon the table.

And the committee respectfully ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

The report was concurred in.

The section reported is as follows:

SEC. —. The General Assembly, at its first session after the adoption of this Constitution, shall provide for the appointment of three commissioners, whose duty it shall be to revise, reform, simplify, and abridge the rules and practice, pleadings, forms, and proceedings, both civil and criminal, of the courts of this State. And they shall provide for the abolition of the distinct forms of actions at law now in use; and that justice may be administered in a uniform mode of pleading, without reference to any distinction between law and equity.

And the General Assembly may also make it the duty of said commissioners to reduce into a systematic code, the General Statute Law of this State; and said commissioners shall, from time to time, report the result of their labors to the General Assembly, with such recommendations and suggestions as to abridgment and amendment as to said commissioners may seem necessary.

Provision shall be made by law for filling vacancies, regulating the tenure of office, and the compensation of said commissioners.

It was read a first time and passed to second reading to-morrow.

Mr. NEWMAN, from the committee on special and local legislation, submitted the following report:

MR. PRESIDENT:

The committee on local and special legislation and uniformity of laws, to which was referred certain resolutions of the Convention, have had the same under consideration, and have directed me to report the same back with the recommendation that they be laid on the table.

The committee have also directed me to report the following article for insertion in the amended Constitution:

The report was concurred in, and the resolutions were laid on the table.

ARTICLE —.

Sec. —. The General Assembly shall not pass any local or special laws in any of the following enumerated cases. That is to say:

Regulating the jurisdiction and duties of justices of the peace and constables; for the punishment of crimes and misdemeanors; regulating the practice at law and in chancery; providing for granting divorces and changing the venue in civil and criminal cases; changing the names of persons; for laying out, opening, working on, and repairing highways, and the election or appointment of supervisors; vacating roads, town plats, streets, alleys, and public squares; summoning and empanneling grand and petit juries, and providing for their payment; regulating county and township business; regulating the election of county and township officers, and their compensation; for the assessment and collection of taxes for State, county, township, or road purposes; providing for maintaining common schools, and the preservation of school funds; in relation to fees or salaries; providing for opening and conducting elections for State, county, or township officers, and where electors may vote; providing for the sale of real estate by executors, administrators, or guardians; for the creation of private incorporations; for the incorporation of colleges, seminaries, schools, churches, religious, scientific, or benevolent societies; providing for the incorporation of railroad, plank road, turnpike road, canal, and bridge companies; in relation to municipal corporations, such as Congressional townships, school districts, cities, boroughs, towns, and villages.

And all laws in all such cases shall be general and of uniform operation throughout the State.

Concurred in; read a first time and passed to a second reading.

Mr. GRAHAM of Warrick, from the select committee, to whom the subject of printing the Journal and Debates of the Convention was referred, made the following report:

MR. PRESIDENT:

The select committee, to which was referred a communication from Austin H. Brown, Printer to the Convention, with a pending amendment upon the subject of printing the Journal and Debates of the Convention, have had the subject under consideration, and believe that there can be no difference of opinion, either as to the duty or propriety, in relation to the publication of the Journal and Debates. It is clearly due, alike to the people and the members of the Convention, that the former may be able to know the action of their Delegates, and the latter have the means, at all times, to place their labor in its proper light. Your committee is further of opinion that the Legislature of the State would not have directed the Governor to employ a Stenographer, if it had not intended that the proceedings of the Convention should be published in such form as to comprise a lasting part of the history of the State.

The committee, therefore, report the following resolutions, and recommend their adoption:

C. C. GRAHAM,
SCHUYLER COLFAX,
SAML J. ANTHONY,
W. C. FOSTER:

1. Resolved, That the Printer to this Convention be directed to print seven hundred and fifty copies of the Register of Debates, to be distributed as the Convention may hereafter direct; Provided, That such printing be done by him at thirty-five cents per thousand ems, for composition, and forty cents per token for press work.

2. Resolved, That the Printer to the Convention be also directed to print five hundred copies of the Journal of this Convention, at the same rates as are now allowed by law for the printing of this State.

The undersigned, while concurring in the above report, desires to add, that, in common with other members, he has held and uniformly voted that the State Printer had a claim to the printing of this Convention. But a large majority of this body having concluded differently, having repeatedly attested that conclusion by votes to that effect, and having elected a Printer to this Convention, he deems it his duty to yield to that decision, and not to continue an opposition to the resolves of the majority, which might be considered factious. Believing, therefore, that the Printer of this body is, like the Printer of the Legislature, as clearly entitled to print every portion of its proceedings, as he is to print the reports from committees and resolutions—and believing further, that if the Convention does not order the printing of its Debates and Journal, the Legislature will not, he has concurred with his colleagues of the committee in their report and resolution.

SCHUYLER COLFAX.

Mr. KILGORE said he understood that the gentleman who was now, by the authority of the Convention, publishing the debates in the "Daily Journal" of this city, was also publishing them in book form. If this was the case, any number of copies that the Convention desired to order he thought might be obtained from him, at much less expense than by ordering a re-publication by the printer to the Convention. He was of the opinion that this resolution had better be laid upon the table until gentlemen should have an opportunity to inform themselves upon this point. There was clearly, as it appeared to him, no necessity for printing the debates twice over.

Mr. WOLFE moved that a select committee of five be appointed, of which the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Kilgore) should be chairman, to procure the necessary information in regard to this matter.

SEVERAL VOICES. Oh, no; it is not necessary.

Mr. MILROY asked for the reading of the resolution submitted by the gentleman from Switzerland (Mr. Kelso) some weeks ago, and adopted by the Convention. The resolution was read, as follows:

"Resolved, That a record of the proceedings of this Convention shall be kept in the following manner, to-wit: All that class of legislative matter usually contained in the journals of the Legislature shall be journalized under the direction of the Principal Secretary. He shall prepare, or cause to be prepared, an index to said journal, and if the printing of said journal be ordered, he shall superintend the same. He shall also prepare, or cause to be prepared, a manuscript copy, to be deposited by the President and Secretary in the office of the Secretary of State, in pursuance of the 14th section of the act entitled "an act to provide for the call of a Convention of the people of the State of Indiana, to revise, amend, or alter, the Constitution of said State."

There shall also be kept a journal of debates under the direction of the Stenographer; but said journal of debates shall not contain that class of matter usually embraced in Legislative journals, further than may be actually necessary to identify and give a correct understanding of the subject matter under discussion."

Mr. WOLFE. I am in earnest, sir, in making the motion for the appointment of a select committee, because if we can get the book from the present publisher at a cheaper rate than we can have it printed by the printer to the Convention, I think we ought to do so.

The PRESIDENT. Does the gentleman move to refer any resolution to the select committee?

Mr. WOLFE. No; sir, I desire only that a committee shall be appointed to wait on the publisher of the "Daily Journal" and ascertain from him whether he can supply the Convention with the number of copies they want.

Mr. GRAHAM of Warrick. This subject has been discussed from time to time and more than once laid upon the table and taken up again. It has occupied from first to last a good deal of time: and I think we should make some disposition of it, without wasting any more time over it.

All that I can say in regard to the cost of printing the register of debates is that a practical printer has made a calculation that the work can be done for twenty per cent. less than the prices now authorized by law to be paid to the State Printer.

Mr. FOSTER. Twenty-five per cent. cheaper.

Mr. GRAHAM. Now I think it is due to those who are interested in the work that the question should be settled at once.

I trust the Convention will either adopt the report of the select committee, or else lay the subject on the table, and let it remain there.

Mr. FOSTER remarked that he had been assured that the work could be done twenty-five per cent. cheaper than the rates authorized by law to be paid to the State Printer.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee.

The yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered.

Mr. BORDEN said, he was still of the opinion that the State Printer ought to do this work but he would not resist the manifest wish of the Convention. He should be obliged to vote against this resolution, however, because although he was willing that the debates and proceedings should be published, he knew very little about printers' prices; and the Legislature having elected a Public Printer, and established the prices to be paid for all work done by him, when the course indicated by them was followed, and the work given to the Public Printer, he knew what he was doing; but when they departed from that course, and relied upon the statements of printers who were struggling to obtain the work, it was impossible for him to say whether they would not be obliged to pay much more for it than it was worth. It was possible that it might be done for less than the established prices for public printing, and he understood the gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Foster) to say that it could be done for less; yet he should be constrained to vote against the proposition, for the reason that he was not himself convinced of that fact, and, also, for the reason that he still believed that the State Printer ought to have this printing.

Mr. COOKERLY. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the select committee whether he has ascertained what the work will cost.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will remark that the resolution fixes the price.

Mr. COOKERLY. Well, sir, I should like to know whether the price thus fixed in the resolution is founded upon reliable information.

Mr. COLFAX. As I have been called upon by several gentleman to speak in regard to this report, I will add a few remarks to it.

It will be seen by the note that is appended to the report that I occupy a position somewhat different from that of the other members of the committee in regard to this subject. The question as to who should do the printing of the Convention was argued on several different days, and it is well known to gentlemen who took any interest in the matter that I declared my opinion to be that the State Printer had a rightful claim to the printing of the Convention, and I so voted some six or eight times, upon the yeas and nays, recording my vote with the gentleman from Allen (Mr. Borden) and others, with whom I concurred in sentiment. The Convention, however, decided differently by a very large majority. They decided that the State Printer had no claim ex-officio to do the work of the Convention, and they thereupon went into the election of a Printer.

The question now, as I view it, assumes a different aspect, so far as I am concerned, for I am never disposed in a body of a deliberative character to make a factious opposition to the clearly expressed will of a majority. That will having been repeatedly and definitely expressed in this case, I believe it to be my duty to conform to the decision that has been made by the Convention, and thus acquiescing, and believing, as I do, that the printer to a body like this is entitled to all the printing that it orders, and has the same right to the printing of the Journal and the Register of Debates that he has to any other branch of the same work, I could not do otherwise than concur in the report of the committee.

In regard to the question that was referred to the select committee, that committee had the Printer to the Convention before them, in order to ascertain from him what the printing would cost. He stated that his charge would be thirty-five cents per thousand ems for composition, and forty cents per token for press work. The prices allowed by law to the public Printer are: for composition, forty-five cents per thousand ems for plain matter, (such as this printing would be;) and forty-five cents per token for press work. Thus, according to the rates proposed by the Printer to the Convention, there will be a saving of ten cents per 1000 ems on the composition, and five cents per token on the press work.

The committee made a calculation to see what difference there would be in the cost of work, if done as thus offered by the Printer to the Convention, and they found that there would be a difference of about twenty per cent. in favor of his bid. The printing of the Journal will, of course, be done at the established prices.

There is one other reason which influenced me, as a member of the committee, in coming to the conclusion at which we arrived, and it is this: if the Convention does not authorize the printing of the Debates in book form, and it is, so far as I am concerned, a matter of little consequence whether they do or not, (except that the people expect the Debates of this Convention, like those of all other similar bodies, to be so published as to become part of our permanent records,) it is, to my mind, a settled fact, that the Legislature will not; and there are obvious reasons why they will not. They will say, that if this body, the body more immediately interested in having their proceedings properly presented to the public, do not care to have them published, why should they publish them? But another and a controlling reason is, that if you wait until the Legislature meets, it will be almost impossible, as the new Constitution is probably to be submitted to the people in April, to have the Debates and proceedings set up, printed, bound, and distributed through the State, before that vote is taken, and the whole matter of the adoption or rejection of the new Constitution settled.

These are the considerations which influenced me in writing with the committee in the conclusion at which they have arrived.

Mr. WATTS. I would ask the gentleman from St. Joseph, whether the printing in book form can be done without re-setting the types, and whether they have been already distributed? Would it not be better to see the Printer and ascertain this fact?

Mr. COLFAX. I will say, in answer to the gentleman from Dearborn, (Mr. Watts,) that the same type can be used for the book as for the newspaper, except where corrections and alterations are to be made. It has, however, according to printers' phrase, to be "imposed" anew, which, with the corrections, would cause an extra expense of an amount that I have not now the data to calculate.

I will state another thing, and it is this: I am quite certain that Mr. Defrees, whom we have employed to print these debates in his paper, has no right to claim the printing in book form; and he thinks so, too, for he has made no claim for it, and sent in no proposition. I believe the only persons who have any claim whatever to it, are the State Printer and the Printer to this Convention. The Convention have decided that all their printing shall be done by their Printer, whom they have elected. And if we do not order that officer to do it, my mind is quite clear that no unofficial printer has any claim whatever upon it. We must, therefore, it seems to me, either order the Printer of this body to do the work, or conclude not to have the book printed at all.

Mr. NAVE. The argument of the gentleman from St. Joseph has convinced me that the Convention ought not to order the printing of the debates, as proposed in this resolution. He gives it as a reason why we should order the printing, that, if the Convention does not do so, the Legislature—the immediate representatives of the people of Indiana—will not. If they will not, in my opinion, we should not. I deny the power of the Convention to order the printing; and consequently I am opposed to the resolution which has been reported by the committee; because we have no power to tax the people of Indiana one cent; nor is there any officer connected with this Convention who has the power to draw upon the Treasury of the State; nor has the Auditor the right to indorse any certificate emanating from an officer of this Convention, for the purpose of drawing money from the Treasury of the State. Why? Because we, the delegates of the people of Indiana, are sent here for an entirely different purpose. We are sent here to amend the Constitution of the State or to adopt a new one, and not to involve the people of Indiana in debt. We have no right conferred upon us to do any such thing; and therefore I cannot, for one, consent to order the printing of the journal or of the debates of the Convention; because, in my opinion, we have no power to direct an officer of the State government to pay over money on an order for any such purpose; and if the Legislature will not order the printing of the debates and of the journal of this Convention, it is an evidence that the people have no desire that they should be published. The argument of the gentleman from St. Joseph is conclusive, to my mind, that we should not adopt the resolution.

Mr. COLFAX said, he would ask the gentleman from Hendricks (Mr. Nave) to do him the justice to say that the reason he had assigned was, that it would be impossible to get the published proceedings and debates before the people in time to give them any aid in forming their opinions, if the publication were delayed until after the adjournment of the Convention.

Mr. HOWE moved to amend the resolution by adding thereto the following: "That the copyright be obtained, upon the application of the President of the Convention, for the State."

Mr. BORDEN. I have no objection to the motion of the gentleman; but I believe it has been decided by the Supreme Court that a copyright cannot be obtained by the State. Any person who may happen to be present may take down the reports and publish them. If they belong to any one, I suppose they belong to the gentleman who makes the report of our speeches. I doubt whether the copyright could be obtained by the State.

Mr. HOWE. If there be any doubt about it—as of course there is about every new question—it should be referred to a committee. It is certainly a matter of some importance. At the first blush, my idea is, that the copyright belongs to the State. It is true that any one who chooses, other than our Reporter, may sit here and take notes, and publish as much as he can obtain in that way; but the full and complete register of debates will be the property of the State, the State having employed a Stenographer to prepare a report at the public expense; and being the property of the State, she may undoubtedly apply for the copyright.

Mr. KILGORE. I wish to say a single word in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from St. Joseph. I have had no conversation with Mr. Defrees in relation to this matter. I believe, sir, that he does not claim the right to do the printing of the Convention any further than his contract to print the debates in his paper is concerned; and on the other hand, I do not think that the Convention Printer has a right to claim the printing of everything that may transpire in the Convention. Whatever printing the Convention may order, he has a right to claim; but I object to the Convention authorizing him, further than they have, to do the printing of the debates. My information that Mr. Defrees is publishing them in book form is from a reliable source. If, therefore, the Convention desire a number of copies of the debates, they can procure them from him; and the State may procure from him whatsoever number of copies may be required to be deposited in the State Library. My object is to save unnecessary expense; and we shall necessarily increase the expense if we now order the printing of the debates by the State Printer, or the Printer to the Convention. It is better, I think, to leave the matter where it is, in the hands of Mr. Defrees, and let him manage the printing in book form, and then to purchase from him as many copies as may be required. I think we should not be lavish of the public money, or rather that we should not rashly contract debts that we have no power to pay. We cannot appropriate money for any purpose. That is a matter that belongs to the Legislature.

Mr. NEWMAN. I rise simply for the purpose of inquiring of the chairman of the committee, if any estimate was made by the committee of the cost of printing the Journal and the Report of the Debates, and if so, to request him to inform the Convention what the probable cost will be?

I have been induced to ask the question, because I know that this information will influence many members as to the vote they are about to give.

Mr. GRAHAM. I will inform the gentleman that the committee made the investigation referred to. A book containing eight hundred pages will cost about eighty cents per volume.

Mr. NEWMAN. Does that estimate include the binding of the volume?

Mr. GRAHAM. I meant to say that the cost would be about eighty cents per volume exclusive of binding, which may be some ten or fifteen cents additional.

Mr. NEWMAN. How many copies is it proposed to print?

Mr. COLFAX. Seven hundred and fifty copies is the number recommended by the committee.

A MEMBER. Seven hundred and fifty copies of the Debates or of the Journal? It is quite important to know which, as some are in favor of printing a large number of the one and but few of the other.

Mr. COLFAX. Seven hundred and fifty copies of the Debates and five hundred copies of the Journal.

Mr. NEWMAN. Is it calculated that there will be but eight hundred pages of the volume of Debates?

Mr. GRAHAM. It is not supposed that there will be more than that.

Mr. OWEN remarked, that the volume of the proceedings and debates of the New York Convention occupied but about one thousand pages with the entire journal of that Convention, which was incorporated with the debates. He did not believe the debates of this Convention would fill that number of pages.

Mr. FOSTER. How long was the New York Convention in session?

Mr. OWEN. Four months, I believe.

Mr. RARIDEN inquired the number of members of the New York Convention.

Mr. HOWE. I will strike out the words "or otherwise" from my amendment, so that the copy-right may be secured on application of the President of this Convention.

The question being taken upon Mr. Howe's amendment, the same was disagreed to.

Mr. MOORE moved to amend the report of the committee, by striking out the words "and record of debates," so that the Journal of the Convention only should be printed.

The PRESIDENT. I would suggest to the gentleman, that the question upon the adoption of the report will be taken, first upon the resolution to print the Debates and then upon the resolution to print the Journal, so that the gentleman will attain his object by voting against the first resolution, and will not need to encumber the Journal with an amendment to which another may be added.

Mr. MOORE. I will withdraw my motion.

The question being upon the adoption of the resolution authorizing the publication of seven hundred and fifty copies of the recorded Debates—

Mr. McCLELLAND moved to amend by striking out the words "recorded debates" and inserting the words "copies of the amended Constitution."

Mr. SHERROD. I presume that almost every member of the Convention is opposed to the spirit and letter of this amendment; and I move, sir, to lay it on the table.

Which motion was agreed to.

Mr. BORDEN. Upon what does the question now turn?

The Secretary re-read the first resolution reported from the committee.

Mr. BRACKEN. Mr. President: I am inclined to think that we have already spent quite time enough in the discussion of this question of printing, and I am glad that the yeas and nays have been demanded at this time. I am also inclined to think that quite enough of the time of this Convention has been taken up for the benefit of outsiders.

A VOICE. What remark was that?

Mr. BRACKEN. If any gentleman flutters it will be regarded as an acknowledgment that he is "hit," if not wounded. [Laughter.] I think that the proposition submitted by the committee for the publication of our proceedings, is cheap enough; it has been shewn that the compensation to be allowed is lower by some twenty per cent. than the prices allowed by law, and paid to the State Printer, for the same kind of work. I have no doubt about the power of this Convention to contract for and order its own printing; that question was decided long ago, by an overwhelming majority of this body.

But I regret to say, it appears that some dozen members of this body are determined to keep up a perpetual debate upon this topic. The debate upon the subject of printing these reports of debates has already cost the State four times the amount of all the printing. When the Legislature provided for the appointment of a Reporter, and the payment of the expenses connected therewith, the power was unquestionably conferred upon this Convention to provide for the printing of its journals and debates. I do hope that the whole question of printing will be settled this day, and finally. I do not wonder that some gentlemen betray such a holy horror at the prospect of their sentiments going out in book form. I should want some speeches and some sentiments covered up and concealed if I were they; I, too, should be ashamed of, and unwilling to have them go out, to be carefully perused by the people of the State. There are gentlemen who will be held to a strict accountability for what has been done here.

Without taking up more time, I will repeat the desire that we may not again hear of this printing question after this morning.

Mr. GREGG. The gentleman who has just resumed his seat seems to have desired to make some personal allusion—perhaps to myself, as I have covered more ground on this subject than, perhaps, any other member upon this floor. But I do not rise for the purpose of setting myself right; for, upon this question, I have always been right.

It is very well known, sir, that I introduced a resolution, early in the session, declaring it inexpedient to publish the debates of this Convention, and that the services of a Stenographer should be dispensed with. But I was voted down by a fair majority, and it is a principle with me always to acquiesce in the will of a fairly ascertained majority.

As to the proposition now before the Convention, I hold that, having accepted the services of a Stenographer—having had all our debates, up to this time, reported in extenso, and published in a daily paper, they should also be issued in a form convenient for sending out to the people of the State. The prices proposed to be paid, in the report of the committee just made, are reasonable enough. I desire that copies of this book of debates should go out to the country and reach all parts of the State. And in this I may be a little malicious, for if all that is said and done here shall go to the country, this Convention will prove to be the greatest slaughter-house of politicians ever erected in the State, and the self-forged weapons are now being piled up, mountain high, in the form of the Stenographer's folios! [Great laughter.] This huge volume of debates will hereafter be known by the title of FOWLER'S

BOOK OF MARTYRS, [immoderate laughter,] illustrated and embellished by the portraits of about one hundred and forty of the victims, which, as I understand, are being taken by a competent artist of this City. [Roars of laughter.]

The question being upon the adoption of the first resolution reported by the committee, (being to publish seven hundred and fifty copies of the volume of debates,) the yeas and nays were demanded, and, being ordered, resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Bicknell, Biddle, Bracken, Bright, Bryant, Carter, Chenowith, Colfax, Davis of Parke, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Hall, Holliday, Helmer, Hendricks, Hovey, Huff, Jones, Kent, Lockhart, Maguire, May, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Rariden, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Steele, Thornton, Todd, Vanbenthusen, and Mr. President—62.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Balingall, Barbour, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Butler, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Fisher, Garvin, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hamilton, Hardin, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Howe, Kendall of Warren, Kilgore, Kinley, March, Mathis, McClelland, Milligan, Moore, Nave, Newman, Nofsinger, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Clark, Ritchey, Shoup, Sims, Smith of Scott, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Terry, Thomas, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Zenor—61.

So the resolution was adopted.

The question then being upon the adoption of the second resolution relative to the printing of five hundred copies of the journal,

Mr. READ of Monroe. Mr. President, I propose that hereafter a correct journal of the proceedings of the Convention be kept and incorporated into the record of debates. By a most unwise and ill considered resolution, which was adopted some weeks since, the Convention directed the Reporter to omit the journal of the Convention in his reports, and publish the debates by themselves. The effect of this is that, although we have been some days discussing the report of the committee on the rights and privileges of the people of the State, the reader of the debates is not given the report itself. The basis and cause of all the discussion is not given. Every report, every resolution and amendment should be given in its proper place, and then the reader could see the exact progress of the debate from its inception to its close.

And now the journal is to be printed in one volume, and the debates, which alone give interest to the journal, are to be published separately in another volume. This is all wrong. In the State of Illinois alone, of all the States in the Union, has this course of printing the debates separately from the journal, been adopted. In Kentucky and New York the journal is incorporated with the debates to which it gave rise. In Ohio, where the system of reporting the debates and proceedings was most admirable, and at the same time the most economical that I have anywhere seen, an accurate journal was kept by the Reporter, and interwoven with the debates, making a most interesting and valuable volume of only seven hundred pages, for a session of two months. But the system adopted by this Convention is radically defective—it is separating the bone from the flesh and sinews. Let us retrace our steps, or at least let us hereafter have the debates and proceedings published together, that the one may explain the other.

I offer the following amendment, to come in at the proper place: "and that hereafter the debates and journal be kept and published together."

A MEMBER moved to strike out from the amendment the word "hereafter."

Mr. READ. I will accept the amendment.

Mr. DOBSON. If this amendment is adopted, shall we not have three books, the journal, the debates, and lastly the journal and debates together?

Mr. READ of Monroe. Not at all, for the debates in book form has not been ordered until this morning, and the journal can be incorporated into the debates already published in the newspapers, and hereafter the journal would be kept in its order with the debates. I move to re-consider the vote just taken, in order to move to amend the resolution as I have proposed.

Mr. DOBSON remarked, that if the Convention re-considered that vote it might have to travel back for three weeks to re-consider other votes. By a resolution adopted some three weeks since, the Stenographer was directed to report nothing but the debates—omitting the journal. I ask the gentleman from Monroe who will go back to the commencement and incorporate the journal with the debates already published?

Mr. READ. Upon reflection and some conversation with gentlemen who have investigated the business part of the matter, I will withdraw my amendment. I am informed, that having traveled so far on the "wrong track," it is now too late to go back and incorporate the journal with the debates.

The question then being upon the resolution relative to printing the journal,

The same was agreed to, and five hundred copies ordered.

RIGHTS AND PRIVILEGES.

The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of the "order of the day," being the report made by Mr. Owen, from the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of the State.

The PRESIDENT. The following section was under consideration, and undisposed of, when the Convention adjourned:

"No man's personal services shall be demanded without just compensation."

Mr. BERRY offered the following amendment:

Strike out all after the word "man's," and insert—

"Services shall be taken without compensation. Private property shall not be taken by law, against the consent of the owner, for any other purposes than the defence of the State, and the right of way for public improvements, and, when taken for these purposes, it shall be paid for in money, irrespective of intrinsic benefit, in such manner as shall be directed by the General Assembly."

Mr. READ of Clark. So many amendments and amendments to amendments have been offered since we first took up this section, that I think it necessary to explain the position in which I stand with regard to the section and the amendments, in a few brief remarks. In the first place, I cannot approve of or support the amendment of the gentleman (Mr. Berry) just up. And I cannot support it from the fact that, while in a few rare instances, it might operate justly and equitably, as a whole it is unjust and inexpedient.

Every gentleman on this floor, who understands the policy and the practical effect of rail roads, upon the growth and prosperity of a State—who has well calculated the immense advantages accruing from rendering increased facilities for the farmer and the manufacturer to transport their products to market, and from the development of the vast hidden resources of the State, resulting from the construction of plank roads and railroads, knows how important it is that no unjust and unnecessary restrictions should be placed upon the enterprising spirit of the people. They know that, in a great number of instances, these roads enhance the value of wet and swampy lands, and of lands remote from a market town, far beyond any supposed damages accruing to those lands from the building of the road over them. In a great majority of cases, lands which were worthless and unsaleable, have been brought into market, improved and made valuable, which, but for the construction of these roads, might have lain wild and uncultivated for a half a century to come.

Then it is proposed, that a man, whose land has been enhanced five-fold in value, by the construction of a work of public improvement, shall be paid for the half-acre or five acres of his land taken for the use of this work, in money, and without any regard to the immense benefit conferred upon him by the taking of that land. Mr. President, this is not right. It is an invitation to leech the State Treasury—it is a premium upon avarice. It is pursuing a policy towards the State which never will be, because it never can be, pursued toward an individual.

But I am in favor of providing that every man shall be compensated for any damages he may sustain by the construction of a road or other public work over his land, or for the conversion of any of his property to the public use. But I mean to use the word compensated in its literal and proper signification. If, after a railroad is built over a part of a man's land, and his land is worth one hundred dollars less than before that road was laid out, then I would pay him in money, and promptly, the one hundred dollars. But if he owned eighty acres of land, which, before the road was built, he could get but ten dollars an acre for, and if, for the purposes of the road, ten acres are taken; and if he can then sell the remaining seventy acres for twenty dollars an acre, in consequence of its nearness to that road, I do not believe the law should require a jury, in assessing the amount of his damages, to take no account of the benefits that have accrued to him. I wish to be distinctly understood, however, that I am in favor of providing that no citizen shall have his property taken for public use, without just compensation, but whether that compensation is to be made before, at the time, or after the property is taken, is a matter to be left for the Legislature to determine. I do not wish to legislate upon it here. But, I wish to inquire, why this prejudice against railroads? It is not a system of internal improvements, carried on by the State, that we advocate; it is the enterprise of liberal citizens of the State in building these magnificent works, that we wish to encourage and protect.

I ask every gentleman who may have had an interest in railroads, if the dividends upon the stock is not a secondary consideration? The great object is the enhancement of the value of individual property all along the line of the road, and for miles back from the line on either side, and in this way the aggregate prosperity is vastly augmented. Take, for example, the great railroad south from this city, to the Ohio river, at Jeffersonville. I cannot be accused of being influenced in this matter, by being interested in the construction of that work, for the right of way has been given all along the line. On the contrary, I wish to extend those just facilities liberally all over the State. The railroad from this city to Jeffersonville runs through a great extent of low and swampy land, which otherwise would have lain unproductive for another generation. Not less than fifty thousand acres of this swamp land will be brought into market and made valuable and productive, solely on account of lying on and within a few miles of this road. The State Treasury has been, and will continue to be, enriched to a vast amount, and all because individual enterprise has associated together for the purpose of constructing this great work of public improvement. Then, I say, we should, above all things, avoid hindering or obstructing this spirit.

I would here draw a marked distinction between the policy of building these railroads and plank roads by the State, and by private individuals. I desire never to see the State undertake to build another road or canal; the principle is all wrong; the disastrous results following it in this and other States, have proved how pernicious is the principle. But, on the other hand, I desire to encourage, by every just means, the construction of great works of public improvement by individual enterprise. This is the true policy of the State. Encourage it and we shall be a prosperous people; our waste and unsaleable lands will become productive, and swell the revenues of the State, and we shall advance to that station and position among the great States of the Union, to which we are destined. But you fetter and obstruct this individual enterprise, discourage the construction of railroads and plank roads, by rendering it difficult, if not impossible, to obtain the right of way at a fair compensation, and the State, if she does not retrograde, will not advance in her career of prosperity; she will stand still; we shall still plod on over the mud roads and the corduroy roads of the country, while the internal improvements of other States, the greater facilities of communication, and transportation of produce, fostered by a wiser policy, will attract the emigration and settlement of the intelligent, the enterprising, and the wealthy, and our noble and fertile State will be left far behind, lagging in the rear of the high civilization and progress of the age.

But how does the amendment of the gentleman (Mr. Berry) act; what will be its effect? He proposes that when locating a road through a low and swampy tract of land, that the owners of such previously worthless land shall be enriched by compensation for so much of that land as shall be taken for the road, without any regard being had to the enhanced value of the adjoining property. No matter, is the virtual language of the amendment, no matter, though the owners of land along the route of a public improvement are made rich by the location of it over their ground, they must be compensated in money for all the land taken, without reference to the great compensation made him by that company in the enhanced value and productiveness of adjoining property.

The whole community is benefited by the construction of railroads and plank roads when done by private enterprise, and it is the duty of the representatives of the people, whether assembled in a legislative or a conventional capacity, to foster and encourage this enterprising spirit by all just and legitimate means. But the effect of the amendment now pending is, as I have said, to foster avarice. A man's land by being crossed by a railroad is enhanced in value ten or twenty per cent. Under other circumstances he could have been induced—nay more, he would have been willing to pay for this improvement; but now he sees that in addition to this enhanced value of his land, he can demand and enforce the collection of one hundred or perhaps five hundred dollars for the damage! done to that portion of his land taken for the line of the road. His next neighbor, who would also have been willing to pay the company liberally rather than not have the road come near or cross his farm, sees what his neighbor has done, and concludes that he may as well secure an additional hundred dollars also—and so every one is prepared to take advantage of the legal provisions upon the subject; provisions founded upon a mistaken fear that companies formed for the construction of works of internal improvements are naturally inimical to the rights of individuals.

We should carefully distinguish between the old system of internal improvements by the State, and the one now starting into life, the system of public improvement by private enterprise. And I believe that the effect of making this distinction will be to create a more liberal feeling towards the latter. We have seen the State plunging into a mammoth, I might say an infernal, system of internal improvements; we have seen her brought to the edge of the gulf of ruin: true there are now a few streaks of light in the horizon arising from the growing spirit of individual enterprise, but the State is still staggering under a load of debt and embarrassment. No one doubts that in the old system, which is parent to our enormous State debt, there were the most profligate expenditures of the public money. But now the people of the State are embarking in the construction of a network of public improvements, railroads and plank roads, on a far more magnificent scale than was ever projected by the State; they are embarking in the system of constructing by companies of private individuals.

And now there is danger that the reaction from the old system of internal improvements by the State, will be so great that, instead of drawing directly from the State Treasury for the construction of a railroad, we shall absolutely throw obstructions and create difficulties in the way of private enterprise proposing to build railroads unaided by the State! Let us guard against the tendency to extremes; let us, by all legitimate means, foster and encourage private enterprise. Let not the representatives of the people, assembled in Convention, thwart the wishes and enterprise of the people. Whatever special legislation is to be done on the subject, let the Legislature do, year by year as the representatives come up fresh from the people, instructed in their wishes and desires.

If this amendment (Mr. Berry's) be adopted, it will, I repeat, be injurious to the interests of the State, because the dividends declared to stockholders are but an inconsiderable part of the profits and good arising from the construction of plank roads and railroads. They develop the resources of the State, increase the facilities of communication and commerce, and put a value upon millions of acres of land which otherwise had lain unimproved and comparatively valueless—add to all this, the revenues of the State are greatly increased by the additional amount of taxable and productive property. Every gentleman at all conversant with the practical bearings of the subject knows that fact.

But, sir, I call attention to the fact that it is not thus with other incorporations. It is not so with banking incorporations and insurance companies. The principal benefit arising from these is to the stockholders, in the shape of annual and semi-annual dividends. The prevalence of banks does not enhance the value of land; they do not open up and develop the resources of new and unimproved sections of the country; the low and swampy lands of the State are not brought into market and rendered productive by the establishment of one or a dozen insurance offices; the people have no greater facilities of communication; commerce has no new channels in which to flow and prosper. No, sir; on the contrary, the benefits arising from this class of incorporations, are almost exclusively confined to the profits and dividends realized by the stockholders.

For proof of this position, you have only to observe the difference between the subscriptions to the stock of railroads and plank roads on the one hand, and banks, insurance companies, &c., on the other. The stock of the latter is always eagerly taken up by capitalists; and there is rarely any opportunity offered for public subscription. But does not every gentleman know the difficulty there is in procuring subscriptions to railroad and plank road stock? To secure sufficient subscription to such stock, it is always necessary to spend much time among the people, explaining the results of such improvements, and convincing them of the direct and indirect benefits certain to result to them from the construction of these great arteries of commerce and social communication through the country.

With these views, Mr. President, and for these reasons, I shall go against the amendment of the gentleman near me (Mr. Berry). That it may be made more clear what the pending question is, I will state it as I understand it:

The pending question is upon an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Laporte, (Mr. Niles,) providing that in lieu of the latter amendment, that "private property shall not be taken by law against the consent of the owner for any other purposes than the defense of the State, and the right of way for public improvements; and when taken for these purposes, it shall be paid for in money, irrespective of extrinsic benefits, in such manner as shall be directed by the General Assembly."

Now, sir, it is to the words, "it shall be paid for in money, irrespective of extrinsic benefits," to which I particularly object, and against the adoption of which, into the organic law of the State, I most solemnly protest. I will give no consent of mine to any such provision, the practical effect of which will inevitably be to destroy the spirit of individual enterprise, and to arrest the construction of those noble lines of railway and plank roads, which are now stretching in every direction over our broad and fertile State.

In conclusion, I will remark, lest I be misapprehended, that I am in favor of compensating every individual for any damages he may sustain in the conversion of his property to the public use. I am, however, unwilling that we should declare in this Constitution, that he should thus be compensated without any reference to the real benefits conferred upon his property by those works of public improvement.

I trust that the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. RITCHEY. I agree with the gentleman last on the floor, that so many propositions have been made, so many motions to amend, that it is difficult to understand our relative positions at this stage of the debate. So many of those propositions, upon the merits of which members had expressed their views, have been voted down, that it becomes necessary for gentlemen again to state their positions, and how they stand with regard to the pending question. I can hardly bring myself to a thorough comprehension of our present latitude and longitude.

But, sir, for the very reasons for which the gentleman from Clarke (Mr. Read) said he should go against the amendment of the gentleman from Franklin, (Mr. Berry,) I am in favor of it, and shall vote for its adoption in preference to any proposition yet offered upon this floor.

It will be remembered, that on yesterday we voted down the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Bright,) declaring that damages assessed by a jury for private property converted to public use, should be paid in money, irrespective of extrinsic advantages; that is, without taking into consideration the benefits conferred upon other property of the same owner, by reason of the construction of the public work near it. I regretted the disposition which the Convention saw fit to make of that proposition. I believe it was a wise and necessary one.

The gentleman from Clark says, that in many instances railroads and plank roads are constructed through unproductive lands, lands lying remote from a market, and low and swampy ground, which, before the construction of these roads, were valueless and unsaleable, are brought into market, and become productive and valuable lands, from their contiguity to these works. He would have the owners of these lands paid for so much of their land as is taken for the construction of the road, in whole or in part, in the benefits conferred upon their adjoining property. He considers that if a man has one hundred acres of land, and ten of it is taken for the construction of a railroad or a plank road, that the owner should consider himself compensated for the loss of the ten acres by the enhanced value of the remaining ninety. Why, sir, why not carry this principle out to its practical and legitimate application, and tax the owners of land over which these roads pass, for the benefits thereby conferred upon their property? If the gentleman's doctrine is sound, if this position is tenable, those individuals should pay these incorporated companies, or the State, as the case may be, for the benefits accruing from the construction of public works over or near their property? If the building of a railroad within five miles of a man's farm, enhances its market value one thousand dollars, why not, if the gentleman's position is a correct one, tax that man at least five hundred dollars?

Let me tell you, sir, some of the effects of the law of 1836. I will relate a case which, so far as it goes, will illustrate the fallacy of the principle, that damages for property actually taken for public use, may be set off by benefits resulting to other property of the same individual from the construction of public works.

On this Central Canal [a laugh] which runs, or was to have run south from this city to the Ohio river, a few miles from this place is the farm of Col. Wisherd, a gentleman well known to old residents of the State, and to many members of this Convention. The farm consists of a tract of some one hundred and sixty acres of land, and one of the most valuable tracts, both for location and fertility, in the State. I do not know of a more desirable quarter section in the country. This canal was located through the farm, cutting it diagonally in two equal halves. It became necessary to construct a lock upon the place and the work was commenced, and preparations made for that purpose. But, as is well known, the construction of the canal was suddenly stopped, and has never been recommenced, and in all human probability never will be. Now look at the position of that once beautiful estate. A deep cut is made in the centre of the farm, and huge heaps of stone cover the ground all around. There is the great ditch, and there are the heaps of stone, and there they will remain, for it would take no inconsiderable sum of money to fill up the one and remove the other. When the land was condemned for public use, the jury that was empanelled to assess the damages to Col. Wisherd, from the digging of the canal through his farm, awarded that the enhanced value of his adjoining land, resulting from its lying upon the line of so important a work, compensated for the damage done! This was under the provisions of the old Constitution. Where is that great canal now! Just where it was then—on paper. Where are the benefits and the enhanced value of his adjoining land which was to abundantly compensate him for the great damage done to his farm? Just where all such accruing advantages and benefits always are—in the imagination. In this case, when Col. Wisherd applied to the courts of the State for redress, under the construction of the provision in the old Constitution and the instructions of the judge, the jury brought in a verdict of "no damages," accompanied with the observation, that if the law allowed it, they would have taxed him five hundred dollars for the benefits which he would receive from the location of the canal! There lies the farm, for many purposes ruined, and there is the big and unsightly, if not unhealthy, ditch, a perpetual nuisance. He is forever debarred from receiving damages, and has no alternative but to submit to this instance of great public injustice.

And, sir, such cases will occur again, unless we adopt a different provision in the new Constitution. It is not so much that the State is like to encroach upon the rights of the citizen or that the agents of the State are disposed to trample upon private rights; it is that the system, the principle, declared in the organic law in this particular, is wrong.

Since the amendment of the gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Bright) was rejected I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Franklin (Mr. Berry) will be adopted. I do not know, however, that we are prepared to vote understandingly upon the pending question. There have been so many amendments offered and several having been voted down it is not easy to see the precise shape in which the original section would be left if this amendment were adopted. But I hope that the gentleman's (Mr. Berry's) suggestion will be heeded and the principle of his proposition adopted and engrafted in the new Constitution. Let us provide that when private property is taken for public use the damages assessed shall be paid in money and without deduction or abatement on account of any benefits supposed to be conferred on the owner by the construction of the work. This will be just to the public and just to the individual citizen. On account of the confusion in which we now are, from the action of the Convention upon so many amendments, I will move to refer the original section together with the pending amendments to a select committee, who, having heard this full and general debate, will be prepared to report a section upon which a large majority of this body can unite.

Mr. RARIDEN. Mr. President, I can see no necessity for that reference. It will only serve to take up time, without any good result- ing to compensate therefor.

I began yesterday to make a few remarks which I deemed pertinent to a motion then made to refer, but being thought out of order at the time, did not conclude them.

I began to say, sir, that there are but two debateable questions with regard to this subject; there are but two points of difference among members; and whenever those two points are settled, members will be prepared to adopt a section upon this subject.

The first question is that raised by this question, in whatever form it may be presented to the Convention: Shall a corporation that wishes to possess itself of the property of an individual for public use, be allowed to take possession of that property until the damages are first assessed by a jury, and the amount paid or tendered in money? That is one question.

The other question is this: Shall those persons who are appointed to assess the damages done to private property by the taking of any part thereof, take into consideration the benefits which they may estimate as accruing to the owner of the property by reason of the construction of the railroad or other public work, so that the damages he shall be entitled to claim may be awarded minus the value of the benefits estimated to accrue?

These, Mr. President, are the only questions now dividing the Convention; and when they are settled—as I think they can be very soon—there will be no controversy with regard to this section of the report of the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of the State.

I hope the question will be put directly, as the gentleman from Jefferson put it: "Shall these corporations be arrested and restrained from progressing with their works until damages to private property are ascertained and paid or tendered in money?" That is the first question; and then I hope to see the next put directly: In ascertaining damages to private property, shall the jury take into consideration the benefits conferred upon other property of the same owner, and award the damages minus the value of the estimated benefits?

Now, I want to see these questions decided without the unnecessary delay of a reference of the section to a select committee. Can we not get at the opinion of this body without a reference?

Mr. BADGER. Before the question is taken I wish to say a few words.

I desire to see the section, as it would read amended by the gentleman from Laporte, (Mr. Niles,) adopted by the Convention. I desire this for several reasons, a few of which I will very briefly give.

And first, sir, that amendment (Mr. Niles') is very nearly in the language of the old Constitution.

Secondly, it embodies the sentiments which I hold in regard to the subject, and I consider it to be the doctrine upon this subject that will be held by the people of the State.

I appeal to Delegates for an answer to one question: are we here to legislate in the abstract, or are we here to revise and amend the organic law? For which purpose are we assembled in this Convention? Every gentleman can answer this without reflection. Then, sir, shall we legislate; shall we engraft in the new Constitution provisions which come strictly within the scope and sphere of the legislative department? Is this our business? Unhesitatingly we answer, no!

Mr. President, in looking over the corresponding section in the old Constitution there is one word which attracts my attention; one word to which, in this connection, I am particularly attached. It is this:

"No man's particular services shall be required."

I suggest to the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles) the propriety of taking that word and inserting it in his amendment, so that the section as amended would read,

"No man's particular services shall be required, &c."

I do this by way of compromise between the two parties on this question.

With regard to the other branch of the section providing that,

"No man's property shall be taken by law without just compensation first assessed by a jury of free-holders and tendered, together with the cost of the proceeding, to the owner, by the person to be benefited. Provided, that such tender, if rejected, shall not bar the right of appeal."

I ask gentlemen if, in view of the internal improvements that are growing up all over the State, based upon the sure foundations of individual enterprise and the commercial wants and resources of the State, they desire to clog the wheels of this mighty engine of prosperity and high civilization? Are gentlemen disposed to discourage the commencement and arrest the progress of these noble lines of communication which constitute the arterial system of our political body, by such restrictive provisions as are here proposed? Will they do it? This is the question, plain but direct. If not, let the question be taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Laporte, without further delay, and let us adopt it as the best proposition elicited in the course of this debate. Leave it all to future legislatures to declare when, how much, and in what manner, damages for private property required for public use shall be assessed and paid to individuals. It certainly is not within our province that we should do it; we are not here to legislate in detail, but to revise and amend the fundamental law of the State. And the more brief and concise we can make it, the better, and the more readily will it be received and approved by the people.

Mr. President, this is the first time I have undertaken to address the Convention, except one speech of about the length of your finger, and then they stole my thunder, and credited the account to Judge Borden. [Great laughter.]

But now that I am upon the floor, one or two remarks and no more.

The gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) remarked, very justly, that the question before us is this: "Shall this Convention declare that damages assessed for private property taken for public use, shall be collected and paid over to the individual prior to the release of the right of way, or subsequently?" This is the turning point.

My own impression is, that, when gentlemen look at the onward progress of internal improvements constructed by private enterprise, they will not consent that this progress, so healthful and so full of the brightest promise of future prosperity and power, shall be checked by such obstacles and discouragements as long law suits for the right of way and all that, before the enterprise of the community can march apace. Gentlemen may boast of feelings callous and unaffected by the infant struggles of this giant of improvement yet in its cradle; they may appear indifferent to the multiplication of railroads and plank roads, but in reflective moments all will agree upon their great utility, and upon the policy of encouraging and fostering the system. And I think that all will concede that to future legislatures should be left the power to decide the details as to the manner of assessing damages, and the time of their payment.

I trust that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Laporte, will be adopted as it came from his hands, and that all other amendments, hail from whence they may, will be voted down.

Mr. NILES. One word to the Convention in reference to the suggestion of the gentleman from Putnam. I used the word partly because it was in the old Constitution, but mainly because it seemed to be a word fit to distinguish between the services which a man should be paid for—such as serving as a road supervisor, or a juror—and those general services which all good citizens are expected gratuitously to render—as, for example, assisting in the suppression of a riot, or the prevention of the commission of any crime. In other words, the general duty of aiding to preserve good order in society.

Mr. EDMONSTON inquired whether it would be in order to offer an amendment.

The question was then taken on the proposition to re-commit the section and the pending amendments to a select committee, and it was rejected.

The CHAIR stated the question now to be on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Franklin.

Mr. WATTS. I do not understand that there is any motion to strike out.

The PRESIDENT. Yes, sir, there is such a motion.

Mr. WATTS. Then I take back my understanding. [A laugh.]

The PRESIDENT. The motion is to strike out the word "personal," and insert the word "particular."

Mr. BASCOM wished that such a provision should be made as to prevent a man from being placed under obligations to perform public duties week after week without being fairly remunerated. The performance of these duties, in many cases, bore very heavily upon poor men, and it was right that they should be properly rewarded. If the proposition was to change the word into "personal," he was in favor of it.

Mr. KINDLEY said, he had objections to the report of the committee, as well as to the amendments which had been offered. It was the duty of the Convention to frame organic laws. Now it would be admitted on all hands that it was exceedingly difficult to frame a law—even if gentlemen always had that one object in view—the "greatest good to the greatest number"—that would not in some cases produce evil, or operate in such a way as, under peculiar circumstances, to bring about an actual injury. Such a law man could not make, because of the imperfection of human nature. Even the laws of nature, so far as we understood them, were not always uniform. The river, which usually passed within given bounds in its progress to the ocean, would sometimes overflow its banks and do great damage to property. It was the duty, then, of the Convention, to provide for the enactment of such laws as would secure the greatest possible good to the greatest number, and when they did this, they would make proper provision for the remuneration of every man who was called upon to perform public duties. The present age was an age of enterprise, and if the progressive spirit of the people was to be checked by any Constitutional enactment, it would be better for the interests of the people of the State that they should not have met in that Convention. These internal improvements by means of railroads were, if he might use such a figure, the very arteries of the country, and it was as essential that they should be sustained, as that the blood should circulate through the veins so as to sustain animal life. He should therefore move that the section be so amended as to make it read that "no man's property should be taken without just compensation."

The question being taken on a division, as to striking out the word "personal" and inserting:

the word "particular," it was agreed to—ayes 71, noes 20.

The PRESIDENT stated the question now to be on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Franklin.

Mr. HOLMAN moved the following amendment to the original section—

To strike out the words "by a jury of freeholders" in the third section, and also the words "together with the expenses of the proceeding."

The section as proposed thus to be amended was read.

Mr. OWEN moved to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn. In one particular he believed it was very good, but it left out some minor details. There was one objection that he had made to the section as it stood, and which he believed to be available, and that was that although this was a good provision, it might, in some cases, operate disadvantageously. He proposed to alter the amendment so as to make it read:

"No man's particular services shall be demanded without just compensation; and no man's property shall be taken without just compensation, nor, except in case of the State, without such compensation being first tendered to the owner."

Mr. HALL moved to re-commit the article to the committee which reported it, with the view of incorporating the amendment of the gentleman from Owen.

Mr. READ was of opinion that if this matter were again referred the Convention would have to travel over the same ground over which they had already been traveling. He was decidedly opposed to a re-committal, and he hoped the Convention would not agree to it.

The question was then taken on the motion to re-commit, and it was rejected.

Mr. DUNN wished if possible to bring the House to a direct vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Laporte. He believed that the State had no right to take any man's property for any other use than that of the public. She cannot give to a corporation the power to take private property for the private benefit of the corporation, and when the State delegates to a corporation the power to take private property for the benefit of the public, it is the State and not the corporation that takes the property. He could not, therefore, see the propriety of the distinction contained in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen).

He would, therefore, move to lay the amendment on the table.

The motion was withdrawn at the request of Mr. WALPOLE.

Mr. BRIGHT. I would like to inquire as to what restrictions the gentleman from Hancock refers to.

Mr. WALPOLE. I refer to the restriction sought to be imposed upon us, that in condemning property, the increase of the value of the property on account of the improvement, shall not be taken into consideration; that the assessed value of the property, without this consideration, shall be first paid in money.

Mr. BRIGHT. This is a subject which received my early and attentive consideration; it is a matter upon which, I may be allowed to say, I have bestowed a great deal of thought and careful examination before I came to this Convention, and without reference to my action and votes here, I carefully and fully investigated the subject in justice to a client, who had retained me to obtain compensation for damages sustained in the taking of his property for the construction of that very railroad in which the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) and others think I am so much interested. Although I was perfectly satisfied with the language of the provision of the old Constitution as it is; still, under the false construction of the language by the courts at that time, justice, in my opinion, was not done to the individual whose property was taken for the construction of the road. As I remarked on yesterday when I had the floor, the old construction of the Constitution has been reviewed, and with the present construction, as held by the courts, I am entirely satisfied, it restores that provision (relative to the right of way for public improvements) of the Constitution to the interpretation intended by its framers. It was to make that construction of the Constitution in this regard certain that I proposed my amendment. Let me say, Mr. President, that, personally, I have very little interest in the Madison and Indianapolis Railroad.

Mr. WALPOLE. It was to the gentleman's interest as a representative that I alluded.

Mr. BRIGHT. Mr. President. I have no interests to represent upon this floor which will conflict with the rights and interests of the State at large. I do not consider myself as holding a seat in this Convention for the purpose of exclusively representing Jefferson county. I am here to represent and support the interests of the whole people of Indiana—not the interests of a section as opposed to the general welfare. I am not the representative of a local or personal interest; I come up here to aid in the formation of a Constitution, which shall be, as I trust, the beneficent organic law for this generation of the people of the State, and for the generation to come, as well as for myself and my children. I am a constituent part of the people—an unit in the great aggregate—and I cannot, if I would, separate my interests or the interests of my immediate constituents from the interests of the people of the State. We are all interested together and alike in the formation of a good Constitution; we shall all be benefited by its wise provisions, or injured by its bad ones.

I advocated the proposition contained in my amendment offered on the day before yesterday, because I believe it to be correct in principle, and because I am convinced that it can be demonstrated to the satisfaction of all reasonable men—men whose minds are open to conviction—that it is correct in theory, and just to all parties in its practical operation. What is it? It is that when private property shall be taken for public purposes, the owner shall be compensated in money for its assessed value, irrespective of any extrinsic benefits supposed to be conferred upon adjoining property. That is the substance, though not the exact language of my amendment. And, sir, I contend that that is the meaning and intent of the corresponding provision in the old Constitution, though for a long time a different construction was given to it by the courts—a construction which has recently been reviewed and discarded. If gentlemen will take the trouble to read the section of the old Constitution, without any reference to the construction that has been put upon it, they will certainly come to the conclusion that it is intended to provide that individuals, whose property has been taken for public use, shall be compensated therefor without reference to benefits supposed to be conferred upon them by the construction of the public work. It was never intended by the framers that extrinsic and imaginary benefits should be thrown into the scale in adjusting the balance due to the owner of property taken for public use. When the language is that he shall be compensated, every man would understand that he was to be paid the market value of his property, and that he should be paid no more and no less.

But in 1836, the Legislature provided by law that where private property was taken for public use, instead of being paid for that property in money at its market value, he should be compensated for the property of which he was deprived by the enhanced value of his adjoining property. If he owned, by chance, only the property of which he was deprived, then he was, according to the law of 1836, to be paid its real value in money; but, sir, if he had the fortune, or to speak more accurately, the misfortune, to own a piece of adjoining land, then the jury, in estimating the damages done by taking a part of his property, were required to take into consideration the benefits supposed to be conferred upon the adjoining property by the construction of the public work; and, as the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) states the question, award the damages minus the supposed value of the benefits. Such a law is unequal and unjust in its operation. It is unjust in its operation because it compels the individual who may be the owner of property adjoining the line of a public improvement to defray more than his just proportion of the burthens of government. If two individuals, respectively, own property adjoining the line of a railroad, and a part of the land belonging to one is taken for the construction of the road, but, by requiring a jury in assessing the damages to take into consideration the benefits supposed to be conferred upon him, the individual whose property is taken loses the general benefits the road might confer upon him, because they are made an offset to the value of the property actually taken from him. On the other hand, his neighbor, whose property lies on the line of the road, but none of which was taken for its construction, reaps all the general advantages resulting from the nearness of his property to the road, without sustaining the loss of a dollar in damages. Therefore, I say that the principle of the law of 1836 was an unjust one, and its practical operation unjust.

On the other hand, if you adopt the provision contained in the proposition which I had the honor to submit, and compensate the owner of property taken for public use, without reference to what other property he owns, you do no injustice to any one, but secure an equalization of the benefits of public improvements.

Every work of this kind is for the benefit of the people, and the prosperity of the State. Why, then, benefit all the people of the State, by the construction of a work of public improvement, except the man over a part of whose property the work is built? In this view of the case, the law is manifestly a bad one.

Mr. President, the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) tells us that the existing corporations of the State have been benefited by the law of 1836, and by the construction given to the provision of the old Constitution, and that it is but just that the new companies springing into existence over all the State, for the purpose of building railroads and plank roads, should have the same facilities secured to them for obtaining the right of way. But, sir, if the practice in this regard has heretofore been wrong and unjust, it is no good reason why it should be continued in the future. We should not persist in a wrong because companies hereafter to be formed, cannot, if compelled to act upon just and equitable principles, obtain the right of way and construct their roads as cheaply as the roads already in operation. We must provide a remedy for an ascertained wrong. If it is desirable that roads and other works of internal improvement should be undertaken and prosecuted,—it is equally desirable to protect the rights of the citizen, and justly to remunerate a man whose real estate has been taken from him for the construction of these works. Not remunerate him for real and productive property, in imaginary and illusory benefits, supposed to be conferred upon other property, which he may have the misfortune to possess.

Why, Mr. President, under the operation of the law of 1836, where individuals were deprived of their property, and paid in imaginary benefits, injuries to the amount of hundreds and thousands of dollars, were inflicted upon citizens. The incident mentioned by my friend from Johnston, is a strong one, and applicable to the point in discussion. In that case a quarter section of valuable and beautiful land was destroyed, and the owner paid, not even in the benefits accruing to his property, but in the benefits which it was supposed would be conferred on the remainder of his property from its lying upon the line of the great Central Canal! And yet, that canal is not completed to this day, nor will it ever be. Is not this a case of gross injustice done by the State to a private individual, and a case for which he has no redress? Now, sir, if in that instance the State had paid the owner of the property damaged by the cutting through of a canal, and the construction of a lock on his premises, in money and without regard to his other property, justice would have been done.

The adoption of this resolution will not prevent or discourage the formation of companies for the construction of works of public improvement. I contend that the association of individuals into stock companies for the purpose of building railroads and plank roads, is based upon a vastly more substantial basis than the opportunity of securing the right of way without justly compensating individuals for property taken. The spirit of the age in which we live, and the demands of commerce for new channels and greater facilities, is what incites private enterprise to the construction of these noble lines of railway that are radiating in every direction from the centres of commerce and population, and binding all portions of our great State together in iron bands. Then, sir, these works will go on, notwithstanding any securities and guards we may throw around the rights of citizens. Where there is a demand for a plank road or a railroad, the right of way will be obtained, the timber, stone, and all materials furnished, the road will be opened up through forests and swamps, and, before the community are fairly satisfied of its serious contemplation, the iron horse will be thundering past their dwellings. No, sir, believe not the doctrine that the spirit of internal improvements, based upon private enterprise, is so fickle in its character—so weak and unsubstantial in its basis, that it will not progress unless it can secure to itself the right of taking private property, without a just compensation.

Mr. President, in conclusion, let me say that I trust this Convention will adopt the provision. I am not particular in what form, that the owner of private property, taken for public purposes, shall be paid therefor in money, and irrespective of supposed benefits to be conferred upon any other property he may own. It is true that in the State vests the right of eminent domain, and she has the abstract right to take private property without making any compensation, and she has the power to delegate this right of eminent domain to incorporated companies, but we desire to limit and restrict the exercise of this power by the State.

I should be glad to see the amendment which I offered, adopted, but I am chiefly desirous that its principle, in any form, shall be engrafted in the new Constitution.

I am laboring, sir, under a severe head-ache, and feel unable to present my views in proper form. I will leave the further discussion of the subject to other gentlemen.

Mr. OWEN. I have nothing to say with reference to the amendment spoken of by the gentleman who has just taken his seat, for that is not before us. I propose to make a single remark with reference to what has been said by the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Dunn,) on one clause of the amendment now under consideration.

There is no State in the Union, if we except Massachusetts, that have engaged more extensively in works of public improvement, than the State of New York; and I find this distinction taken between property taken for public use by the State, and property taken by individuals and corporations for the same purpose, in the New York Constitution. The words are:

"When private property shall be taken for any public use, the compensation to be made therefor, when such compensation is not made by the State, shall be ascertained by a jury," and so on.

Where property is taken for State purposes, it cannot be so imperative that there should be a jury trial. I think the distinction referred to a very convenient and proper one. But where the matter lies between an individual and a corporation, then the corporation should be required to pay first, and take afterwards. I am willing, so far as the State is concerned, that it should take first; but I am not willing that the individual should be compelled to sell to corporations upon their own terms; or else, after losing his property, to wait for payment until they see fit to make it.

Mr. CRUMBACKER. There has been so many amendments applied to this proposition, that I confess myself to be lost. If it is in order, therefore, I will call for the reading of the proposition of the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles).

The PRESIDENT. Under the existing state of the case, it is not strictly in order to read that proposition, but, by unanimous consent, the Secretary will read. [Cries of "read," "read."]

"The proposition of Mr. Niles having been read by the Secretary—

Mr. SHOUP said: Mr. President, would it now be in order to move to refer this subject to the appropriate committee, with instructions?

The PRESIDENT. A motion to refer would be in order, either with or without instructions.

Mr. SHOUP. There seems to be quite a difference of opinion in regard to this matter; and it is my purpose to accommodate the views of all. I think, for this purpose, that it is best to unite upon some general propositions, as far as we can. I propose to refer the subject again to the committee on rights and privileges, with the following instructions:

"The committee on 'the rights and privileges' are instructed to report the following section as a part of the amended Constitution:

"No man's personal services, or real property, shall be demanded for public use, without just compensation. No man's personal property shall be taken without his consent."

This motion having been entertained by the Chair—

Mr. S. said: We all know that the rights of persons and property should be held sacred; but when the public good requires that a man's services should be had, the State has a right to command those services, paying him a just compensation therefor. We are also willing that real property should be taken from the individual when the public good demands it for the construction of canals, railroads, plank roads, &c. It is right that the Legislature should have power to do this, for this reason: we take the case of a person living in the interior of the State, remote from market. It is desirable and right that such a man should have a market for his surplus produce. It is clear, then, that unless the Legislature have this right to confer the power of condemning private property for public use, even a single obstinate individual might prevent the construction of a road, which might open a market for the surplus produce of the interior. We all agree, therefore, that this right should be preserved. But I believe there should be a distinction made between the right to personal property and the right to real property. A man may have personal property, which it is his peculiar right to hold. I would not place the individual who has personal property upon the same footing with the owner of real property, which the corporation might approach, demand, and condemn, and which, in most cases, can be had upon paying a fair compensation to the owner; for if one man should not be willing to give the right of way to a road company upon fair terms, his neighbor, who lives by the side of him, might; and so competition would generally regulate the price.

With reference to this matter of assessing the compensation, I think it should remain in the hands of the Legislature. We all agree to the principle that property should not be taken without a just compensation: and this, as I think, would be going far enough for a Constitutional provision. I have no fear about trusting the details of this matter with the people.

But gentlemen differ. Some are anxious that the benefits arising from the improvement, should not be taken into consideration along with the assessment of damages, because, as the gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Bright) says, it would operate unequally; that it would be unequal to tax him for a public benefit, while his neighbor, along side of him, contributes nothing, and is equally as much benefited by the improvement as himself. Sir, I hold that where no damage has been sustained, there is nothing due. If a road was to be constructed over two farms adjoining each other, and five acres were to be taken from each; and if the work should be found to benefit the owner of one of these farms to the amount of five hundred dollars, and the other to the amount of six hundred dollars, I hold that the former has no right to complain because he is not so much benefited as his neighbor.

I cannot see, sir, why gentlemen should be unwilling that the adjustment of all these matters should be left to a fair jury trial. It seems to me, certainly, that every man ought to be willing to submit such a case to the decision of a jury of his peers.

But again: with respect to the consideration that one man is taxed for the construction of a public work, and his neighbor is not, I ask if a man has land lying in a state of nature—not worth more than three or four dollars an acre—if a railroad should pass through that land, enhancing its value to ten dollars an acre, has the owner of that land received any damage? He certainly has not; but, on the contrary, he has been benefited by a large increase in the value of his land, and the value of his produce is proportionably increased; and therefore it is, that I think it is eminently right and proper that the jury of assessment should consider this whole matter when they come to administer justice to these parties. I am willing to bring all incorporated bodies to a strict accountability and responsibility, and I would give them no undue advantages. But these public works contribute to the general good, and to encourage them is to encourage a public benefit. We should not break them down, but rather support them; for so long as they do no damage, there is no cause of complaint. If we add to the value of the property of the citizen, we certainly do no harm; and so long as we do no harm, no man has any right to complain. When a man says, you have not benefited me as much as my neighbor, who does not perceive that this arises from a feeling of envy, which ought not to be countenanced anywhere?

I hope, Mr. President, that we shall be able to unite upon some general principle with reference to this matter; for, certainly, we should not go into the details of legislation here. I hope we shall determine to incorporate only general principles into the Constitution, and leave it for the people to carry out the details. It is with this feeling, and these views, that I have made my motion to re-commit, with instructions.

Mr. RARIDEN. I desire to consider the doctrine, or the theory, advanced by the gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Bright).

I am opposed to re-commitment. Upon this branch of the motion, I can only say what I said this morning: that there are two debatable questions involved here, which have to be decided on this floor, and a re-commitment to the committee would not in the least abridge our labor or concentrate the action of the Convention. We had much better come to our decision now, while we have the question presented in a tangible shape, in the proposition of the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles).

But I want to look at the theory of the gentleman from Jefferson. He affirms that the old Constitution is right upon this subject, but that the law carrying out the Constitutional principle and the decisions of the courts thereon, are all wrong, and that the wrong consists in the inconsistency of the laws and decisions with the Constitutional provision. This is exactly the question which I am going to discuss. I understand the gentleman to affirm that it was never intended, by the old Constitutional provision, that the consequent benefits of a work of public improvement should be taken into consideration by a jury empanelled for the assessment of damages; and I understand him to say, further, that all our judicial tribunals have committed an error in their decisions upon this matter. Well, now, I maintain that the Constitution and Legislature, and the decisions of the courts, are all right—that they are all right, together, upon this subject; and that they are perfectly consistent with the uniform principles of equity and justice which generally characterize the administration of the laws in this country.

I proceed upon the assumption, that whenever the State sees proper, in the construction of any public work, to use or to take property from an individual and deprive him of its use, or dispossess him entirely, that when the individual calls for an indemnity for his loss, the jury of assessment should consider the amount of benefit which the individual will derive from the public work, and deduct such benefit from his positive damages. The gentleman says this is wrong and inequitable; and here I meet him and say, that this is all just, and right, and proper. I go further, and say, that without any such legislation, the decisions of the courts would be identically the same; because the law itself is based upon the general principles of equity, and the decisions are only made to conform to those principles.

Let us examine the case. Here an individual complains that a railroad or a canal, passing through his ground, has injured his property; he makes the issue, and says, "I have suffered in my property to the amount of one thousand dollars;" and a jury is called to adjudicate upon his claims. They ascertain that his property, independently of the public work, (that is, before it was contemplated,) was worth two thousand dollars, but that the construction of the public work had elevated the value of his property to five thousand dollars. He has sustained a positive injury by this public work to the amount of one thousand dollars, but at the same time, this public work has elevated the value of his property to five thousand dollars. I ask, then, upon the supposition that no law exists in the case, can any honest man, when called upon to assess the damages here claimed, say, that this man has sustained any damage at all? Could you, sir, upon your oath to administer justice, with a full knowledge of the fact that the balance of this man's property was thus increased, and to this day remained doubled or trebled in value—could you say that this man had sustained damages to the amount of one thousand dollars? No, sir; no man could say that. So, without the law, you see, the decision ought to come to what the law is; because the man has not been injured, but rather benefited. It is true, the beauty of his farm may have been marred somewhat, but money is the measure which represents everything connected with a case of damages. The value of the thing before the cause of the complaint existed, and the value of the thing left, are only to be considered; and because the thing left is worth more than it was before, consequently the individual has not sustained any damage.

Again: the gentleman (Mr. Bright) says, it would be very unjust, in these assessments, to take into consideration the good which a man derives from the public work, as an offset to the damages, because his neighbor receives almost, or quite, as much benefit from the work, and no injury at all. Well, but what of that? Have I a right to find fault with my neighbor because a blessing has fallen upon him?—because a common blessing has fallen upon us both, but with some little blotch in my case? Is that any reason why I should murmur? My property has been doubled, although I have lost four or five acres of ground; but should I say, here is my neighbor, whose property has also been doubled, and I cannot stand that? He has gone without loss, and I have sustained the loss of my four or five acres; therefore, you should not deduct from my damages any thing you enjoy!

Mr. President, I could not, for a moment, allow myself to reason in this way. As I have said on a former occasion, when we enter into a civil compact for good government, we give up many of our natural rights for the sake of obtaining a remedy for our wrongs, and the government is bound to provide that remedy. We have stipulated that we will not take the power of redress into our own hands, depending upon the government, through our representatives, to provide the remedy; and hence we find it in the Statutes. The citizen and the corporation are referred to a common tribunal—the courts of justice. The Legislature has said that, in the estimate of damages by a corporation, the benefits of the work shall be considered; and as we have seen, such would be the decision without the law. For the result of the examination is, that the individual has lost five acres, but the residue of his land is more than doubled in value, above what it was before the cause of his complaint existed. I would ask again, then, has he been injured? I say he has not. I would like to be injured in that way every day in my life. I would like to have such a kind of injury forced upon me frequently.

But gentlemen tell me this benefit is ideal. Well, the whole that a man possesses is ideal just as much. We only have just so much time more or less, to get through the world. Most of us, I suppose, will get through quick enough without railroads or steam boats.

I confess that the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) struck out at least one new idea in his remarks, which my mind had not conceived, until he put it into my head. I have no doubt but that it was put forth with design, and that it will have its effect upon the community. This Madison and Indianapolis railroad, he said, was powerful now; it had wealth and strength without limit or stint. Well that road had the benefit of the principle of which we have been speaking, in its beginning; and it had its difficulties too, and enough of them, along with all that we call charitable and generous, and considerate. But now it has grown to be strong. It was now unrestricted in means; so that it would not hurt it nor any of its various arms, extending out in many directions, but all terminating upon the one line; it would not hurt that road if forty, fifty, or a hundred land holders should object to the progress of any one of its arms, projected and terminating between this and Madison. There is an abundance of money to supply every such demand that can be made, without regard to any off-setting of the benefits of the work in procuring the right of way. But, is it so with our other railroads? Can they get along amidst these obstructions and embarrassments, superadded to all their inherent difficulties? Have they those men who will put in their money, power, and influence to aid them, and to hush every complaint, and to make every body their friend? No, sir, they are too poor to buy up an adequate support. Not that I suppose any such thing ever was done in a corrupt way; but that would be the effect of the possession of large money resources. For this reason, there will always appear strong friends enough in behalf of any railroad terminating upon the Madison and Indianapolis Railroad. All they would have to do, in case of any difficulty, would be to look to the common parent and common friend, and there they would find money at their service. The work itself would be good security for the old corporation to advance money upon, for they could take the road when completed, and keep it till the proceeds might re-imburse them; and it would be to the advantage of the corporation to do so. Whoever had the interest of the company at heart, would favor such a policy. If the gentleman (Mr. Bright) were a director he would advise such a course; and so would I; and such would be the course of all men in regard to such things; and I see no impropriety in it.

But I want to continue to all other railroad companies the same opportunity to make their way out and through the depots of trade, which has been extended to the Madison and Indianapolis railroad. I want to leave the Constitution as it is in this respect, with all the legislation, and decisions of the courts, and jury assessments which have been made under it. I want no distinction to be made between the old and the new railroad companies; and I believe I express the wants of the country in this respect.

But, I am astonished at the course of the gentleman from Jefferson, now that he has got the benefit of a correct principle, to turn round and denounce it. But this is not more absurd than for him to say, he has a right to grumble because his neighbor (who enjoys the same benefits and advantages of a railroad with himself) has not been injured as much as he has, by its construction. It is wrong, sir; it is wrong in principle, it is unchristian-like, it is uncharitable, and should not be recognized in the fundamental law of any country.

Mr. KILGORE. I rise merely for the purpose of obtaining a direct vote upon the proposition of the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles). For this purpose, I move to strike out the instructions embraced in the motion of the gentleman from Franklin, (Mr. Shoup,) and inserting the proposition of the gentleman from Laporte, by way of amendment to the instructions.

Mr. RARIDEN (in his seat). Vote against them all.

Mr. KILGORE. We have discussed the subject now some three or four days: and there have been some two or three votes relative to amendments, which indicate pretty strongly that this proposition will probably meet the approbation of the majority. Where, then, is the policy in consuming time with discussions. Would it not be far better to take a direct vote upon the proposition? If it should be voted down, then we shall all be so much more ready to try again to make the section as perfect as possible.

The PRESIDENT. Will the gentleman send up his amendment, in writing?

Mr. KILGORE. The Secretary has the paper upon the table.

The amendment to the instructions was read by the Secretary.

Mr. BERRY proposed to amend the amendment to the instructions, by adding his proposition.

Mr. KILGORE. I hope the gentleman will allow us to take a direct vote upon the proposition of the gentleman from Laporte.

[Mr. WALPOLE next addressed the Convention. His remarks are reserved for revision.]

Pending this question,

On motion by Mr. TAGUE, the Convention adjourned till to-morrow morning, nine o'clock.

SATURDAY, Nov. 9, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by Rev. Mr. MILLS.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. READ of Clark, from the committee on State officers other than executive and judiciary, made the following report:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The committee on State officers, other than executive and judiciary, to which was referred a resolution instructing them to inquire into the expediency of engrafting in the new Constitution, a section providing for the election of a State Librarian by the qualified voters of the State, have had the subject under consideration, and directed me to report the following section for the consideration of the Convention, and ask to be discharged:

Sec. — There shall be elected by the qualified voters of the State, "a State Librarian," whose powers and duties shall be prescribed by law, and who shall hold his office two years, and until his successor be elected and qualified.

The report was concurred in, and the section was read a first time, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. GIBSON, from the committee on the practice of law and law reform, made the following report:

The committee on law and law reform, to whom was reported a resolution directing them to inquire into the expediency of providing in the Constitution, that all debts contracted after the 4th of July, 1860, shall be debts of honor, and not collectable by law—have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report that they deem it inexpedient to report such provision, and recommend that the resolution lie on the table.

The report was concurred in.

Mr. GIBSON, from the same committee, made the following report:

The committee on law reform, to whom was referred a resolution of inquiry as to the expediency of amending the Constitution, so that testimony in all cases of equity shall be taken in the same manner as in courts of law, beg leave to report that they have had the subject under consideration, and that they deem action thereon inexpedient, and recommend that the resolution lie on the table.

Which report was concurred in.

Mr. GIBSON, from the committee on the practice of law and law reform, made the following report:

The committee on law and law reform to whom was referred a resolution of inquiry, into the expediency of providing that in criminal cases the jury shall find facts alone, and the courts assess the penalty, report that they have had the same under consideration, and deem action thereon inexpedient and recommend that the resolution lie on the table.

The report was not concurred in.

GRAND JURY SYSTEM.

Mr. ROBINSON. Some days ago, Mr. President, I offered a resolution on a subject which was made the special order for Monday last. I move now that the Convention take the resolution from the table.

A MEMBER. For what purpose?

Mr. ROBINSON. Not with any view of discussing the subject, but merely for the purpose of having it referred to a committee, so that in case the resolution on the subject now pending before the Convention should fail, the Convention may be in a position to take the subject up on another report.

The motion to take up the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON. The resolution which I offered is as follows:

Resolved, That the committee on matters pertaining to criminal law be and they are hereby instructed to report to the Convention, a section to be incorporated in the new Constitution, as follows:

Sec. — That no person shall be put to answer any criminal charge, of a capital character, nor any criminal charge, the punishment whereof is or may be confinement in the State prison, a county jail, but by presentment on indictment by a Grand Jury. Provided, however, that the Grand Jury shall have no power to present or indict any person for any crime or petit misdemeanor below the grade above referred to; but the same shall be punished in such way and manner as the Legislature may prescribe.

Mr. TERRY. Will it be in order to move to amend the resolution?

The PRESIDENT. Certainly.

Mr. TERRY. Then I move to amend it by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting the following: "No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on presentment or indictment."

Mr. ROBINSON. I hope the amendment will not be adopted. I have no disposition to detain the Convention with any remarks on the main question involved in this resolution; but I will merely make an observation by way of explanation. I have submitted a proposition which I wish should go to a committee, and I believe, in regard to the Grand Jury system, it is one which is called for by the people. The people are not opposed to that system. I do not believe that a majority of them are disposed to have it wholly abolished. The only complaint that exists in regard to it—at all events so far as I have heard—is the abuses that arise under it. It is the number of these indictments for petit misdemeanors which occupy so much of the attention of courts, and which sometimes detain them for a whole week, and which might be much better disposed of by some inferior tribunal. I believe that the resolution embodies what the people want. I believe that the majority of the people of Indiana are not in favor—so far as regards capital crimes, involving the rights and liberties of the citizen—of abolishing Grand Juries and taking away that guard that has been thrown around them ever since we have existed as a government. I believe that they are justly opposed, however, to this constant taking up of time by the circuit court in the trial of these petit misdemeanors for which the Legislature might provide a punishment in another manner, and in such a way as to secure the rights of all parties.

I hope, therefore, that the amendment will not be adopted, but that the resolution will be permitted to go to the committee. If the committee should report a section here embodying the terms of that resolution, it will then be a proper subject of amendment, and the gentleman can avail himself of every thing that can then be done to effect what he desires in that amendment. I again express my hope that this resolution may be permitted to go to the committee I have named, and when their report is made, if they should report favorably, I have no doubt that the Convention will be perfectly willing to hear every gentleman express his views on the subject. The question as to what reforms shall be made in the Grand Jury system is a very important one, and one upon which every individual here should have the fullest opportunity of expressing his opinions, and of presenting his objections to any proposition that may be made, and to offer any amendment which may suggest itself to him.

Mr. TERRY wished to modify his amendment by inserting the words, "by a Grand Jury." The words "capital" and "infamous" had a technical meaning. He wished merely to say that his amendment differed very little from the resolution of the gentleman from Decatur. It was to confine the jurisdiction of Grand Juries exclusively to that class of cases which involved life, liberty, or character.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no wish to stifle debate upon this subject. On the contrary, I admit it to be a question of paramount importance; but gentlemen should remember that this question is already pending in two forms before the Convention; first, on the proposition of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, and the amendments which have been offered to it, and secondly, in a section reported by the committee on rights and privileges of the inhabitants of the State. It would therefore seem to me to be very unwise to consume the time of the Convention in having three propositions in which the same question is involved. For that reason, therefore, I will move to lay the resolution and amendment on the table.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not desire to occupy the time of the Convention, as I am aware they are impatient to proceed to the consideration of the order of the day; but I do think that the gentleman from Dearborn and the gentleman from Davis, (Mr. Terry,) who offered the amendment, are both mistaken in the force of the amendment.

There is no proposition before the Convention embracing the same principle contained in the one which I have offered. There is one which, in substance, if not directly, proposes to abolish Grand Juries altogether, and there is another which has been proposed by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, to the same effect. The effect will be the same as the adoption of the section reported by the chairman of the committee on rights and privileges, which amounts to a total abolition of the Grand Juries. That will be the effect of the gentleman from Tippecanoe. The amendment of the gentleman on my left would not accomplish every thing that is sought to be effected by the resolution now before the Convention. It simply asks to retain in our Constitution the language of the Constitution of the United States, which says that no person shall be put to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, except on presentment by, or indictment before, a Grand Jury. It leaves the question of jurisdiction, that has always been acted upon in regard to petit misdemeanors, precisely what it was before. Under the provision of the amendment, and under the language of the Constitution of the United States, as acted upon by courts, Grand Juries have always had jurisdiction to indict for any crime or misdemeanor.

I simply have to say that the proposition contained in my resolution goes further. It embraces, in my mind, what it ought to embrace, while it provides that no person shall be put upon his trial for a capital or infamous crime, by which he can be confined in a State prison or a county jail, it takes away from Grand Juries, by direct constitutional legislation, if it should be adopted, all jurisdiction in regard to this class of petit misdemeanors, that have been perplexing and occupying the time of the courts, and creating dissatisfaction among the people. There is no proposition before the Convention that goes to that extent. While then that proposition retains the rights of the citizen, and throws around him a guard that ought to exist in regard to these high offenses, it takes from Grand Juries, and from the criminal courts, the right to prosecute these petit misdemeanors, and makes it obligatory on the Legislature to create a tribunal before which such offenses may be investigated, and to provide for the manner in which they shall be punished. If gentlemen will only consider for a moment, I have no doubt that they will come to the conclusion that the proposition is one which is right in itself, and, also, that it is loudly called for. While we are not willing to take from Grand Juries jurisdiction over these high crimes involving important consequences, we do think that with perfect propriety, and with a due regard to the rights of the citizen, there can be created by legislative enactment, an inferior court in which these petit misdemeanors could be tried and punished. That is the object of the resolution, and I hope its reference will not be objected to.

One word more, and I will not trespass further upon the time of the Convention. It is this: If the propositions now before the Convention should be finally adopted when the sense of the Convention is taken upon the question, then that will settle the fate of the proposition which I have offered, but if both of these propositions should fail, then perhaps we could perfect the system in some way which would alike meet the judgment of the Convention, and the wishes of the people. [Applause.]

Mr. PETTIT desired to know whether the resolution was an imperative one, or merely one of inquiry.

The PRESIDENT. It is an imperative resolution.

Mr. PETTIT. Then I trust, sir, that it will be laid upon the table. This whole matter, as has been truly remarked by the gentleman from Dearborn, (Mr. Holman,) is before the Convention in two forms. First, in the resolution offered by myself, with the amendments proposed thereto, for the consideration of the Convention, and secondly, in the section reported by the chairman of the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of the State. It will be time enough when the resolution I offered is taken up from the table, or when the report of the Committee on the subject is taken up, for gentlemen to offer their amendments. I see no necessity for re-occupying the time of the Convention now by offering amendments. They can all be presented, and receive their due consideration at the time when the main proposition comes up for consideration. The proposition of the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) will come up soon, and I know of two or three gentlemen who intend speaking on the subject; at that time gentlemen will have opportunity to present their amendments. I renew the motion of the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Holman) to lay the resolution and pending amendment on the table.

The question being put, the motion was agreed to.

RIGHTS AND PRIVILEGES.

The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of section third of article second, the question being upon the amendment to the instructions offered by the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. Kilgore,) pending at the time of adjournment on yesterday.

Mr. BASCOM moved to lay the amendment to the instructions on the table.

On this motion the yeas and nays were demanded and being ordered were taken with the following result—yeas 68, nays, 52 :

Those voting in the affirmative were,

Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Bright, Carter, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Cole, Crawford, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Edmonston, Fisher, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warlick, Haddon, Holliday, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Hendricks, Hogen, Holman, Huff, Kent, Kendall of Warren, Lockhart, March, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Tague, Terry, Vanbenthusem, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—68.

Those voting in the negative were,

Messrs. Badger, Balingall, Beach, Beard, Bidle, Blythe, Bourne, Bracken, Bryant, Butler, Chandler, Clark of Tippecanoe, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Foley, Foster, Gootee, Gordon, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Hawkins, Helmer, Hitt, Hovey, Howe, Kilgore, Kinley, Maguire, May, Milligan, Morgan, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Pepper of Ohio, Prather, Robinson, Sims, Steele, Stevenson, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Walpole, and Watts—52.

So the amendment to the instructions was laid on the table.

The question then recurring upon the adoption of the motion of the gentleman from Franklin (Mr. Shoup) to re-commit with instructions, A division of the question was called for.

The PRESIDENT. The question will be first taken upon the adoption of the instructions of the gentleman from Franklin.

Mr. RARIDEN moved to lay the instructions on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

The question then being upon the motion of the gentleman from Franklin to re-commit,

It was taken, and the motion to re-commit was not agreed to.

The question then recurring upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Dearborn

(Mr. Holman) to the third section of special order No. 2,

Mr. WOLFE moved to amend the amendment offered by the gentleman from Dearborn by adding the following:

"No man's particular service shall be demanded or property taken for public use without just compensation being made therefor. But between corporations and individuals the damages shall be first assessed by a jury at a fair cash value."

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson moved to lay the pending amendments on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN called for a division of the question.

The PRESIDENT. The question will first be taken upon laying the amendment to the amendment on the table.

On this motion the yeas and nays being demanded, were ordered and taken with the following result—yeas 105, nays 16:

Those voting in the affirmative were,

Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Badger, Balingall, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Bracken, Bright, Bryant, Butler, Carter, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Colfax, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Hall, Holliday, Hamilton, Harbott, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Kent, Kendall of Warren, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, May, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Tague, Vanbenthussen, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Mr. President—105.

Those voting in the negative were,

Messrs. Anthony, Berry, Chandler, Cookerly, Dick, Foley, Foster, Haddon, Hardin, McClelland, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Read of Clark, Smith of Scott, Tague, and Wolf—16.

So the amendment to the amendment was laid upon the table.

The PRESIDENT. The question is now upon laying the amendment of the gentleman from Sullivan, (Mr. Wolfe,) to the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn, (Mr. Holman,) on the table.

On motion the yeas and nays were demanded, and, being ordered, were taken with the following result—yeas 53, nays 66:

AYES.—Messrs. Badger, Balingall, Bascom, Beach, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Bright, Bryant, Butler, Chandler, Clark of Hamilton, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Dunn of

Jefferson, Farrow, Foley, Frisbie, Gootee, Gordon, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Hawkins, Helmer, Hovey, Howe, Kendall of Warren, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Miller of Fulton, Morgan, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Robinson, Sims, Stevenson, Terry, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, and Zenor—53.

NOES.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Bracken, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cookerly, Crawford, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Fisher, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Harbott, Hardin, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Huff, Kent, Maguire, March, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Tague, Vanbenthussen, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Mr. President—66.

So the amendment was not laid on the table.

Mr. PETTIT. Is it now in order to move to amend the section?

The PRESIDENT. It is, sir.

Mr. PETTIT. I move, then, to insert, after the word "property," the words "or services."

Mr. RARIDEN. I desire to know whether the effect of this provision will not be to require the tender of the witnesses' fees, before he could be required to obey the subpoena in a criminal prosecution?

Mr. PETTIT. There is no such object as to require the tender of witnesses' fees. The most that can be made of it is, that the State shall pay her witnesses in criminal prosecutions. That she shall insist upon no honest man, who has done the State no wrong, because he happened to be present where the law was violated, to come up to court and testify for the benefit of the State, without pay. I have known witnesses in criminal cases, who have been compelled to travel across the whole State, and to beg their way, because they were not able to pay expenses, in order to testify in criminal prosecutions, without receiving one cent of compensation. This is a wrong which ought to be corrected, and which this proposition will correct, so far that the State will be compelled to pay.

Mr. RARIDEN. I admit that there are hardships, such as have been indicated by the gentleman from Tippecanoe. But still, it is better to endure this, than to bring upon the State the immense expense which this proposition would induce. If the State were to engage to pay all the State witnesses, it would soon become a business to seek to be a witness. I will venture to say that, if this proposition were made a Constitutional point, that seventy-five thousand dollars a year would not pay the expenses of the judicial establishment of the State. I undertake to say, that, if the State is made liable, according to the terms of this proposition, that the State will be compelled to pay the costs of prosecution, whether conviction follows or not; and I think there is no State in the Union, where the party, if convicted upon a criminal prosecution, is not required to pay the costs. The convicted party always pays the costs. But here, by the terms of this proposition—because there is always more sympathy in behalf of the person prosecuted, than in behalf of the State—the State will always be compelled to pay those witnesses; and I repeat my serious conviction, that, under this provision, seventy-five thousand dollars would not be sufficient to pay the expenses of the judiciary of the State. I think it would terminate in an embarrassment of the Treasury; and, certainly, this would be worse than for a few individuals to suffer the inconvenience which has been referred to. But, in fact, this inconvenience does not always fall wholly upon the witnesses themselves, for their kind neighbors often assist them in the way of expenses; and not unfrequently the treasury of the county is brought into requisition for the same purpose. A public spirited man will always go to testify for the State, whenever the case demands that he should; and whenever such a witness happens to be poor, then the public spirit of his neighbors will hardly fail to make up a sufficient sum of money to indemnify him. I hope the amendment may not prevail.

Mr. GIBSON. I call for the reading of the amendment. It is my opinion it will go further, and require witnesses' fees to be tendered in civil cases.

And accordingly the amendment was read by the Secretary.

Mr. GIBSON (continuing). The effect of that will be, that in all civil cases you must always first tender the money to the witness, before you can compel him to serve. That would be the necessary effect, and hence it would be impossible for a poor man to assure himself of the attendance of his witnesses.

Mr. HOLMAN read the first clause of the section, also the section as proposed to be amended, and was understood to say that the amendment to the second clause would not make the State any more liable to pay costs, either before or after trial, than the terms of the first clause of the section.

Mr. PETTIT. I would like to know what is understood by "particular" services?

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that "particular services" here have reference to that kind of service which every citizen is not bound to perform.

Mr. PETTIT. Every citizen is bound to perform every reasonable service which the State may require. But I call for the yeas and nays on this question. I want to see whether the State is going to pay her witnesses or not.

Mr. CHAPMAN said—

Mr. PRESIDENT: The gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) in his remarks yesterday, expressed surprise that some of the delegates from Marion county had supported the proposition of the gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Bright).

As one of the delegates from Marion county, I am willing to confess the reasons by which I am influenced, either here or elsewhere.

I give no vote in this Convention without due reflection, and seek to be governed in all cases by principles of abstract justice. Acting thus, I am willing to risk the consequences, whatever they may be.

I think I understand the position of the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles). He, as well as myself, was a member of the committee from which the original section under consideration came to the Convention. If a shadow of doubt rested upon my mind in regard to the propriety of the section, as reported, it would be occasioned by his disapproval; for there is not a man in this body whom I more highly esteem, or in the honesty of whose intentions I have more confidence. But, sir, notwithstanding the deference which I am willing to pay to him, I feel bound to differ with him on this occasion.

The reason of this difference is as complimentary to him as it is sufficient to me. The majority of men sent to the General Assembly are not always distinguished by those noble qualities which are so marked in him. I am satisfied that had he been as close a neighbor to the General Assembly as I have been, he would hesitate, as I do, before he would renew to that body the immense discretionary power which his amendment proposes.

He, sir, proposes to trust everything touching this subject to the discretion, the integrity, and the wisdom of the Legislature. Sir, if such a course be right in a case so all-important as this, why do we need a Constitution at all? Why not trust all our rights to the guardianship of the same authority? The gentleman from Laporte would be the last man who would agree to any such thing as that!

Sir, the proposition of the gentleman from Laporte, sounds very well to the ear, and looks very well upon paper. But practically, it would be as unsubstantial as a barrier of mere fog, against the encroachments of associated wealth. I would not give a pinch of snuff for the choice between such a provision, and no provision at all! I would rather entirely rely upon the magnanimity of the Legislature.

The gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Bright,) I think, fully realized all this, and hence his proposition as an amendment to that of the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles). Whether so intended or not, the proposition of the gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Bright) had a tendency to strengthen the proposition of the gentleman from Laporte, (Mr. Niles,) and thus to give it momentum enough to beat the original proposition reported by the committee.

The gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) can begin to guess at the reason why I voted against the proposition of the gentleman from Jefferson, while it was coupled with the proposition of the gentleman from Laporte, (Mr. Niles,) and why I voted for it as a separate proposition.

Mr. President, one gentleman has explicitly stated two distinct points which he considers to be involved in this matter. I think, sir, that there is really but one great issue, and that is this: Shall corporate powers over-ride personal rights?

This is the question, sir, disguise it as we may; and I, for one, do not hesitate for a single instant to declare against privilege, and in favor of right.

A great deal of poetry has been uttered in regard to the advantages of railroads and other works of like character, which it is said are constructed by companies, having in view, as their primary object, the public good. Admit the sincerity of all this, Mr. President, and still I can conceive of something quite as good, if not a great deal better. I mean a free, an independent, and a well-protected people.

Is it possible that gentlemen have so soon forgotten the syren songs by which they were decoyed into a system of internal improvement, which entailed upon the State ruin and degradation, and the ultimate burden of which we have yet to bear? If I ever uttered a prayer sincere, it is now, when I invoke a wise Providence to save us from these present delusory appeals, which, in my judgment, tend to a similar, or more ruinous end.

Sir, the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) expresses himself severely against the "constituents" of the gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Bright). And he seemed to suppose that the proposition which he offered was intended to perpetuate the Madison Railroad monopoly, rather than to protect the just personal rights of the people. Those gentlemen may settle that matter between themselves. For my part, I care not what was the motive, I only look to the principle, and the results which may depend upon it. I believe these both to be good, and so believing, will vote accordingly.

The gentleman from Hancock declared that he wished others to enjoy the same privileges which had enriched the "constituents" of the gentleman from Jefferson. That, sir, is the very thing which I desire to avoid and prevent, if it is to be done at the sacrifice of the paramount interests of the people. How, sir, can he justly stigmatize those against whom he complains, in this instance, except under the rule that there should be "honor among thieves."

If it be true, sir, that the managers of the Madison Road have obtained unfair advantages of the State, let us apply a very different remedy from that which would grant the same opportunity to others. Let us sever all connection between that concern and the State, and harness it so stringently as to insure tractability. Let us apply a remedy, instead of deliberately attempting to spread the contagion. Let us exert our power for good and not for evil.

If the leaders of that powerful interest, either on account of selfish motives, or a better spirit, are now disposed to aid us in guarding personal rights, I am glad of it. They who have reaped the fruits of an iniquitous system, may be the better capable of interposing a remedy against an increase and extension of the evil.

It is said, sir, that the late President Taylor was a great admirer of Æsop's Fables. Whether he was or not, there is a good deal of practical wisdom embodied in them, by which we may profit. There is one, I remember, which is entitled "The Fox and the Flies." If one swarm have gorged themselves by sucking our blood, that is no good reason why we should invite more hungry swarms to succeed them. It may sometimes be necessary to "fight the devil with fire," but we should be careful that we do not burn our own fingers while handling the weapon.

I remember also, sir, a remark attributed to Gouverneur Morris, in the Convention which framed the Articles of Confederation, in 1778. The question was, the creation of a practical aristocracy of life office-holders, as a compromise between the principles of monarchy and democracy. Mr. Morris declared that if he had to choose between either alternative, "He would prefer to be torn by a lion, rather than be destroyed by vermin." So I say, in this case, admitting all the allegations of the gentleman from Hancock to be true. If I must choose, I will surrender to the Madison Autocracy, rather than subject myself to the depredations of bands of more reckless marauders.

But, in acting upon this question, Mr. President, I am governed neither by hostility to the Madison road, nor by any desire to aid or retard other and rival interests. My desire is simply to protect personal rights everywhere against the encroachments of corporations, and that is all. If I can accomplish that, I shall be content. In securing this, I have no desire to throw any obstacle in the way of judicious public works, which may be undertaken by companies. I only ask that companies may be subject to those great rules of equity which are enforced between man and man. If I err in this, I shall remain incorrigible in my error.

A few words, Mr. President, relative to the section reported by the committee.

The Convention has substituted the word "particular" for that of "personal," in the first sentence. This being the case, in my opinion, the declaration is of no use whatever. It may as well be entirely stricken out. No word in any language, is more restrictive and constrictive than the word "particular," and the past action of the Legislature proves this conclusively. It affords no protection whatever to any man, as it now stands in the Constitution. The word "personal" was originally much more indefinite in signification, but, under the influence of republican ideas, we have invested it with great consequence, and that impression would have some weight in regulating the action of the legislative power.

A multitude of services are now demanded of individual citizens, which ought to be paid for, though they are not, and probably will not be, under your amendment; for the action of the Convention in this particular, will be considered as a sanction of the past and existing state of things. But for this, I should not regret the change.

The remainder of the section was conceived in a spirit of liberality towards corporations. It attempts to guard the personal rights of property, by the reasonable requirement, that no man's property shall be taken, unless by a valuation to be fixed upon it by an impartial jury of his peers. Gentlemen profess a willingness to trust the people by their agents in General Assembly. I prefer to leave it with the people themselves, in the capacity of jurors.

I will not confide in the Legislature in this instance, for I have seen too many instances of the control which corporate bodies can exercise over it. Why, sir, we see the malign influence even in this Convention. Several gentlemen have nearly shed tears over the supposed deprivations which they imagine we are to inflict, by this section, upon corporations. They seem to think it an outrage, big with public ruin, to ask those amiable and patriotic bodies to allow us to assess the damages, before they seize upon our property and appropriate it to their own use against our will or wish.

I ask you, Mr. President, what would be thought of the arguments of those gentlemen, should they be applied to individuals singly, instead of a corporate number of individuals? You and I may own adjoining town lots, upon which we live. I wish to build a church, a hotel, or some other building, for public accommodation, as well as my own. I want your lot, or a part of it, to enable me to do so profitably. Do I seize upon it, and snap my fingers in your face to reconcile you to the seizure? No, sir. I endeavor to bargain with you fairly, as law and justice requires me to do. But, suppose you should refuse to sell, how would it look if the Legislature should grant me the privilege to seize upon your lot, and give you no more immediate remedy than a tedious and expensive suit at law?

But, sir, the section as reported, does not ask corporate bodies to come down to the common level of common right. We give them the immense privilege still of seizing upon every man's land at pleasure, or whenever it may be to their interest to do so; while we simply ask of them to allow the assessment of damage to be made in advance.

If this were the first time that such a requirement had been proposed, the peculiar friends and admirers of corporate privileges, might have an apology for their alarm. But, not only New York has adopted such a provision,—Kentucky, also, if no other State, has adopted a similar provision—more stringent, because it unconditionally requires "previous payment," instead of mere assessment.

In conclusion, Mr. President, while I hope we shall yet have strength enough to sustain the original section, I shall not be much surprised if it be rejected. The impression seems to prevail, that our chief business is to curtail and trammel personal rights, while we correspondingly are to enlarge the powers of the executive department of the government, and the privileges of corporate bodies. While every other recent State Convention has imposed greater restrictions for the safety of the people, we seem disposed to stand still, if not to confer special privileges of greater magnitude than ever.

This is done upon the plea of the public good. Mr. President, no abuse ever existed under the patronage of any government, that was not defended by the same plea.

Whatever others may do, I, for one, will exercise my right as often as I can, to diminish instead of expanding such abuses, let the plea in their favor be as specious as it may.

Mr. STEVENSON. I had not intended to say anything upon this subject, but in consequence of the numerous amendments which have been made, which have altered the original position of the matter, I desire to explain the vote which I am about to give.

I do not differ very much from the sentiments expressed by the gentleman whose proposition is now before the Convention. I am not willing to give any unfair advantages to corporations over individual rights. While I think with gentlemen that the State is, in a great measure, dependent upon the construction of works of public improvement for her future prosperity, I think that corporations should be guarded strictly and carefully. But there is no class of provisions we are called upon to adopt, so dangerous as your general restrictive clauses. They are dangerous because we do not expect to amend or change the Constitution for, perhaps, the next twenty-five years. If we make a false step now, if we provided an unjust restriction in this Constitution, we must suffer under it, perhaps for a quarter of a century, as implicitly as though we had an inexorable tyrant on the throne. It is an important and a solemn matter to enact a legislative provision, which, if it work injustice, cannot be repealed for one or two years; how much greater is our responsibility who are framing an organic law which will be binding for a long term of years before there is any probability of revision? It is not necessary to elect a monarch and place him upon a throne to have despotic laws. You can bind up the country in the organic law and, for a time at least, the popular will will be as much stifled and repressed as under the rule of a sceptred king. I say again, there is no class of provisions so dangerous to the freedom of the country, as your restrictive clauses. Why, sir, look at it; there are two classes of restrictive propositions which are presented for the consideration of this Convention. The one is to restrict individuals, the other is to restrict the State. The first class is comparatively harmless—the second, dangerous and most carefully to be guarded against. A few days since, we voted with reference to the first class of restrictions—the question was “shall the Auditor of State be re-eligible to a second term of office?” This class of restrictions applies to individuals, and does not “tie up” the country, to use a familiar phrase.

The people still elect an Auditor of State, although the person who has once served in that capacity, is ineligible to re-election—he is restricted in the number of terms he shall serve. But when you say “the State shall not do thus and so,” you must be very careful that you do not “tie up” and destroy the prerogatives that belong to the State and without which she is powerless to protect the rights of the citizen.

The original section, to which all these various amendments have been made, was drawn up by as intelligent a gentleman (Mr. Owen) as has a seat upon this floor—we have as unmistakable evidences of his industry as of any other gentleman. But, notwithstanding the intellect and the keen discernment of that gentleman, he has here reported to us a section, the effect of which will be to prevent the authorities of a county from felling a stick of timber, or taking a wagon load of gravel for the construction or repair of a bridge until a jury has been empaneled, and the damages thereby done to private property assessed and the amount tendered in money. A plank road cannot be built over a mile of waste land until the same formalities of the law are complied with. I do not say this out of any desire to reflect upon the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) for I have the highest respect for his abilities and the most entire confidence of the rectitude of his intentions, but for the purpose of calling attention to the matter. If we were here in a legislative capacity and should enact an unwise and unjust provision, the evil would continue but for one or two years and we could repeal it; but we are sitting here in another capacity, and the provisions that we engraft in the new Constitution, if wrong, cannot so soon and so easily be remedied. Therefore, we are admonished to do nothing at all in the character of Legislators, to enact or embody in the Constitution, no subjects of legislation which can be left to that department of the government we shall organize. The future is unknown to us. We cannot tell what new interests will be created, what different circumstances will surround the people and modify their action, and therefore, we can only lay down broad and general principles in the Constitution, principles that are susceptible of application in the government of the State, under all circumstances. Our legitimate business here is to organize the government, provide for the organization of the different branches, the executive, the legislative, and the judicial, and set the whole in motion, as it were. We can declare great general principles, we can provide who shall be voters, we can declare the number of officers and their duties, we can declare the rights and privileges of the people of the State, but we cannot legislate on particular subjects. We cannot even frame a Constitution with sole reference to the condition of the State, this year or next, else we should impose iron chains to fetter the energies and cripple the effort of a great people.

The principle of the amendment of the gentleman from Laporte, (Mr. Niles,) and it is a good one, is, simply, that no man's property shall be taken without compensation. But some gentlemen say this is not enough; that we should go afurther, and provide that in assessing the damages, the jury shall not take into consideration any benefits which may be conferred upon the adjoining property of the owner. Why, sir, we are to declare general principles, not to provide for particular interests. We want the form of government only, not its details. We should go no farther than to organize the several departments of government and to set the whole in motion; otherwise, we come upon dangerous ground.

Look back for a moment at the Convention which framed the old Constitution, for the purpose of illustrating the idea I wish to present. The old Constitution provides that all fines and forfeitures should be applied for the building and support of county seminaries. It is clearly an unwise provision now, but was it so then? At the time of that Convention, it was undoubtedly a well considered and beneficent provision. The country then was new, just springing into life, and there was a great demand for a higher grade of schools than the ordinary common and district schools. But now, things have changed, and academies, seminaries, and colleges are abundant; but the general desire is for multiplication and encouragement of common schools. The provision has come to be a most impolitic one, and it shows how absolutely impossible it is for a body of this character to descend to the details of legislation. We cannot see what is to take place in the future; every feature of the body politic may be changed, and new combinations in the commercial and moral aspect of society, baffling the keenest and most far sighted intellects of this day to foresee and foretell. Therefore, it is best for us to stop when we have organized the several departments of government, and provided for setting it in motion.

But, gentlemen are not satisfied with this; they say it is not sufficient. That is not saying much for the intelligence of the country. We are called upon to put in motion a political system, by which the country can afterwards protect itself and secure its own particular interests. We need not fear that wisdom will die with the dissolution of this Convention, or that the people will lack intelligence and ability to protect themselves. Let us throw the burthen of protecting the various interests of the country, and of providing for the new combinations of circumstances that are ever arising, upon the Legislature. I know that this Convention is a most intelligent and able body, but I am not prepared to say that future Legislatures will not also comprise the best talent and political ability in the State. I will not undertake to say that this Convention, able as it is, is better qualified to protect the interests of the State for forty years to come, than all the Legislatures that will assemble in that time. On the contrary, I believe that just so sure as we undertake to legislate here, we shall ruin the best prospects of the State.

We live in a State whose prosperity is just commencing; we are just upon the threshold of a great future, and we cannot foresee the result, nor legislate for the specific interests of a community a quarter of a century in advance of the present time.

One thing has been well done: we have declared that the State shall not embark in any system of internal improvements, and in that single provision is the foundation for future wealth and prosperity.

Let us, throughout, satisfy ourselves with the declaration of such general principles, and not go further and tie up the hands of a great people, by restrictions upon the enterprise of the country.

We have also provided that hereafter all corporations should be formed under general laws: that is going far enough. We desire that individuals should not suffer from the encroachments of powerful corporations. Very well: declare the general principle in the Constitution, and leave it to future Legislatures to provide specific guards for the protection of the citizen. Trust the people to protect themselves—to guard their own interests. The question is, will we stop at the proper place, or go beyond upon dangerous ground.

The fault in the section reported by the gentleman from Posey arises, not from any want of sagacity in himself, but from the nature of the provision he proposes; it is a general restriction upon the State, and there is the error. I care not though we should discuss the matter for a month, there will still be latent difficulties and hidden dangers that we shall not discover, and that human ingenuity cannot discover, because they will only be developed by time, and the changed circumstances that will exist in the future.

I am against the grant of special and unjust privileges to corporations, but I wish to leave the legislative department which we shall organize to guard the rights of the people and limit the privileges of corporations. I do not wish to impose restrictions upon the State—upon the people—by tying up the hands of its Legislature. The effect of our legislating here may be more clearly seen by imagining the Legislature to hold its sessions twenty-five or fifty years apart.

I have already occupied more time than I should, but I feel a deep interest in this matter, and sincerely hope that we shall content ourselves by organizing the several branches of government, declare the general and fundamental principles upon which it shall be administered, define the relations of the government and the governed, and the rights and duties of each, and leave all that pertains to legislation to the Legislature.

Mr. WATTS. A few words, Mr. President, principally in relation to the remarks of my friend from Marion, (Mr. Chapman,) which, in my humble judgment, need some notice. He sets out with a declaration of his holy horror of all corporations. He believes them anti-republican and anti-democratic. Now, sir, for my own part, I never could see any impropriety in granting to corporations—to associations of individuals—the same rights which are granted to individuals. The interests of the country—the prosperity of the State—is promoted by the association of capital for the construction of works of public improvement. I can see no just reason for cramping and fettering the action of corporations any more than that of citizens—no more reasons for imposing restrictions upon the investment of associated wealth, than upon the investment and use of individual wealth.

The gentleman from Marion (Mr. Chapman) not only expresses his opposition to everything in the shape of corporations, as opposed to pure democracy, but he throws out an insinuation against the honesty and intelligence of the Legislatures of the State. He seems to think, that, when this Convention has adjourned, it will be difficult to re-assemble a body of well informed and patriotic men to legislate for the interests of the State. I must join issue with the gentleman in this particular, for I think differently. But, sir, that member has been led into an error; he has for a long time been living near the doors of our legislative halls and has formed some misconceptions of the capacity and integrity of the people's representatives.

He has been led into an error somewhat similar in its causes to one which like to have carried me away some years since. At an early day I moved into the little town of Hartford, in this State, and took up my residence on a hillside that overlooked the surrounding country. Well, sir, we had so little communication with the world outside, and so lofty an idea of the peculiar advantages, the wealth, refinement, and enterprise of our own village, that I really began to think there was no place in the country quite equal to Hartford. And so it is with people living here at the centre—at the Capital city of the State—they are apt to underrate the intelligence and integrity of the people living in the country, or as the politicians of New York City would say, “the rural districts.”

Mr. CHAPMAN. I do not underrate the intelligence and virtue of the people, nor shall I be guilty of overrating the honesty and patriotism of those who, year after year, find their way into the Legislature. If the gentleman had lived near neighbor to the Legislature as long as I have, he might, while he had the highest respect for the intelligence and virtue of the masses of the people, have reason to change his opinion of some men who contrive to be sent up here as their representatives.

Mr. WATTS. I accept the explanation of the gentleman. He appears to think it unsafe to trust the people; he wishes to guard against an abuse of power. But I cannot go with him in his desire to tie up the hands and restrict the powers of the Legislature. The people will be called upon once a year, or once in every two years, to elect men to represent them here; and the strong probability is, that they will select men who will most nearly represent their feelings, views, and wishes. It certainly is to their interest to do so; they ought to know who will best represent them. As it is peculiarly their own business—as they are to gain all the advantages of a wise choice, and endure all the evils of a bad one—I am willing to leave the matter entirely to them.

I believe, then, that we should not restrict the Legislature; that we should only declare those general principles that should form its rule of action. Set the wheels of government in motion, and only restrict the Legislature in general terms and so far as is clearly for the good of the whole people.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the original section of the report and to all propositions and amendments providing that before private property can be taken for public use, a jury of freeholders must be empaneled, the damages assessed without regard to the benefits conferred by a work of public improvement upon other property of the owner, and the amount tendered in money. This is too much like legislation; it is, in my humble opinion, beyond the legitimate province of action of this Convention. I am in favor of adopting a section upon this subject that shall simply declare that no man's property shall be taken without just compensation. That is sufficient.

Mr. KENT. If no person desires further to discuss this question at the present time, I will move that the Convention adjourn.

Mr. WALPOLE. The gentleman from Marion (Mr. Chapman) has made some statements in reference to my position, which, to some, might appear to require a reply on my part. I beg to say, however, that I make it a rule of action never to quarrel with an angry man. [Laughter.] The gentleman appears to be angry; what has aroused his ire is not for me to say, and is perhaps a matter of small consequence. I wish that gentleman to understand, that when I am destroyed, I hope to be destroyed by something having the magnanimity of a lion, and not by the “miserable, creeping vermin” of which he has spoken. What I said in reference to the question under consideration was, that influences had been brought to bear upon the gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Bright) and the gentleman from Marion (Mr. Chapman) to throw Constitutional restrictions in the way of the enterprises of the people of the State of Indiana. The political history of the State of New York furnishes us with examples of the powerful influences which have been wielded by corporations in the halls of legislation to the detriment of the people. Why was it that the people of the State of New York sought so earnestly to amend their Constitution? It was because the power of corporations was brought to bear against individual enterprise. The gentlemen from Marion and Jefferson know this to be true; and the same influences which were exercised there to defeat and suppress individual enterprise, will be exercised here with the same view. When the report of the committee on currency and banking comes under consideration, the same influences will be brought to bear upon that question which have been brought to bear upon this. They will be brought to bear upon the gentleman from Marion, and he will not be aware of it; but, sir, it is the power of wealth that has been brought to bear upon him in the views which he entertains in regard to the question now under debate, and—

Mr. CHAPMAN (emphatically). No, sir.

Mr. WALPOLE. Sir, the gentleman from Marion professes to be of the democratic party, one of whose leading principles is opposition to corporations; and yet, by the course he is taking, he is opposing the principles of his own party inasmuch as he is seeking to cherish, foster, and sustain corporations already existing, to the exclusion of any possible competition.

Mr. CHAPMAN (interposing). No, sir.

Mr. WALPOLE. The gentleman denies the conclusion; but let us look at the facts. He calls upon us to sustain a proposition to the effect that when part of a man's property shall be taken for any improvement about to be made, the value of such improvement to the remainder of his property shall not be taken into consideration in estimating the amount to be paid for the property thus taken. Now, what is this but building up, or at all events cherishing, fostering, and sustaining forever, in the enjoyment of the advantages existing public improvement, to the exclusion of all individual enterprise that might be brought into competition with such improvements as are already completed and in operation.

I agree with the gentlemen, Mr. President, that if there were no internal improvements already in existence, the question would present a very different aspect. Were we now just commencing to make them, there can be little doubt that the principle, in the abstract, would be a proper one; but that is not the case and it is because it would so operate as to prevent all future competition with corporations now existing, that I am opposed to it. I desire, in my opposition to this principle, that the people should not be deprived of their right to compete with existing corporations, amounting, as they now do, to monopolies; but the gentleman from Marion, (Mr. Chapman,) in carrying out his views, would foster and sustain accumulated wealth to the exclusion of all competition. He states distinctly that he intends to put down corporations, when the effect of his vote will be to sustain them.

MR. CHAPMAN. Such was not my language.

MR. RARIDEN. The gentleman (Mr. Walpole) is stating the effect of your language; not your words.

MR. CHAPMAN. I would treat all associations of individual enterprise with liberality.

MR. WALPOLE. Undoubtedly the gentleman is exceedingly liberal, for by the position he sustains he wants to break down all new attempts at internal improvement, in order to sustain those in which he is especially interested. [Laughter.] Very liberal, sir,—very. I admit that the old corporations and institutions have no better friend in this Convention than the gentleman from Marion.

Now, sir, let me advert for a moment to another proposition which is introduced here by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (and now under consideration). The gentleman (Mr. Pettit) proposes that the State shall, in every instance, pay the costs incurred in prosecutions in the circuit court, should the State fail in the prosecution. That gentleman has been clamorous in regard to the manner in which our immense public debt has been created, and on this subject I heard him declaiming eloquently prior to the assembling of this Convention. Well, what does he now propose? It is, in effect, that every year there shall be an increase of that debt to the amount of two hundred thousand dollars, at least, for the paying of clerks, witnesses, attorneys, sheriffs, and others. The gentleman from Tippecanoe told us the other day that seven-eighths of all presentments and indictments by Grand Juries failed to result in conviction when brought before a petit jury—that there was not more than one conviction out of seven or eight.

A MEMBER. He said not one in twenty.

MR. WALPOLE. Well, I wish to be liberal, and I will compromise the matter and take only one half of his estimate. Now take the two counties which that gentleman and myself represent. I live in a county inhabited mostly by farmers, and in which there is very little litigation; he lives in a county having an immense population engaged in the diversified pursuits of life, and I presume that the docket of his county, with such a population, will show annually not less than four or five hundred cases. But say that in each county of the State there are, on an average, one hundred and fifty cases, and I will not assume that seven-eighths of them are lost, but only one-third, which is reducing the gentleman's estimate very low, indeed, what would be the amount of cost thus annually inflicted upon the State, estimating the cost at twenty dollars for each, and this is a low estimate? Why, sir, not less than ninety thousand dollars! What then will be the amount, taking it at seven-eighths, as some gentleman said? It would then be one-third of a million of dollars, and taking the number at nineteen-twentieths it would amount to considerably more than a million of dollars which the people would have to be taxed every year to pay. Are the people of Indiana prepared for such a change in the Constitution? Are they prepared to meet the enormous expenditure that will follow such a policy? I apprehend not. Yes, sir, it will make a difference of a quarter of a million of dollars, at least. Upon your present assessment of twenty-five cents on every hundred dollars, you raise a revenue of half a million; and by the proposition thus made, you would increase the amount of your assessment from twenty-five cents to thirty-seven and a half. But this is not all. The State is rapidly increasing in population, and with that increase, and the increase of commerce, will come a proportionate increase of litigation. And if the annual expense would amount to so much with our present population, what will be the amount of it in twenty-five years from this, with such a principle incorporated in our Constitution remaining unchanged? What will it be when it amounts to three millions? It will be at least seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars. It has been well remarked by the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) that the public sympathy is usually in favor of the accused, but that there is no sympathy for the sovereign. When a man becomes the victim of malice you will find under the effect of the proposition of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, that witnesses will be accumulated; their number—all professing to know something of the case—will be swelled up until your court houses will hardly have capacity to contain them, and each of these witnesses is to be allowed fifty cents per day, and the great paymaster—the government—foots the bill. Again: I ask you are we prepared for this? Do the people call upon us to make this radical change in a Constitutional form? I think not. The Legislature has never yet had the temerity to propose such a thing as a legislative enactment; they have not even proposed it as a mere experiment for one year. Let the Legislature try it as an experiment if it be desirable; but let us have nothing to do with it. I tell you, Mr. President, that this proposition involves consequences too serious to be lightly disposed of. Let the Legislature try it but for one year, and you will find such a clamor against it all over the State, as never was heard before on any question. The people are not prepared to be taxed from a third of a million to a million of dollars annually for any such purpose.

No, sir, the doctrine, if adopted, that the State must pay a man for every public service, will prove to be disastrous to our people. The citizen must make some sacrifices for the common good. Every man consents to do this when he enters into the social compact, and there is no hostility to this on the part of the people. I admit that the gentleman's proposition is a plausible one, at first blush, and there are doubtless many well meaning persons who would give it their approbation. I have no doubt that that class of persons who attend public houses, and horse races, and gambling tables, and such like gatherings, whence arise most of the cases for criminal prosecution, will be very glad to find such a provision whereby they will frequently be able to draw upon the public treasury for witness fees. There is always a number of "gentlemen loafers," as they are called, ready to testify on every occasion, who would say, as a matter of course, that they ought to receive compensation. In every county you will find some such characters, but these are not the men for whose peculiar advantage we are sent here to provide. Let us then think calmly and seriously upon this proposition. It is one of great importance, one which will be found to affect the public treasury to an enormous amount, and without, as it appears to me, any satisfactory ground for the change.

Pending the question,

On motion, the Convention then adjourned.

MONDAY, Nov. 11th, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. ALEXANDER CAMPBELL, of Virginia.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. EDMONSTON moved that the general order of business be dispensed with, for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the special order, which had been fixed for ten o'clock this day.

Mr. GREGG. I understand from the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) that he is willing that the special order shall be postponed until ten o'clock on Wednesday next, and as it is a subject that interests the fair sex, it appears to me that it would be better to have it discussed on a day when the weather will be more favorable, and when a more general attendance of ladies may be expected.

But I have another reason why I would prefer that the special order should be deferred, and it is one that is personal to myself. I have not participated much in the discussion of the question that has been debated for some days past, and I would like at least to have an opportunity to record my vote upon it. I have been endeavoring to do so for the last three or four days, because I shall necessarily be absent for a few days to come.

And I have another reason, which is that I desire to offer an amendment to the last section of the article that is now under consideration, and to offer some general remarks upon the general merits of the question, and unless I have an opportunity to do so to-day, I shall, perhaps, not have an opportunity at all. I will say, moreover, that if it is the pleasure of the Convention to hear me upon the question relating to the rights of negroes, I will promise that it shall be the last time that I will inflict a speech upon the Convention.

I hope, therefore, that the special order will be postponed.

Mr. OWEN. I shall not oppose the proposition of the gentleman from Jefferson, though I confess that I do not think it ought to be agreed to by the Convention merely on the first consideration which the gentleman has suggested. In bringing up matters of this kind, we bring them up for consideration and decision by the Convention; and although every man must feel that, on a subject like this, it is desirable that those whose rights are the subject of discussion, should be present, yet I do not think that consideration alone should induce the Convention to postpone action in the matter. The other reasons assigned by the gentleman have weight. As the gentleman puts it on the ground that he has occasion to be absent for a few days, and is desirous of recording his vote upon another question that is now pending, I shall interpose no objection to the postponement of the special order.

The question being taken on the motion of the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Gregg,) it was agreed to; and

The consideration of the special order was postponed until Wednesday next at ten o'clock

RIGHTS AND PRIVILEGES.

The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of the regular order of business, the question being upon the adoption of the amendment offered by Mr. Pettit, to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Dearborn, (Mr. Holman,) to the third section reported by the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of the State.

[The section as reported is as follows:

SECTION —. No man's personal services shall be demanded without just compensation. No man's property shall be taken by law, without compensation first assessed by a jury of freeholders and tendered, together with the expenses of the proceeding, to the owner, by the person to be benefited. But such tender, if rejected, shall not bar the right of appeal.]

The question being taken on the amendment to the amendment, it was disagreed to.

The question recurring on the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn,

Mr. OWEN demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. KILGORE moved to amend the amendment by inserting, after the word "tendered," the words "or secured."

The amendment to the amendment was, upon a division—yeas 40, noes 53—rejected.

The question again recurred on the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RARIDEN said, he would like to hear the amendment of the gentleman from Laporte read.

The PRESIDENT remarked, that that amendment was not now pending.

Mr. RARIDEN. Well, sir, if a motion to lay the pending amendment on the table prevail, will not the amendment of the gentleman from Laporte be in order, as a substitute for the report of the committee?

The PRESIDENT. Certainly; the gentleman can move to lay the pending amendment on the table, and if that motion prevail, and no other amendment be offered, the substitute for the report of the committee will be in order.

After some further conversation on the point of order,

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson moved to amend the amendment by striking out all after the word "compensation," where it occurs in the second line.

Mr. DUNN said: Mr. President, if the motion to strike out should prevail, the amendment will read as follows: "No man's property shall be taken by law without just compensation;" and then the section, as amended, will be the same in effect as the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles). I have made the motion to strike out for the purpose of ascertaining whether the Convention is prepared to recede from the vote taken a few days since, which, I thought, indicated a determination not to insert in this section a provision requiring the damages to be assessed and paid before possession is taken of private property necessary to be used in the progress of a public improvement. This subject has been so fully discussed that I will not consume the time of the Convention by discussing it any further, though there is much I would be glad to say before the vote is taken. I must be permitted, however, to suggest some of the practical difficulties that will arise under the operations of this amendment, unless the latter part is stricken out. Suppose, sir, that, in the construction of a railroad, plank road, or other public work, it becomes necessary to have stone for the erection of a bridge. Those engaged in the work discover that there is stone in a neighboring bank, but whether it is of the right quality or sufficient in quantity they have no means of ascertaining. They are forbidden by the Constitution of the State to throw off a spade full of dirt until the damages that will be due to the owner of the land, by taking the stone, are assessed and paid or tendered. How is it possible to ascertain the damages in such a case? If a jury is called to assess the damages, they must guess both as to the quantity and quality of the stone; and then the company must pay the damages thus guessed at, or be delayed in the progress of their work. Suppose, after the damages are paid, it should be found that the stone was not of the right quality, or that there was not a sufficient quantity of it, what remedy has the company? I have given this illustration as suggestive of a class of embarrassments that must arise under this provision. But it may be replied that a contract may be made with the owner of the land. So there may, if his demands are not unreasonable. But, sir, what is to be done when the land is owned by infants or non-residents? I think, sir, our present Constitution has offered ample protection to private property, and I can vote for no further restrictions than it contains. I am unwilling to make any amendments that will embarrass unnecessarily those works of internal improvement in which the people of the State are so largely interested. I desire rather to encourage these improvements in every part of the State, that the people may have a cheap and expeditious way of reaching the markets with their surplus products. I have no such narrow views as have been imputed to the delegates from Jefferson by the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) and the gentleman from Marion (Mr. Chapman).

When the time of this Convention cannot be more profitably employed, and not before, I will reply to the unfounded and ill-timed attacks of those gentlemen, upon the Madison and Indianapolis Railroad Company. In this debate reference has been made to the provision in the Constitution of New York, on the subject of applying private property to the use of the public. It is as follows: "When private property shall be taken for any public use, the compensation to be made therefor, when such compensation is not made by the State, shall be ascertained by a jury, or by not less than three commissioners, appointed by a court of record, as shall be prescribed by law." It will be observed, sir, that the great State of New York has not incorporated in her Constitution a provision requiring the pre-payment of the damages assessed. It will be well for us to imitate her example, or to leave this matter just as we find it in our present Constitution, and, if the Legislature should deem it necessary, to provide that the possession of the property should not be taken before the damages are paid, they can pass a law to that effect.

Mr. WOLFE said he thought the Convention should act with caution in regard to this matter; for their action, whatever it might be, was to be the guide of future legislation for an indefinite period. The Constitution that they were about to form, if accepted by the people, might last for a century, or for five centuries. It was altogether uncertain for what length of time it might continue. I hope, said Mr. W., to see an amendment incorporated in the Constitution by which it may be, from time to time, amended and improved; so that if anything be put in that shall not prove acceptable to the people, after its practical working shall have been tested, they will have it in their power to vote it out. As to this proposition, it is an important one. Had it not been important, so much time would not have been consumed upon it. I did not expect that it would be debated to-day. I supposed we would have gone on with the special order.

I am sorry to see propositions presented here, the effect of which, if adopted, must be to retard public improvements; to throw obstacles in the way; to tie up the hands of this young and growing State; to cripple her energies; to retard her progress. Shall we insert in the Constitution provisions that will have this injurious tendency? I hope that this Convention will not consent to do any thing so injurious to the interests of the State.

It appears that many of our friends here have taken a great dislike to corporations, and their antipathy goes so far that it will not permit them to do justice to them. I will go as far as any one on this floor to guard the rights of individuals, and in doing that we shall protect the rights of the people of the whole State. For what is the State? Who is it that constitutes the State? It is the individuals residing within the limits of the State—they compose the body politic. Individual rights should be guarded, but not at the expense of the many. The true principle upon which all governments should proceed, according to my understanding of the matter, is to confer the greatest possible good upon the greatest number. This is the doctrine which all of us contend for. Then I say we ought not to trammel our young and growing State; but, on the contrary, we ought to afford every facility for the development of her resources, and the consequent increase of her wealth and prosperity. Let us then come up to this question like sensible men, and act upon it solely with the view of carrying out that great maxim of government, to confer the greatest good upon the greatest number.

Mr. NILES said—

Mr. PRESIDENT: I have been highly gratified with the spirit of the remarks of the gentleman from Sullivan who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Wolfe). Like him, I was not anticipating that this subject would come up for consideration to-day, and am, therefore, not so fully advised as I ought to be of the precise nature of all the questions growing out of the various amendments and substitutes which have been offered. Though the question directly before the House is upon the amendment to the original section offered by the gentleman from Dearborn, I suppose it will not be improper to submit a few remarks covering the whole ground of this debate, and in reference to all the propositions upon which we shall certainly be called to vote.

In the first place, we have the section reported by the committee on rights and privileges, which provides that no man's property shall be taken by law without just compensation first assessed by a jury of freeholders, and tendered, together with the expenses of the proceeding, to the owner, by the person to be benefited, but that such tender, if rejected, shall not bar the right of appeal. Then we have the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Dearborn to the effect that no man's property shall be taken for public use, except by the State directly, without just compensation first assessed and tendered to the owner. This differs from the committee's section in being less minute in its details and less objectionable on that account, but in its spirit it is precisely the same. Next comes the amendment of the gentleman from Franklin (Mr. Berry) which embodies the principle first suggested by the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Bright,) and which the Convention, the other day, under another form, came within two votes of adopting, that when private property is taken for public use, the damages of the owner shall be assessed without any reference to the benefits conferred. And lastly, we have the substitute for the original section submitted by myself, and drawn with slight verbal alterations, from the old Constitution. It merely provides that no man's property shall be taken and applied to public use without just compensation being made therefor; thus leaving the whole matter upon the broad platform of simple justice, and untrammelled by legislative provisions.

The proposition of the gentleman from Franklin, originally coming from the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Bright), is to the effect that whenever land is taken by the State or a company of individuals, for a railway or a plank road, the owner shall be paid its full value, without any reference to extrinsic benefits, precisely as if it were taken by the company or the State and sunk in the bottom of the sea—just leaving the owner with so much less land. That is to say: suppose that somewhere in the new and heavy timbered portions of the State, where agricultural enterprise is almost paralyzed on account of the distance and inaccessibility of a market, a few public spirited individuals associate themselves together to build a plank road. They have occasion to pass through the lands of some narrow-minded man, perhaps a non-resident of the State. His land will be doubled in value by the improvement. He thinks that the necessities of the country will force it through. The company ask him for the right of way. He says, "No, gentlemen; if you go through my land you shall pay me for it, precisely as if you annihilated what you take, and without any reference to the good you do me." And this Convention is called upon to justify and sustain him in his course. Sir, I would as willingly provide in the Constitution for such a specific case, calling the parties by name, as I would vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Jefferson, for the one involves and implies the other.

According to this proposition, no distinction is made, as I think there should not be, between the taking of property by the State in building a road by a general tax or with borrowed money, and the taking of the same property by a company who equally subserve the public interests. But in either case, what is the propriety of enforcing one iron rule, without any reference to the circumstances, or collateral benefits or injuries? In one case, a plank road is built through a man's land in such a way as to double its value. In another, an important railroad depot is established upon or adjoining his tract, bringing a market to his door; or building up a town upon his land. In another, the railroad track merely crosses his farm, with no other direct benefit than the scaring of his horses by the puffing of the engine. And yet gentlemen insist that we should apply the same rule to all, and measure the damages in all cases alike. Sir, I ask if this Convention is prepared to force such a doctrine upon the people of this State? Are we prepared to embarrass and paralyze all our public improvements, which are just beginning to give value to the property, and life and hope to the people of the State, by restrictions so unjust and unequal?

The section reported by the committee and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Dearborn both require that where property is taken for public use, the damages shall be first assessed and tendered to the owner, whoever he may be, or wherever he may reside, or how impossible soever it may be to make the tender. Until this is done, a plank road company shall not be permitted, except as trespassers, to even make a preliminary survey, as property cannot be taken at all, for any purpose or to any extent. It is indispensable that the tender be first made, and according to the original section, the right of appeal is given only to the owner of the property. That is to say: A company desire the right of way through some man's land for a plank road; a jury is empaneled to assess the damages; it happens to be packed for the defendant; a verdict is rendered for ten times the amount of the actual injury, the company must tender the amount assessed or abandon their enterprise; while if the owner of the property is dissatisfied he always has the right of appeal. Is this what gentlemen call justice? Is this the encouragement to be extended to enterprises most essential to the welfare and prosperity of the people? And yet, sir, I would as soon set my hand to the case I have now supposed, and ask the people to sanction it by their votes, as I would give my voice for the section reported by the committee. The principle of each is the same. It may be said that under the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Dearborn, the company will have the right of appeal. But what will it avail if their work must be suspended for months or years, while a law-suit drags its slow length through all the courts? and if the tender must be made where a tender would be impossible?

But complaint is made that insolvent companies may take land and never pay for it, unless they are compelled to pay for it in advance. When does it happen that a railroad or plank road company, just while they are receiving subscriptions and expending their money, are unable to pay for the right of way? And besides, I apprehend that there is no lawyer upon this floor who would express a doubt that the owner could enjoin an insolvent company from interfering with his land. Is not this whole thing of tender or pre-payment a matter rather of mere theory than of real practical importance to the property holder?

In contrast with these unjust and embarrassing provisions, we have the substitute submitted by myself, securing the ends of substantial justice, but leaving all matters of legislation to the Legislature, where they belong. When we provide that no man's property shall be taken without just compensation, we do not say that a tender shall not be required in the first instance, whenever, in the judgment of the Legislature, it would work no essential injury to the public interests. We do not say that if they find one rule to operate badly they should have no power to amend and improve their legislation, so as more effectually to secure the ends of justice, but we leave it upon the basis of justice itself. It is admitted on all hands that private property must, in some instances, be taken for public use. No man in this Convention favors to the full extent the old New Hampshire doctrine on the subject. And if we provide that it shall not be taken without just compensation, why need we fear to trust the manner of securing that justice to the Legislature, the juries, and the courts? Are we to presume that Legislatures will be corrupt, and that courts and juries have lost all integrity?

I may remark that I am glad to see gentlemen with us upon this question whose constituents are largely interested in public improvements already completed. It proves them to be above mere selfish aims. For if, by unnecessary restraints, we tie up the hands of the Legislature and check the progress of our public works, it will be equivalent to a heavy bonus to the owners of those already built, and to the towns to which they are tributary. Sir, I admire the noble enterprise of the city of Madison. But while I rejoice in her prosperity, I would not withhold from Lawrenceburg, Jeffersonville, New Albany, and Evansville, and other important towns in the State, or the country tributary to them, upon just and equal terms, the same benefits so largely conferred by the railroad terminating at Madison. I trust we shall be ready to secure to all these important interests the most ample justice, and to extend all reasonable and proper encouragement to the enterprising men who are enlisted in their favor, instead of surrounding them by needless embarrassments, not to say prohibitory restraints. In many portions of the State capital can hardly be found at all to build works of prime necessity; and if you impose unnecessary and unreasonable restraints and burthens, you will often discourage enterprises which might otherwise succeed. The building of many a plank road may be postponed for years.

I must be permitted to allude to a remark of the gentleman from Marion, (Mr. Chapman,) to whose enlightened views upon many subjects I have listened with the highest satisfaction. Were it a mere collateral remark, thrown out in the hurry of debate, I would not refer to it at all; but it seems to me to embody and fairly represent the idea of several who have spoken upon this question, no less than his own. It was, that, though he valued public improvements much, he valued a free and prosperous and happy people more. As an abstract sentiment, it is of course unobjectionable; but when gentlemen attempt to array public improvements, originating among and carried on by the people themselves, against their freedom, happiness, and prosperity, I have a word to say. Would gentlemen remove from the people all the elements of their happiness and prosperity, and then talk of a prosperous and happy people? Sir, I would as soon build a Chinese wall around the State, or, like the Empire of Japan, exclude the civilized world from our borders, as I would unjustly restrain public improvements. They are elevating our people to a condition of affluence and ease; they lay the wealth and commerce of the world at our feet, and underlie all of our prosperity. Sir, I would quite as unwillingly discourage or impede our public improvements as I would, if I could, persuade the people to retrograde to a semi-savage condition; to live in impassable forests, supplied with the naked necessities of life, and to pursue fishing and hunting as their only occupation—a condition of things which a certain class of poets have sometimes celebrated, but which sound statesmen and sound philosophers do not value over highly. I would as soon bring back the whole people to that condition in which, unfortunately, some of them are yet found, when, after the labor of the year, the farmer has harvested his crop of wheat or corn and starts to market, some twenty, thirty, or fifty miles, in a mud wagon, and at length returns worn out and discouraged, and ready to make solemn oath that he will never raise so large a crop again. Is that the condition of happiness which gentlemen would envy and perpetuate?

I am glad, sir, that we have not heard the argument in this case which was urged in favor of adopting another, to me, obnoxious measure, that, if the people accept our Constitution, it will be their act, and whatever they do will be right. It may be that we could force such a provision as is now contemplated upon the people (though I am by no means certain of it); it may be, that, to secure some other great and needed reforms, they would submit to injurious restrictions. But I trust that we shall act with the same deliberation as if our action were final; and that the only inquiry will be, is the measure sound and safe in itself.

Then I hope, sir, to see the section proposed by myself, and drawn from the old Constitution, inserted in the new, and that all the other propositions to which I have referred will be voted down. What can be more broad and equal than the platform of justice? What more just than justice itself?

Mr. OWEN. This debate, sir, has wandered so far, has assumed so wide a range, so numerous and variant have been the propositions it has touched upon, that it seems to me it may be useful, if it be not absolutely necessary, to recall the attention of the Convention to the exact point at issue between the contending parties, at this stage of the debate.

The gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles) has spoken of the proposition of the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Bright,) which is to the effect that the damages shall be awarded without reference to extrinsic benefits. I remark to the gentleman, that there is no such question now before us. The question now is, upon the amendment originally proposed by myself, and accepted by the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Holman).

Mr. NILES, interposing, and Mr. O. giving way, said, upon examining the papers upon the Secretary's table, I find that the same provision proposed by the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Bright,) is embodied in the amendment now submitted by the gentleman from Franklin (Mr. Berry).

Mr. OWEN, continuing. That amendment is, it is true, on the Secretary's table; but it is not the amendment upon which we are now about to vote. This latter amendment reads in these words: "No man's property shall be taken without compensation; nor, except in case of the State, without such compensation first assessed and tendered to the owner." Not one word is to be found in it as to the principle of estimating damages; not a single word in regard to the right of appeal, to which the gentleman alluded by way of objection to the proposition. There is, under the section as it stands, a right of appeal, both on the part of the company and on the part of the individual. The gentleman may argue, indeed, that that right is virtually, though not expressly, cut off. There can be no difficulty, however, about the enactment by the Legislature, of a provision of law to this effect: that, in the case which the gentleman has supposed, namely, where the jury may have assessed five times or ten times the just amount of damages, the money may be paid into court, and there remain, untouched by the owner, until the final decision of the case appealed. This will secure final payment, yet protect the company from imposition.

It is evident enough, I think, that the proposition now before the Convention, and that submitted by the gentleman from Laporte, (Mr. Niles,) are the two most prominent, and that either the one or the other will ultimately be adopted. We who are voting upon the former proposition, desire that the value of the property to be taken, shall be first assessed and tendered to the owner; our opponents think this unnecessary and inexpedient.

But, in the first place, I would say a word in regard to the remarks by the gentleman from Sullivan, (Mr. Wolfe,) as to the opposition and enmity which he seems to think exists in this body, against all corporations.

Mr. President, I am a citizen of Posey county; and the people of Posey county, in their capacity as citizens and individuals, have subscribed for public improvements of various kinds, which they expect to complete in the course of this year and the next, to the amount of between $74,000 and $75,000. This has been done by Posey county alone; and I am a stockholder in every one of these enterprises. Is it a likely case, then, that I would advocate a proposition of which the effect is, to retard and cripple improvements, even in my own county? I need make no protestation that I shall never sanction a proposition which I believe calculated to produce such an effect.

Mr. President, what are the minor objections that have been made to the proposition of the gentleman from Dearborn, and brought to bear against its provisions? It has been said that an individual, having a quarry of stone, or a few timber trees, might refuse to sell the same at any fair price; and, in that case, before the stone or timber could be taken, a jury must be called, and formal damages assessed. Are stone quarries, are timber trees, so scarce in this country of ours, that, if one man refuse to sell, no other can be found to offer them? My experience is, that, in nine cases out of ten, a reasonable price can, and will be fixed, by private agreement, on all such articles, when required by a company, in the construction of roads. Throughout last summer I served as acting Commissioner on the plank road between New Harmony and Mt. Vernon; and not in a single instance did any difficulty occur which it required a jury to decide.

But let us suppose the case, certainly a very possible one, that some individual does hold out to the last against the sale of some property absolutely needed; say that a jury does assess some ten or twenty dollars more than really ought to be paid; and suppose the company compelled to tender this unreasonable amount; shall we set the tender, yes, or the loss, of such a sum of money, or of any sum of money, in competition with the right of the citizen?

Sir, this is a provision which may—in some cases probably will—lead to some inconvenience. No human right can be secured, or ever has been secured, without such risk. In that country from which most of our ancestors came, and of which I myself am native—in a country which cannot yet boast of the large liberty enjoyed by us here—has not mere expediency often been made to give way to right? Do you not remember how secure is the subject of Great Britain in the right of his domicile? An Englishman's house is declared to be his castle. The winds of heaven, as some one has it, may enter; the storm and the tempest may beat through its frail walls; but the king of England cannot enter. No officer charged with the execution of any civil process can force the outer door of an Englishman's dwelling. Inconvenience may result from this; loss to individuals, delay to justice; yet this inconvenience is submitted to—willingly submitted to—that the great principle of human rights may remain inviolate.

It is a thing the furthest from my thoughts or wishes, to put any obstacle in the way of roads, and similar public improvements. To their increase among us, as the offspring of private enterprise, we shall owe much of the prosperity that may be in store for our State. Nor do I cherish enmity to corporations created under proper guards. I but say, that I am not willing to see them established on the ruin of human rights.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. Mr. President, I have listened with close attention for four or five consecutive days to the gentlemen who have participated in this debate, and have watched its course and progress. I have observed, sir, that every proposition which has been presented, either as a substitute or as amendments to the original section, have met with about the same reception. I conceive, and herein agree with my friend from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) that the controversy is now narrowed down between two simple and distinct propositions. The first question is this: shall a corporate body have the right, without resistance on the part of the citizen, to go upon his private property and take the whole, or any portion thereof, without a jury of freeholders being first assembled to assess the damages and the amount of the award tendered? The other question is, whether the jury, in assessing damages, may take into consideration the benefit supposed to be conferred upon other property of the individual claiming damages. In other words, will the Convention interpose barriers between the rights of the citizen, and the encroaching and aggressive spirit of corporate bodies?

This is a question which deserves the most serious attention of a body of the people's representatives, assembled to frame the organic law of a State. We are here assembled to declare the rights of the citizen, the duties of Government, and provide guards for the protection of the one and to define the functions and limit and restrict the exercise of the powers of the other. When the rights of the individual citizen are brought in contact with an association, when a single citizen is brought in collision with the combined strength and wealth of a corporation, the citizen is as a willow, standing against the gale. The influence, the combination of interests, the association of wealth, in a word, the concentration of all the elements of power existing in a corporation, will inevitably crush the citizen to the earth. Unless we interpose great constitutional barriers, the personal rights of the individual will be disregarded and overborne, and his property swept from him by the remorseless and strong arm of corporate power.

I, sir, would be one among the last to impose such limitations and restrictions upon associations and corporations, as would prevent individuals associating their energies and their capital for the purpose of constructing those great works of public improvement to which the State must look, in a great measure, for her future prosperity and growth. I have listened this morning with delight to the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles) while he portrayed to us in the strong colors of his imagination, and the vivid language of his eloquence, the destiny of the State in view of the construction of the net work of plank roads and railroads, projected by private enterprise, and to be certainly completed by private enterprise, unless we unwisely restricted and discouraged associations of individuals banded together for this purpose. He told us that the growth and prosperity of our noble State was mainly attributable to the few works of public improvement already in operation, and from this deduced what our future position would be when the great system of internal improvements now projected and commenced by private enterprise should be completed.

But I attribute the increase of population, and the development of the wealth of the State, to different sources. I do not see, as the gentleman thinks he does, the cause of all this to be entirely in our roads and canals. I attribute it to our form of government and to our laws. It is to our free and liberal institutions that have induced the producing classes of the old world to emigrate to our shores and settle within our borders. They have induced the farmer, the mechanic, the manufacturer, and the laborer to come into the State, and develop its resources. Added to these, the considerations of a bountiful soil and a healthful climate have attracted a large and thriving population, and the ratio of its increase is still undiminished. It is the aggregate of these individuals that forms a great State. The pictures drawn for us by the gentleman from Laporte were delightfully portrayed; but so, also, were the painted descriptions of the future prosperity of the State by the friends of internal improvements constructed by government in 1836. Every man then in any way engaged in public improvements told us that by their means the people of Indiana were to be made the greatest people on the face of the earth!

Mr. President, the people of Indiana reluctantly, but unavoidably, are now looking at the sad reverse of that picture.

The principle that I wish to present to the Convention is this: this body has made a wrong estimate of what constitutes the public. Are we to estimate those gentlemen who form themselves into associations and incorporations as constituting "the public?" Are we in legislating or in framing a Constitution for the inhabitants of Indiana, to regard the officers and stockholders of corporations as "the people of the State?" Are they anything more than a portion, a very respectable part perhaps, but still a portion only of the people, who to secure greater returns for exertion and more profitable investment of capital, have formed themselves into companies and associations, as distinguished from the transactions and operations of the isolated individual citizen? I suppose that out of two hundred thousand citizens, not more than ten thousand at most, are connected with corporations. The proportion is not more than one in twenty.

Now, sir, I hold that "the public" consists in the main, of individuals who are unconnected with corporations. The farmers, the agricultural class of a State, is generally the largest portion, and, I might add, the most valuable, of its population. The producing class is always numerically the strongest. And compared with these how few are members of incorporated companies!

I hold that in this matter the issue is distinctly made up between the people on the one hand, and corporations on the other. I desire that idea to prevail. Not that I would foster, or that I should like to see, a prejudice engendered in the minds of the people against corporations, but I desire that the interests of the people should not be placed within the power of corporations.

Gentlemen tell us that we should not meddle with this matter here, they tell us that if we will leave it out of the Constitution the people's rights will be guarded and amply protected by their representatives coming up here to the Legislature annually or biennially. Let me tell gentlemen that this cannot so certainly be calculated upon. Vigilant representatives, unconnected with those corporations, uninterested in the chartering of new ones, and above the reach of the insidious temptations to swerve from the rigid line of duty, may thus protect the rights of the people, and strive to interpose barriers to the encroachments of associated wealth by restrictions and limitations upon the exclusive privileges of corporations. But, sir, will there ever come a time when those who are directly or indirectly interested in corporations, when those that are liable to yield to the potent influences of wealth and power, will not find their way into legislative halls? No, sir, never.

Look for a single moment at the relative position of private citizens, of individuals, and corporations. Observe the power of the one and the weakness (because isolated) of the people. Corporations can always, and do always, send up to the Legislature their "lobby members," to represent their interests as distinguished from the interests of the people at large. They have the wealth to enable them to do this, and the result generally justifies the outlay. Even though we should provide in the new Constitution that corporations should be formed under general laws, these influences would still be brought to bear in their favor, and they would still manage to secure privileges and rights not common to individuals.

On the other hand, it must be evident to all that the people can oppose no counteracting agency to these influences. They cannot come up here in a body, and individuals cannot spend their time and money to come up to the Legislature and stay around the lobbies and doors of this Capitol, to protect themselves against corporations. The people act without concentration; in the aggregate their political power is omnipotent; in the segregate, comparatively impotent.

The farmer, when he buys his land, does so after taking into consideration all its advantages, not only its location but its productive and latent resources; he takes into account the number of acres of arable land, the amount of waste ground, the timber, the stone, the sand and clay, &c., &c.. Either his timber, his stone, or other property may be taken from him, according to the plausible doctrine of the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles) without his will or consent, if it is necessary to the construction of a work undertaken by a corporation acting either under a general act of incorporation or the muniments of a special charter.

The reason given for this allowance of trespass on private right, is, that the construction of works of public improvement result to the benefit of the whole community, and as he is "one of them"—as he is a component part of the public—he will receive his share of the benefit; and, moreover, if he own adjoining property, he will be incidentally and peculiarly advantaged, and, perhaps, enriched by its proximity to the railroad, plank road, or canal. I would ask gentlemen if, under the operation of the same principle, a corporation engaged in the construction of a public work, should not be privileged to enter a store, a mill, or a workshop, and take possession, under legal forms, of course, that would take off the air of theft, of broad-cloths, boots and shoes, hardware and groceries, flour, and the products of the mechanic's labor? Why not? All these things are necessary in the construction of the work, and the owners might consider themselves paid by the general benefits resulting to community from the railroad or other work.

A MEMBER. It may be that the timber and stone, &c., taken by a corporation, are the only materials convenient to the line of the road; it might subject the company to serious inconvenience to carry those materials from a distance.

MR. MORRISON. And so it might be vastly more convenient to take the flour from an adjoining mill, or the goods from a convenient store, than to buy in other markets where the price might be higher, or, as the more likely case, where the owners being unwilling to take their pay in "general benefits," would demand the cash for their goods and products!

I, sir, for one, would be ashamed to go home among my constituents and tell the farmer, the man whose property is in land and timber, that, in this Convention, to which I was sent to secure the protection of his rights, I had agreed to impose upon him obligations and liabilities not imposed upon the merchant, the mechanic, and other of his fellow citizens. I should be extremely puzzled were he to ask me why I made this distinction against his class and exempted others—why his property might be condemned for public use against his consent, while the merchant and manufacturer would be protected against the conversion of a dollar's worth of their property to the public use without their consent, and without the payment of the value they fixed upon it, in money; I say I should be extremely puzzled to answer such a question and to explain my vote.

The gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles) hopes never to hear it said upon this floor that the policy of the State should be to embarrass and discourage corporations formed for the construction of works of public improvement. Well, sir, I do not wish to embarrass them; I do not wish to discourage the laudable spirit of private enterprise; I will be foremost to encourage and to foster it by all legitimate means. And while I would do this, I wish to place them upon the broad platform of equality with individual citizens. I do not wish, in other words, to grant to any one man, or set or class of men, special and exclusive privileges.

When an individual purposes to build a warehouse, or construct any work, he must not only pay, in money, the market value of all the materials he would use, but he cannot take them without the consent of the owner first obtained. I propose that corporations should enjoy no greater privileges than individuals. In their combined resources they have power enough and advantage enough over the private citizen, without our legislating or providing in the Constitution for their especial benefit. The aggregation of wealth in the hands of corporations, puts it in their power to defy competition from individuals. They have the power of money; they already have great advantages of the isolated citizen. Let us protect the citizen, not throw the ponderous weight of Constitutional provisions and special legislative enactments into the already descending balances of the corporations.

If corporations proposing to build a railroad or other public work, desire stone, timber, &c., let them advertise for proposals to furnish the specified qualities and quantities, then a healthy competition will spring up, and they will obtain the materials they may need at the cheapest rate. But do not provide that they can take timber, stone, or land without making compensation in the same manner that individual citizens would be required to under like circumstances.

But we are told by gentlemen that the benefits conferred upon a man's farm by a road passing over it, should be taken into account, and enter into the compensation awarded to him for other property that may be taken. Now, I ask, of what benefit to a man, a portion of whose farm may be destroyed by a railroad, is that road, over and above its benefits to his neighbor, whose farm lies on the line but is not damaged by it? Certainly none at all. Then is it not clear that the man whose farm is damaged by the construction of a public work, say to the extent of five hundred dollars, pays just that much more for internal improvements than his neighbor, who receives equal benefits but whose property remains untouched? If the farmer, a portion of whose land has been taken for the construction of a railroad, and who has been paid for that land in "supposed benefits," wishes to transport his grain over the road to market, is he not charged the same freight tariff as his neighbor? and if he wishes to ride over the road, must he not pay the same fare as his neighbor? Then why make him contribute an actual amount towards the building of that road, which you do not require of his neighbor?

Mr. President, these roads and other works of public improvement will be built. The gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) has said, that we are not willing to allow a healthy competition to spring up with the roads already constructed, and the same idea was thrown out by the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles) this morning. As a citizen of Marion county, I know that the people whom I represent will understand their own interests, will know when they need a railroad, a plank road, or canal, and when they are satisfied that they need either one, they will grant the right of way and give a company proposing to do the work, all the facilities and aids they may require. But I wish to protect the people of Marion county, and the people of the State, against what I must denominate "soulless corporations." I am told that if corporations actually encroach upon the rights of the citizen, if they take private property without making just compensation therefor, that the people have a remedy in the law, that they can sue out an injunction and restrain a corporation from taking and using their property. But to get out an injunction the citizen must employ a lawyer, and otherwise incur a bill of costs he may be entirely unable to pay. It has passed into a proverb that when a man goes into law he gets "fleeced;" most emphatically is this true where an individual goes to law with a powerful corporation. And is it proposed that the citizen shall pass through this ordeal to secure his "inalienable rights" from encroachment?

This idea, the idea that corporations and associations shall not compensate the owner of private property in money, at its market value, is so repugnant to every declaration of political rights, so at war with every principle of justice, that I am at a loss to understand how gentlemen can support it. I cannot go into my neighbor's store, take a yard of cloth or a barrel of flour by telling him that I need it and will pay him for it hereafter, unless that neighbor chooses to trust me. But the proposition is to allow a corporation to do that very thing—it is to allow it to take property against the owner's consent by paying the amount of damages assessed by a jury. For one, sir, I will never vote for such a proposition.

The gentleman from Laporte has discussed all the amendments which have been offered to this section, those that have been disposed of as well as those now pending, and as many of the points he has discussed are not relevant to the present question, I shall not follow him through his entire argument, and attempt to reply to all he has said.

I repeat what I before remarked, the issue is plainly made between the people on the one hand and the corporation on the other. It is for us now to determine what guards shall be thrown around the citizen for his protection against the encroachments of organized and incorporated bodies. Of all the propositions which have been presented, I am satisfied with that of the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Holman). As amended by that gentleman, the section would read:

"No man's particular services shall be demanded without just compensation.

No man's private property shall be taken or applied to public uses, without just compensation, and, except in cases of the State, such compensation first assessed and tendered to the owner."

I shall not detain the Convention with any further remarks at this time, but I shall go against every proposition which would leave this question unsettled, so that subsequent Legislatures may have the decision of the question left to them. There the power of corporations will be brought to bear against the rights of the individual; therefore I shall vote to settle it here, and shall, for that purpose, support the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn.

Mr. KILGORE. The only point of difference between the advocates of the principles of the old Constitution and those disposed to favor provisions similar to those of the section now before the Convention, is embraced substantially in the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Jefferson, to strike out the latter part of the pending amendment. Should this proposition prevail, it will leave the whole section the same as in the old Constitution. The great cause of difference between the friends of the one proposition and of the other is, that the one requires the damages for private property taken for public use to be pre-assessed, to be assessed and the amount tendered before possession is taken of the property. The other party is willing to provide that a fair compensation shall be made to the owners of private property condemned for public use, but simply object to the stringency of the provision which requires that the property shall not be taken until the damages are assessed and tendered.

There is one serious difficulty in my opinion, which will certainly grow out of the adoption of the pending amendment. In many cases it will be impossible to know the nature and amount of the damage done, until after the property is taken. To give an example illustrative of the difficulty which I apprehend must grow out of this provision, requiring the damages to be assessed and tendered before the property is taken;—and I will take the same case alluded to by the gentleman from Laporte, (Mr. Niles,) so far as the nature of the work to be constructed is concerned. Suppose a company desires to take timber from the land of an individual for the purpose of constructing a bridge. Now the provision is, that damages must first be assessed, and the amount tendered. A jury must be empaneled and sent out into the woods and assess the damages for taking an uncertain amount, and an uncertain quantity of timber for the bridge. Now what is to be done. A tree must not be felled until the damages are assessed. The jury cannot go about and mark the trees and set a value upon each one. The number, size, and value, must all be known to the jury before the damages can be ascertained. Suppose that they mark a certain number of trees, and judge as near as may be, to their value; the damages therefor are assessed, and the amount tendered. Very well, after all this awkward formula, the company can go on, cut down the marked timber, and proceed in the construction of their bridge. But suppose the amount proves insufficient? Another jury must be empanelled, proceed to the work, and assess damages for another lot of trees before the work can proceed. And it is quite possible that a second deficiency may be discovered, for, inasmuch as the company must pay the money in advance for all the timber they use, they will be very particular not to get more than they think they absolutely need; then a third jury must be empanelled, go into the woods again, and go through the process of assessment, before the last timber can be put in the bridge. All this must be gone through with, in order to build one bridge.

Much has been said about the danger of granting special and particular privileges to corporations. We only ask that corporations shall be put upon an equal footing with individuals. We compel no man to pay a debt until it is contracted—we do not provide that a man shall make compensation for a trespass before the trespass is committed. There is, no legal liability for debt, until a consideration is proved. But you demand that these "soulless corporations," as the gentleman from Marion (Mr. Morrison) sees fit to designate them, shall not be allowed to take a stick of timber or quantity of stone, until a jury has assessed the damages, and the money is paid. The property may not be used for months after if is necessary to locate the road or other work; no matter, the money must be paid to the owner, whether that amount be great or small. The company may be one of limited means, and the outlay of a large sum of money in advance may seriously embarrass their operations. No matter, as the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles) remarked, no matter how exorbitant the damages assessed, there is no remedy; the amount must be tendered and paid over. The right of appeal may be left, but the money is to be paid and then you may prosecute a law suit to its final and uncertain termination. And suppose, sir, that in the meantime the owner of the property taken, and for which you have paid in money an exorbitant price, becomes insolvent. Where is your remedy? Nay, more; suppose the owner of the property for which exorbitant damages have been assessed, is known to be hopelessly insolvent at the time? You have no remedy but to pay over the amount. The jury before which the case is finally tried, may decide that the damages assessed were exorbitant and may reduce them four hundred per cent. If the party is insolvent, the company has no recourse; it has been obliged to pay over a large sum of money for damages not sustained, and now they must do as best they may to complete their work. Is this the equal and exact justice we declare shall be meted out to all?

Do gentlemen who are so fearful of the encroachments of corporations, and so urgent that they shall be placed upon an equal footing with the individual, desire to see corporations put thus far below the private citizen in point of rights and privileges, and is this the way the gentleman from Marion (Mr. Morrison) would encourage the spirit of private enterprise?

It has been urged, in debate, in favor of providing for the pre-assessment of damages, that companies and associations might become insolvent, and, in some cases, a loss thus incurred by the owner of property taken for public use. In the first place it is a very rare thing that a company organized and incorporated for the construction of a public work becomes insolvent to this degree; but, sir, the risk that owners of property incur in this way, enters into and forms a part of the every day transactions of life. Carry out this principle, and it would result that we should have none of that confidence between man and man, which is now the basis of all business transactions. Individuals may become insolvent, individuals may commit trespass and become insolvent, but these are among the risks which all members of society must incur.

Reference has been made, frequently, in the course of this debate, to the scenes of 1836.

Mr. President, I am the only man now living who was in the Legislature of this State in 1836, who had anything to do with the system of internal improvements projected at that time [laughter]; strange as it may appear, it seems that I am the only survivor. There were many here in that memorable year, sir, and they are not all dead, but a strange and unaccountable obliviousness has come over them; they have forgotten that they were ever here. [Renewed laughter.]

But, sir, I was here and however much that Legislature may be denounced by those now walking in the light of its experience, I shall never deny that I was a member. I admit frankly that the policy then adopted was a mistaken one, but the State has learned a great and most valuable lesson. True, the cost was great but the experience has proved most invaluable. And, sir, it should be remembered by those who, in 1850, so violently assail the policy adopted by that Legislature, that they are now looking at results, and that if they were placed back in 1836 it might be as difficult for them to foresee the future and judge of the best policy to meet the wants and developments of that future as for us who stood there unaided by the light of experience that now shows us that private enterprise is the only secure and legitimate basis for an extensive system of internal improvements.

There is a discrepancy in the arguments of those who are opposed to all corporations, to which I desire to call attention. They argue that companies and associations should be required to have private property assessed and should tender the amount in money before they should have the right of possession for the reason, they tell us, that corporations are very liable to become insolvent, in which case the owner of property would lose his damages. And then again we are warned, the people are warned, of the power and influence of those mighty corporations—their wealth is represented so great that they can always defy competition from individuals. In the language of the gentleman from Marion (Mr. Morrison) “the issue is made between the people and these wealthy and powerful corporations.” Now what consistency does this exhibit in the enemies of corporate bodies? They would have the people prejudiced against them on account of their leviathan power and untold wealth by means of which they are able to buy up the consciences and votes of Legislatures and to crush all opposition, and then, a moment afterward, to defend some weak point (as for instance the impractical proposition that no private property shall be taken for public use until damages are first assessed and the amount tendered in money); they tell us that these same companies are irresponsible and liable to insolvency.

—I regret to see this opposition coming from the source it does. Among the strongest opponents of the adoption of a liberal policy towards the associations of private enterprise in corporations which are now proposing the construction of a magnificent scheme of internal improvements, are the gentlemen from Marion and Jefferson. I am not hasty to impute improper motives and I will not be. I will not suppose that the gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Bright) is actuated by selfish motives in his desire to discourage the construction of new lines of railroad. He himself gives us a clue to the cause of his prejudices. He had a client whose rights had been encroached upon by the company owning the Madison Railroad. The client's private property had been taken without a just compensation, and it was natural that his sympathies should be enlisted in behalf of his client; it was right they should be. But with all this exercise of charity, I must say that the plain effect of the policy pursued by that gentleman is to secure his own Railroad in the enjoyment of her present profitable monopoly, and prevent competition by imposing such restrictions upon corporations as shall discourage the construction of other railroads. As the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) remarked, having secured the right of way for their own Railroad, having had the greatest facilities for its construction, they are not anxious for the building of rival lines. Having "got out of the brush" themselves they are disposed to forget the wants and interests of other portions of the State.

Mr. President, I have an interest myself in that Madison Railroad. Being the only surviving member of the Legislature of 1836 I feel somewhat like a foster father to that road. [Laughter.] That Railroad, sir, was one of the works of the Legislature of 1836, and I have a right to feel and manifest an interest in the bantling, but I do not wish it to grow too powerful. I do not want those iron rods, like the insatiate rod of Aaron, to swallow up its neighbors. [Renewed merriment.]

This case of the Madison Railroad reminds me of a story.

[Mr. K. proceeded to relate an anecdote which was inaudible at the Reporter's desk, but was understood to relate to a child that had been found destitute, taken in and fostered by strangers, supported and educated until he grew to manhood, when he ungratefully turned round and expelled his benefactors from their home and estate.]

Mr. KILGORE proceeded:

So with Jefferson and Marion counties. We have befriended them; we have made the deep excavations at a great expense for their railroad, and now they would put their feet upon the neck of competition. I do not impute selfish motives, I am describing the effect of the action of gentlemen.

Indianapolis is the city of railroads; she has reaped, and will continue to reap, great advantages from her position. Her representatives are now opposed to granting to other roads the same facilities enjoyed in the laying out and construction of those converging to this point. And why? Because every new road must be lateral, and must terminate at some other point than Indianapolis. Rival interests are springing up at other points, and if they can be crippled, so much the better for this city and Madison.

I am deeply interested in a thoroughfare terminating in the city of Indianapolis; but we have secured the right of way and stand in need of no provisions of a fostering character. We have secured all the materials necessary and occupy the vantage ground in this respect, over other roads. Companies for the construction of other roads that would subtract from the business of ours, are now forming and have yet to secure their materials and the right of way. Now, sir, although they must be competitors of the road in which I am interested, I am willing to see them upon the same ground we occupied; I am willing they should enjoy the same facilities and privileges for the construction of their roads which we enjoyed.

Mr. President, I trust that the restrictive propositions which have been made here will not be adopted. The true policy of the State is to encourage and foster the spirit of private enterprise, and this can be done without the sacrifice of individual and personal rights. Regard corporations in their true light, as the associations of energy and capital for the accomplishment of great public undertakings; for the construction of those works of public improvement upon which the future growth and prosperity of the State depends, and we shall come to a correct conclusion.

Sir, there has not been a solitary instance that has fallen under my observation—and I can say without affectation that I have had some little experience on this subject—where strict justice has not been done to the landholder. During the last two years I have been concerned in making assessments for damages on the Bellefontaine Railroad, and in not a single instance has the jury refused to give the claimant damages who was justly entitled to them. In some instances where the road did no material injury to farmers, the benefits that would certainly result to the owners of the property upon which the road was constructed, was set off against the damages. Now, sir, I ask if we should not trust this matter to a jury at all times? Men trust their lives, their liberty, and their property in the hands of juries, believing that they are honest and will do justice to all parties; and certainly if they will do this, they ought not to fear their decisions in the small matter of compensation. A certain individual may imagine that his property is injured in consequence of the construction of a road. Let a jury then examine all the facts in the case, and take into consideration the advantages as well as the disadvantages that will result to the man's property, and then strike the balance between the two, awarding strict justice. This is the true mode of operation. But do not allow the petty spirit of a few individuals who may object to the construction of the road to hinder or obstruct its progress. I have met with several such cases, and if we had not had the power given us on the Bellefontaine railroad to assess in the manner provided in the charter, two or three individuals on that road would have defeated its construction, and not a rail would have been laid on the road. The very moment a road is projected an excitement is gotten up near its supposed vicinity, and every one professes to be willing to give a release of the right of way; but after you have entered upon its construction it may then be the very men who first offered a release of the right of way, come forward and claim damages. The stakes being struck, the road commenced, and the company having expended money at the time these claims are presented, of course cannot get clear of the claims by changing the location of the road; and although those damages may be unjust and exorbitant, if the provision on the subject now proposed is inserted in the Constitution, the company must pay them; for if they correspond in amount to the assessment of the jury of freeholders, they have got to tender the amount of damages that has thus been assessed, to the claimants, leaving out of consideration the immense advantages which will result to the claimants from the construction of the road. Is this fair? Is it just? Is it equitable?

There are many men who make money out of every operation in which they engage. I heard an anecdote of an individual who had been engaged in money-making all his life, and who never did a single act without being paid for it. Unfortunately he accidentally fell one day into the water, and was being rapidly carried away by the current. Some kind soul grasped at him ineffectually several times while he was in the water, and at last succeeded in dragging him by the hair of the head to the shore. When this man had got on his feet, and was considering over the matter, he began to think that on the whole his ducking had been rather an unprofitable operation—that he had made nothing out of it—and in order to realize the darling object of his ambition he concluded that he would make a good thing out of it by suing the fellow who had dragged him out of the water, for pulling his hair. So it is in relation to a good many men. Once get a road permanently located and they will avail themselves of every means to bring an action for damages against the company for pulling their hair, or, in other words, for having made their fortunes.

When a claim for damages is a just one, let the company make compensation in money; but I am opposed to giving the claimant a two-fold compensation first in money, and then in benefits. I am also opposed to assessing damages, and tendering them in dollars and cents, before a single step is taken in the prosecution of the work. Say what we will, sir, in relation to this subject, it is my opinion that it should be left to the Legislature. There is no danger of the people's representatives allowing their rights to be trampled on. The same people who elected us, will elect representatives to come here and make laws for them; and the people will require of those representatives that they guard the rights and interests of the minority. I venture the prediction, sir, that there is not a gentleman who has a seat in this Convention, who has discussed this question before his constituents, that has been instructed by them to vote for a change in the old Constitution, on this important question.

There are, I acknowledge, a certain class of corporations for which I have no particular love—those corporations, however, that are disposed to build up the interests of the country, I am disposed to aid as far as possible. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Dunn), to strike out the portion of the amendment which I have been considering, will prevail, and that the amendment will be left, in substance, the same as the provision of the old Constitution on the subject.

Mr. TAGUE. I desire, Mr. President, to make a few remarks upon this question, before it shall be voted upon. I expect, sir, that the brief remarks with which I have occasionally introduced resolutions, have acted as a kind of notification to the members of the Convention that I am somewhat illiterate—that I have not been educated in the manner I should have been, and that the language I use to express my ideas is not the most choice or grammatical. Another defect in addressing an assemblage of the character of the present one, is, that I am, by birth, a Dutchman, and cannot speak the English language with the plainness that should always mark the efforts of public speakers. But, sir, if any gentleman should fail to understand me, I hope that he will call upon me to explain more satisfactorily, my ideas upon the subject under consideration. I believe, at any rate, that a Dutchman is permitted to speak twice upon a subject, and, if he is not then understood, he has the right to occupy the floor until he can make himself understood. This is the course, if members are willing, that I should like to pursue; I should like to do this, because I have some rights as a member here, and I desire to have a chance equally with the more talented members, of making my views known to the Convention, and to my constituents. [Cries of "consent," "consent."]

Mr. President, I regard this subject now before us, as a very important one; a subject as momentous in its character, and one in which our constituents are as deeply interested, probably, as any that will come up before this Convention for consideration.

This question involves the rights of men—the privileges of the citizen; and it may be said that the future action of this Convention, in regard to the rights of men, depends, in a considerable degree, upon the manner in which we treat it. If we, in this particular matter, fail to regard the rights of men—fail to protect and shield them, we will set a precedent that may be but too easily followed—a precedent, too, that, in the future action of this Convention, and of the Legislature, may lead to the most dangerous consequences.

I must confess, sir, that it appears to me this discussion has taken a very wide range, in a general way, and has not been so closely confined to the point at issue as it should have been. I have discovered this fact, sir, because I have been a patient and attentive listener to the speeches that have been made, and have been engaged in watching the general features and force of the arguments that have been presented.

I have found, sir, by observation, that the lawyers, with a few exceptions, have taken but one course upon this subject. They are entirely in favor of corporations or large and wealthy companies. I myself view these corporations favorably, because I think they are of much service—that they advance the public interests, and I like to see them organized. I argue, sir, that we should protect and guard the rights of individuals, and as these corporations or companies are composed of individuals, I hold that when the rights of individuals are guarded, the rights of these corporations or companies are guarded.

In regard to the amendments that have been proposed, I must say that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Dearborn suits my mind better than any that have yet been offered. To be sure, the original amendment reported to the Convention is a very good one, and probably will answer the purpose as well as the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn; I do not see much difference between them. I consider, sir, that some gentlemen, in offering these amendments, have presented propositions that take too wide a range—have soared, as it were, too high above the interests of their constituents. If they would look over the past, and study the past and the present condition of their constituents, and reflect upon the distress and the many evils which have resulted from an undue exercise of authority by corporations to their constituents, I think they would be a little more careful as to their action on the present question.

I have had the honor, Mr. President, of a seat in this House as a representative of the people; and well do I recollect, during the last several years, and particularly some six years ago, the numerous claims and presentments here for damages, which strict justice should have settled long ago, when the cause of their being presented first originated. A great many of these claims could get no hearing at all. Another fact, sir, that I have noticed since these new improvements first originated and have become so numerous is, that the time of the House of Representatives has been consumed in discussing the merits of the various corporations and the advantages to result from granting them charters to an extent that has cost the State in money for its expenses as much as it has realized from the contemplated improvements. [Several members. "That's true."]

In view of this state of things, I am in favor of modifying the present system, so as to guard against any unnecessary delegation of power to corporations, or any unjust exercise of power by these bodies towards individuals. I consider that the provisions in the old Constitution in regard to this subject are very excellent, as far as they go; still I am of opinion that a change for the better can be made through the medium of amendments in the new Constitution. The amendment reported to the Convention, or the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Dearborn, (Mr. Holman,) if engrafted in the new Constitution, will, I think, do away with the evils that have hitherto resulted from an unjustifiable construction and exercise of the provisions of the old Constitution.

There was an argument advanced here the other day by a member of the Convention, which I beg leave briefly to notice. The gentleman made use of an argument something like this: He stated that an individual might own forty or fifty acres of land, or even a quarter section, and if a canal or railroad should be constructed through that land and damage it to the amount of one hundred dollars, that the advantage he would derive from such public works would probably benefit him five hundred dollars; and he concluded by saying that he would like to have his property damaged that way every day of his life. I would state, in addition, that he calculated that any such improvement would take up about five acres of land. Now, sir, suppose a man owning forty acres of land should have eight different roads constructed through his farm in various directions, and allowing five acres of land to each improvement, how many acres would he have left? Would not his forty acres be entirely gone, and he left without a cent, without a farm, and without money to buy another one? [Great applause.] Apply the same rule to a quarter section of land. Suppose that thirty-two new works of various kinds were constructed through such a section, each improvement occupying five acres of ground, how would the owner fare? I rather think, sir, that, with his own cattle, he would be turned out upon the commons to graze for a living. [Much laughter and applause.] His five hundred dollars for each improvement would be weighed in the balance and found—wanting. [Laughter.] I hope, sir, that gentlemen will look into this more thoroughly than they seem yet to have done. I may be wrong in holding these views, but they are views which the present aspect of the question compels me to entertain. I think, sir, that in regard to the action of these corporations, and with reference to the assessment of individuals for damages that the rights of the citizen or individuals should be strictly guarded, and, if this course is pursued, corporations or companies, which are composed of individuals, will necessarily have their rights protected also.

I consider, sir, that we should first guard individuals from any unjust exercise of authority by these corporations. There is no danger but that a large body of men will have their rights; but there is danger that isolated individuals may not have their rights. I know that where a road is constructed through a farm, say forty acres in extent, or more if you please, that the owner of that farm has the right to claim damages. But under the old Constitution hundreds of individuals have not received one dollar of damages for the damage done their farms. The argument is that they will be repaid in the course of time by these improvements tenfold, for the losses they may have incurred from the construction. But says a gentleman, you can sue the company for the damages. Why, I ask, what chance does an individual stand in suing a company of a thousand men, with perhaps, a million of dollars capital? An individual might as well attempt to place obstructions in the Ohio River to prevent its running towards the Mississippi, as to attempt to obstruct companies from going on with any works which they are resolved to carry through. [Great applause.]

I have, Mr. President, consumed more time than I intended to when I arose. [Cries of "go on! go on!"] I am not in the habit of making public speeches; this is the first time that I have ever occupied the time of the Convention at any length in an address since its organization. I have made a few remarks when introducing a resolution or by way of inquiry, but nothing further.

Mr. T. proceeded to say however that he would give way in a few moments. Just let the old Dutchman alone for a little while. [Cries of "hear him! go on!" &c.]

As I before observed, sir, I shall support the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn, (Mr. Holman,) unless one that I consider more satisfactory and conclusive is presented. At present I regard it as about as good an amendment as can be offered; and I do hope that gentlemen who are seeking to introduce other amendments having a wider range, and of a less practical character, will consider the situation of individuals who may be materially affected by this question and give their votes so as to satisfy their constituents at home.

This is a question which, if decided now, is to be decided for years; for the new Constitution which is to embrace this provision will not be altered again, probably, for a generation to come, and there is every probability that as we form it, it will be accepted by the people.

There is another idea upon this question I wish to present. I would here remark that I had several ideas I wished to present when I first arose, for I have a mind to think though I may not possess the ability to speak, but as is generally the case with me, those ideas have in a measure departed. [Much merriment.] Here, sir, is the State of Indiana, a State as susceptible of improvement and cultivation as any in the Union; for during the last twenty-five years I have traveled through some sixteen States of this Union, and I have, also, traveled through this State, have been in nearly every county in it, and I consider that this State is as well adopted to agricultural pursuits as any State I ever put my foot in. [Applause.] It is destined to be a great and prosperous and wealthy State. [Great applause.] It will yet be checkered over with railroads, canals, and McAdamized roads, and internal improvements of every character. The day is not distant when incorporated bodies, organized to carry out these public improvements will absorb nearly every citizen of note or property in the State. There will of course be some individuals, and those are the ones I am now pleading for, who from their want of means will not be able to own stock. Probably more than one half of our citizens will yet be enrolled as members of these corporations; and the great danger to which I wish to call the attention of this Convention is, that you will leave the new Constitution or the provisions in it relating to this subject so open and unguarded as that they may be construed to suit the wishes and designs of these corporations.

Here will assemble the representatives of the people, probably men of wealth—not that I am a man of wealth however but such are generally sent up here if they can be put in nomination and elected because their wealth naturally gives them a preponderating influence. I say then, sir, that when these individuals, belonging to incorporated bodies come up here to perform the duties of Legislators, that if the provisions of the Constitution are left open and unguarded on this subject they will be construed in a different way from what it was designed they should be, to the benefit of these corporations and not to the benefit of the individuals who may be so unfortunate as not to own any of the stock of those companies. This view of the matter I think is justified by experience. I have lived a long time, sir, and those that live long ought to learn something during their lives. I have noticed that men assembled to legislate in large bodies act too much upon self interest; and it will be just as natural for the members of future Legislatures, deeply interested in these various corporations of which I have spoken, to meet here and legislate for their own interests, as it will for them to legislate impartially and justly for the good of the whole people. I say it will be just as natural, and if I may be so allowed to speak, it will be a little more natural and more in accordance with the teachings of the past and the precedents set by other bodies, for those members to legislate with an eye single to their own interests. It is to guard against any such perversions of the powers of our government then that I desire to see the provisions of the old Constitution appertaining to this subject modified and restricted, so as to protect such individuals as may not be members of these corporations from any unjust or unlawful usurpation of authority on the part of such organizations.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. RARIDEN. Mr. PRESIDENT: I wish to say a few words on—

Mr. SMITH of Scott. I rise to a point of order, Mr. President. The gentleman I believe has spoken two or three times on this question, and there are others who wish to speak who have not yet had an opportunity.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Has the gentleman from Wayne spoken on this question?

Mr. RARIDEN. I do not rise to speak on the question now before the Convention, but for a personal explanation, and the floor having been assigned to me by the Chair, I conceive I am entitled to make it.

PRESIDING OFFICER. The gentleman is entitled to make a personal explanation.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. "Consent, consent," and "hear him, hear him."

Mr. RARIDEN. I have already spoken on the subject now before the Convention, and have said perhaps all that is desirable I should say in regard to it. I do not rise to engross the attention of the House on that subject, but merely to say a few words by way of explanation, which I think in justice to myself I ought to give. It is in regard to some remarks which appeared in this morning's paper and which are attributed to the gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Read). As I am involved in these remarks I wish to make a correction. The remarks attributed to that gentleman are as follows:

"Mr. President, I rise not to a correction of our journal—hardly to a correction of our reports. But if good jokes are to be interpolated in our debates, we have as many in this corner as in any part of the Hall, and I would be glad to know how they may go into our reported debates. A scene is represented to have occurred in another part of the Hall, of which the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) is made the hero, which did not occur."

Now, however fond I may be of playing the hero, I am not anxious to do so in borrowed or stolen armour. The exception which I take to this is, that the gentleman allows himself to say that this scene never did occur in this Hall. The scene to which I refer is one which occurred some days ago, and is to this effect: The gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Read) had read to the House the valedictory address of General Jackson. At the close of the reading of it, I am reported to have said, "Now give us the song of Moses; it is equally as applicable to the subject, and is a much better composition." [Laughter and applause.] This scene, or I should say, this remark, the gentleman from Monroe says I never made. In another part of the same speech, the gentleman complains of the remark. I was not in the Hall when that speech was made, but I had heard from others that the remark had been cause of complaint to him, and I went to him and asked him whether he felt any cause to complain. I told him that I had not made the remark on the floor in debate, nor even in my own seat; but that I was sitting in the vacant space between the front row of seats and the Secretary's desk, and that the remark had been heard by the reporters, and that I certainly had made it. I further told him, that I understood him, in reading the valedictory address of General Jackson, as holding a rod over this House, and that, with that feeling, I had made the remark in perhaps rather a loud whisper, "Now give us the song of Moses; it is equally as appropriate to the subject under debate, and is a much better composition." I told the gentleman that myself; and other gentlemen told him so also. He is made to say, in another part of his remarks, that what was said on this floor was not reported, and that what was not said was reported. Now, so far as that remark is intended to apply to this correction, I beg to contradict it. There are fifty men in this Hall who know that I made the remark, both here and at the desk at which I am in the habit of sitting. Now, at the bottom of the column in which this correction appears, is a note in very small print—so small that a man might very readily pass it over—making me, as it were, creep out of a gimblet hole. [Laughter.] The note says,

"Mr. Rariden informs me that he did make the remark imputed to him, while sitting at the Clerk's desk; that probably not a dozen heard him. D. R."

Now the gentleman says that the remark never was made; that the scene never did occur; that the report of the matter is a report of that which never did happen, and that it is an omission to report what actually did occur. Now I aver, that the report is as literally correct as it can be, and that I so informed the gentleman before. As I understand, the gentleman himself drew up this speech, and sent it to the press. I believe his speech was not reported by the reporters, but that he reported it himself. I must say to the gentleman, that I think it is ungenerous to make me figure in this kind of way, and it is also ungenerous to the reporter, because he is directly charged with doing that which he ought not to do, and leaving undone that which he ought to do. I have no wish, sir, to be represented as wearing borrowed clothes. The gentleman, in the small typed note at the foot of the column, says that I told him that probably not a dozen persons had heard me make the remark. Sir, I told him, at the time that I explained to him that I had not made the remark on the floor in debate, but in the hearing of DOZENS of gentlemen—that I had heard DOZENS of gentlemen telling that they had heard it. I do think that I am exhibited in a rather awkward position here, and I have taken this occasion to put myself right.

Mr. READ. I have but one word to say in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Wayne. I do not deny having drawn up my remarks myself, which I believe I had a right to do, and of which the reporter can have no cause to complain, as it is so much labor saved to him in writing out the remarks. I must also say, that I showed these remarks to the gentleman from Wayne before they were sent to the press. I showed him the very words, and this very note of which he now complains as putting him through a "gimblet hole." [Laughter.] I made that note for the express purpose of satisfying him; and I understood that he was satisfied with the report, as well as with that note, which I here say I made at his own request. I made the remarks that I did on the previous morning, because gentlemen told me that the remark, as reported, had not been made by the gentleman from Wayne, and the gentleman himself told me he had a notion to make it, from which I inferred he did not make it. He has seen, I repeat, every word which is in this report, written out by my own hand, for the very purpose of preventing mistake, and exhibited to him before going to press, in order that he might be entirely satisfied in the whole matter. I distinctly understood him as being satisfied; and I am greatly surprised that he should now come forward and complain in the manner in which he has complained this morning.

Mr. RARIDEN. One word more by way of explanation. It is perfectly true that the gentleman from Monroe read to me the remarks which appear in the paper of this morning. He had a perfect right to write what he pleased, and I had no right to dictate to him what he should put upon paper. I have no recollection whatever, of expressing my approbation of what he read. My recollection is rather the reverse of that. I believe that I remarked to him that he had a perfect right to put into the paper what he pleased; but if I was, by him, put into a false position, I should have a right to explain upon the floor of the Convention. I do not know that I manifested any dissatisfaction at what he had written. My sole object in speaking to him on the subject was to impress upon his mind that I had made the remark.

Mr. READ. The gentleman from Wayne tells us now that there were fifty men who heard him make the remark; I here aver that he told me there was not a dozen, and I so put it down at the time in the note which I showed him.

Mr. RARIDEN. Then you are greatly mistaken.

Several MEMBERS. Adjourn, adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The gentleman from Wayne is entitled to the floor. Does he give way for the motion to adjourn?

Mr. RARIDEN. No, sir; this is a mere matter of personal explanation which may as well be finished now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The gentleman certainly has a right to explain. The Chair hopes he will not be personal in his remarks, [a laugh].

Mr. RARIDEN. I assure the Convention I shall not be personal at all. Mr. President, it is utterly impossible that I could have known how many gentlemen heard me; I may have used the expression that probably not more than a dozen heard me. As I stated in the beginning, I told the gentleman that the remark was not made upon the floor in debate, and that probably not more than a dozen gentlemen heard it. But on further examination I found that every body about me heard it, and are ready to state that the remark was made. But why does the gentleman want to tie me down to the number of a dozen? What purpose can that limitation serve? I used the remark; and when I used it I did not mean to give him any offence by any means. I did not call for the song of Moses out of any design to wound the gentleman's feelings, for that would be a liberty which I should feel to be unworthy of myself. I simply meant, as I stated to the gentleman himself, to convey the idea that I regarded his reading that document as being out of place, and as shaking the rod over this House, and that he might as well read to us the song of Moses, which would be equally as appropriate, and which was a better composition. And so say I yet.

Mr. READ. When did you state that to me.

Mr. RARIDEN. I stated it to you here in this hall. You must not allow yourself, under any feelings of irritation; to forget the whole matter; for I assure you, that however much you may have felt, I meant nothing personal—nothing offensive. At the same time, as I told you before, when you read that speech to me, I felt that if there were anything in it which I might regard as injurious to myself, I should take occasion to reply to it as soon as it made its appearance in print. I cannot possibly see, therefore why the gentleman should take offense.

I repeat it again now on this floor, in the hearing of the whole Convention—and I mean no offense to the gentleman when I say it—that the song of Moses would have been equally as appropriate to the subject under discussion, as the valedictory address of General Jackson, and that the former was a much better composition.

This ended the explanation, and the discussion of the subject previously under debate was resumed.

Mr. KENT. Mr. PRESIDENT: I believe it is generally conceded that the agricultural, as well as all other great interests of the State, are more immediately involved in the prosecution and completion of plank roads, than any other branch of improvements. I believe, too, it is estimated that companies have been formed, within the last two years, under the general plank road act of 1848, for the construction of more than five hundred miles of these roads, and I have never heard of any inconvenience in the construction of them, arising from the provisions of this act.

If it be true then, that the present general act works well, and the community suffers no evil from it, in prosecuting these improvements, it certainly renders the arguments of gentlemen, that the amendment of the delegate from Dearborn will retard improvements, of very little force.

In the 9th section of this general act the following is provided:

"In case such company shall require for the use of said road, any stone, gravel, or other material, from the land of any person adjoining, or near said road, and such company cannot contract for the same with the owner thereof, such company may proceed in like manner to have the value of such material assessed, as is above provided for assessing the value of lands, and in every such case of land and material, such company may take possession of and use the same immediately after having paid such justice for the use of the owner of such land or materials, the sum, if any, which may have been assessed therefor."

Here it is expressly declared, that no company shall take lands or other property, until the damages are first assessed and paid over to the proper officer for the use and benefit of the owner. And this is the provision of the amendment under consideration.

The gentleman from Clark (Mr. Gibson) is entitled to the credit of calling my attention to this provision of the general plank road law.

Mr. SMITH of Scott said, that he intended to make a few remarks upon the subject now under discussion, but the hour of adjournment having nearly arrived, he would prefer to address the Convention in the afternoon.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. "Go on, go on," and "proceed now."

OTHER MEMBERS. "No, no," and "adjourn, adjourn."

Mr. SMITH. I move that the Convention now adjourn.

The Convention accordingly adjourned to meet at two o'clock.

The Convention having met pursuant to adjournment, the discussion of the subject under debate in the early part of the day was resumed.

Mr. SMITH of Scott said: Mr. PRESIDENT, On the subject now under discussion, I shall occupy the attention of the Convention but a very short time. I should not venture to trespass upon the time of the Convention, were it not that I feel that I cannot consent that we should take a vote upon this proposition, without first presenting to the Convention the views which I entertain as to the propriety or impropriety of the adoption of the pending amendment.

If I am correctly informed as to the position in which the question now stands, it is this: The gentleman from Laporte offers to amend the original section by striking out "no man's particular services shall be demanded, or his property taken and applied to public uses without just compensation being made therefor." To that, the gentleman from Franklin offers an amendment, by striking out all after the word "man's" and inserting "no man's services shall be taken without compensation; and no man's private property shall be taken for any public improvement without compensation; and when it may be taken for this purpose, the value thereof shall be paid to him in money irrespective of any extrinsic benefits, in such manner as shall be directed by the General Assembly." The gentleman from Dearborn offers to perfect the section in the following manner:

"No man's property shall be taken by law without just compensation for the same; nor in case of the State, without such compensation being first assessed and tendered to the owner." To that I understand the amendment offered by the gentleman from Jefferson is pending, which is to strike out the latter clause of the section and leaving it to apply to a man's personal services only.

The PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is to strike out the first part of the clause; that is, to strike out all after the word "compensation," which will leave it, that no man's property shall be taken by law, without just compensation, &c.

Mr. SMITH. Well, I have an objection to the amendment, as it stands, because it leaves unsettled, a very important principle, which, I am fully convinced, ought to be determined by this Convention.

In the discussion which has taken place on this subject, there seem to be three distinct parties, each occupying separate positions. On the one hand, we hear gentlemen contending that the right of corporations to seize upon and appropriate private property to their own use and benefit, ought to be held inviolate. And the strongest argument which I have heard adduced in support of that position, appears to be that of the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. Kilgore).

His testimony in favor of the proposition, seems to me to amount to this: He claims the honor of being in the Legislature in the year 1836, and voted for the internal improvement proposition, with this provision in it—that corporate companies might seize upon private property and convert it to their own use, and pay the owner of that private property by setting off the benefits which he would derive from the improvement thus made. He claims to be the author of that proposition, and the Madison and Indianapolis Railroad Company, having derived the benefit of it, he thinks it would be unjust and ungrateful to drive off other companies without allowing them to participate in the benefits resulting from that provision. The whole question, and the only proper question to be kept in view, as I regard it, appears to be this: Shall powers and privileges be granted to corporate bodies, that are to be refused to private individuals? That seems to me to be the only question that ought to be discussed under all these propositions and amendments. Shall incorporated companies, throwing all their funds together, because they are in a corporate capacity—shall they have the privilege of seizing the property of individuals, and converting it to their own use; and, after having done that, compensate the individuals for the injury, by saying to them, "Gentlemen, there are some prospective benefits to be derived by you from the improvements which we are making, and these benefits will be an ample remuneration to you for all the property we take, and they are all the compensation you are to have." Corporations have done this hitherto, and the question is, are we now going to make it a fundamental principle of law, that they shall continue to do so?

Now, the gentleman from Madison, (Mr. Bright), offered an amendment, to the effect that, when private property was taken for any purposes of public improvement, it should be paid for without any regard to extrinsic benefits to be derived from such improvements. On that proposition we find that all the friends of corporate bodies are against him. They say, in effect, "How ungrateful on your part, after having had the benefit of this provision yourselves, and got your road so cheap, after having satisfied your voracious maws in full, with the property of other men—after you have enjoyed all this, how ungrateful it is on your part, to seek to prevent us from enjoying the same privilege!" That is the amount of it. The argument seems to be about this: Suppose that, instead of giving the privilege to corporations, it had given it to individuals; suppose that it gave me authority to seize upon the property of my neighbor, and appropriate it to my own use, and that I had done so to my entire satisfaction. Suppose, again, that the law was about to be changed, and gentlemen were to come and say, "I have not had the same opportunity which you have had of making myself rich out of the property of my neighbor, and I protest against the passage of such a law until my wants, in that respect are also satisfied." There is not a member of this Convention that does not, at a glance, see the absurdity of such an argument. Why, then, should corporations be put upon a different footing to individuals? Of what greater advantage to a man is it, if a corporation deprives him of his property, rather than an individual? None whatever; and I, therefore, conclude that corporate bodies ought to be placed upon precisely the same footing in this respect, as an individual, and that they, in their corporate capacity, should have no more power to take a man's property, without the fullest compensation, than an individual would have. If powers of this kind are to be given to corporations, we may create corporations which will trample upon the necks of men until eternity.

The gentleman from Franklin offered an amendment similar, in part, to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Jefferson, which I believe would settle a question which has caused no small degree of litigation and trouble in this State on the part of private individuals. The majority against that amendment was only one vote, which clearly shows that a goodly number of the representatives of the people on this floor are willing to act as they should act, that is, to allow to corporate companies every right which they ought to enjoy, and no more. I ask, are gentlemen prepared to grant to corporations rights and immunities which they would never dream of granting to men in their private capacity? The proposition is anti-republican—it is monstrous, and ought never for a moment to be guaranteed by the laws of the State. What, sir! Place "prospective advantages" in the scale as a balance against private injuries? The proposition is wrong; it is outrageous; there is no justice in it; there is no reason in it; there is no equity in it.

The gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles) asked us with much emphasis "what can be more just than justice itself?" Mr. President, I, too, can ask the same question, and so can hundreds of thousands of others; but I cannot put my seal to his definition of justice. "What is more just than justice itself?" says he. Sir, justice is all that we ask for; but if we are to guarantee to corporate bodies the right to pass through a man's farm and take his land, whether he will or not, and convert it to their own use, I say there is no justice in it. It is in my estimation, absolute, downright, legal robbery.

Now let me put a case by way of illustration. Suppose that I was an owner of a good mill site on a stream passing through a country rich in grain products, but in which there was not a grist mill. It occurs to me that by erecting a mill upon this spot, I will not only make a good speculation for myself, but confer a great benefit on the surrounding inhabitants. I go to work and erect my mill. I build a dam across the stream, and cause the land of my neighbor on the other side to be submerged in water so that he cannot use it as he would. In other words, I do him great damage, and he comes to me and makes complaint and asks, as he would have a right to ask, that I, as an honest man, should make reparation for the injury inflicted. What would he think—what would any body think—were I to reply to him, “oh, my good friend, I cannot make you any compensation for this. It is true that your land is overflowed in consequence of my having erected this dam, but then you should take into consideration the fact that this mill will be a great benefit to your neighbors and the country round about, and you must, therefore, suffer the inconvenience and loss arising from having your land overflowed for the general benefit of the neighborhood?” Why, sir, who does not see the absurdity, the injustice of the answer? Again: take another illustration. Suppose I cut through a man’s farm in order to make a mill race. I take, perhaps, some of the best of his land and so divide it by the race as to put him to great inconvenience in the management of his farm. He complains of the injury, and I answer him, “oh, my friend, this will be a prospective benefit to you; it will make your land more valuable in consequence of the proximity of my mill. I will therefore pay for your land by this ‘prospective advantage.’” What would be likely to be his answer? Would he not say, “well, when I am content to take ‘prospective advantage’ in pay for my land, then you may have it and dig your mill race; but until I agree to take that kind of pay you will please to walk off, and put a spade in my land at your peril.” Would not that be his answer? Undoubtedly it would, and the law would sustain him in it. Where then is the difference? On what principle of right, I ask, may a number of individuals, associated together, do that which a single individual may not do? But the law has already settled the principle that companies building railroads, or digging canals, or making plank roads, may, in estimating the amount of remuneration to be given for land taken for these purposes, set off the “prospective benefit” to the parties whose land is thus taken, and this principle adopted and sustained by the Legislature has been found to be a crying evil, and the people demand a Constitutional provision to protect them from injustice so gross, so flagrant as this. To arrive at the justice of the case, then, we must put corporations upon precisely the same footing in this respect, as we would place individuals, and until you adopt a principle in your Constitution allowing a man to seize upon his neighbor’s property and appropriate it to his own use, you ought not to grant such right to corporate bodies. This, sir, I regard as the very gist of the question, and if the amendment of the gentleman from Franklin had been adopted, I should have regarded it as being settled forever.

Well, Mr. President, let us ask ourselves “what we are here for!” We are here to settle great and fundamental principles. A gentleman who addressed the Convention to-day very properly enquired whether we were going into ordinary legislative action, or whether we would keep steadily before our view the purposes for which we were sent here? I say that we are not here for the ordinary purposes of legislation, but for the settlement of great and leading principles which shall form the basis of future legislation. And if by our action here we should authorise, at any future time, powers to rise up and trespass upon the rights of private individuals, so far from performing the duties which have been committed to our charge, we shall be trampling upon one of the most sacred rights of the citizen; a right that ought to be both secured and safely guarded by the organic law of the State.

But it has been argued that this is a matter which we ought to leave to the General Assembly. Has it not been left to the Legislature already? and what have they done? The gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Kilgore) cast his vote in favor of this principle. Complaint after complaint has been made to the Legislature that poor men’s lands have been taken for these public improvements without their receiving any compensation but a “prospective benefit.” Those of them who were able have appealed to the courts for redress, and those of them who were not able have been obliged to submit to the injustice without redress. And those who appealed, what did they get? The principle was settled by the Legislature, and according to that principle the practice has been carried on.

But, sir, so far as I can understand it, it appears to me that the great quarrel since this debate began has been between the companies who have completed their improvements, and who have enjoyed all the benefits of this unjust law, and those whose improvements are still in a state of progress. The latter party claim that it would be a great hardship if they cannot take every man’s property which they may require, just as the former party have taken it. They say, “you want to keep us down; you will not allow us to enjoy the same privileges which the other companies have enjoyed.” That is their complaint. Now I am ready to admit that the Madison and Indianapolis Railroad have had all that they wanted under that provision. The gentleman from Delaware himself admits that he voted for it; and now when others want an extension of it, he and his party wheel round and—

Mr. KILGORE. The gentleman mistook me. I did not vote for this principle merely as applicable to the Madison and Indianapolis Railroad, but I voted for it as part of a general system of internal improvement.

Mr. SMITH. That settles the very question that private property should be taken and that the prospective advantage a man might derive, should balance the loss. That is what the gentleman voted for. This company have converted as much of the private property of the people of the State to their own use as they needed for their purpose under the provisions of the Legislature. Now I do not know by their anxiety that this principle should be discontinued, that they at all repent of what they did. They may have repented; I cannot tell. But if they have repented, I think it would be quite as well that they should give us some evidence of it by making an ample, full, and complete restitution of the property thus taken, or its equivalent in money (applause). However, sir, you will find that these companies that have got organized and their improvements completed, are paying up in their peculiar coin of "prospective advantage." And how do they pay up, sir? Why, the gentlemen whose property they have taken to build their road upon have the privilege of traveling upon the road over their own property by paying three cents per mile, in advance. No credit, gentlemen! (Laughter.) No credit, sir. It is all "pay in advance." Yes, I should like to see a gentleman go from here to Madison, without paying three cents a mile in advance. Why, sir, he cannot do it. And that, sir, is the compensation—that is the "prospective advantage." (Cries of "hear, hear.") Nay, more, sir. There are yet some other "prospective advantages." If the cars run off the track, and the man whose land has been taken to build the road happens to be traveling and enjoying the "prospective advantages" at the rate of three cents a mile, and is detained—detained he must be. What remedy has he? He may be compelled under heavy bonds, to be in Madison at a given time—but there he is stuck in the mud—fast—cannot get away; he sustains all the damage of failing to be in Madison at a given time; and what redress has he? None, whatever. And thus are we called upon to give to these companies these peculiar advantages and to take their still more peculiar "prospective benefits" in payment.

Sir, I am not prepared to give my vote for any such system. I am not prepared to vote for putting these companies on any other footing than that of private individuals. I am quite of opinion that the rights should be guarded, but I see no reason why any stronger guard should be thrown around their interests, than should be thrown around the interests of individuals, or any greater privileges accorded to them than are accorded to the private citizen. Suppose that I, as an individual, had capital sufficient to build a railroad—would this body, would the Legislature, would any deliberative assembly, grant to me with this capital, a right which they would not grant to any other individual? Not at all. And if they would grant me such rights would not the universal voice be raised against them in one loud and deafening acclamation, that they were making one law for the rich and another for the poor? No, sir, such exclusive privileges can only be obtained by a union of interests so long as the matter is kept open. If it would be unjust to grant a wealthy individual such privileges—an individual whose wealth could do all that the wealth of a corporation could do—then it would be equally unjust to grant such privileges to a corporation, and hence the necessity for settling this matter as a general question. I admit that it would be a great change from the formerly existing state of things; but it would only be a change from wrong to right, from injustice to justice, from knavery to honesty. I think that we should come up to the amendment of the gentleman from Franklin, which settles the question emphatically—that no man's private property shall be taken and converted to public uses, or seized and appropriated by any individuals at all, unless it is paid for without regard to "prospective benefits," or "extrinsic advantages." This then settles the whole question. It places it upon the basis of equity. I recollect that the gentleman from Hancock, (Mr. Walpole,) in speaking of the gentleman from Marion, and of the position which he took in this matter, said that he was trying to make it a democratic question. For my part I do not see how it can be a democratic question, unless it is that it goes for equal rights. That is democracy; and whenever you are willing to abandon the rights of private individuals and surrender them to any corporate body, then the private individuals will surrender you. I have noticed it all my life that the people never abandoned a man while he adheres to them. But when the people see that their property may be taken from them with impunity, they will murmur, and they will continue to murmur, and they would do wrong to themselves if they did not murmur.

Now there is a railroad which passes through my county. I know that there was a competition got up within the neighborhood for another line. Gentlemen tell us, however, that if we adopt an amendment to the Constitution changing the present practice, we will cripple the energies of the State, and no doubt it will be said that we will cripple the energies of private enterprise. Now let us look at this for a moment. When a new line is proposed, men owning large tracts of land through which it is to pass, will readily surrender a portion of their land for the benefit of the line. And why will they do this? Simply because they have a large amount of land, and the small quantity which they give for a road running through the centre of a large tract, is not for a moment to be taken into consideration in comparison with the advantages they will derive from the increased value of their land. This is in the nature of a voluntary surrender, and operates so as to make the rich man richer. Widely different, however, is it with the small land owner who perhaps has not more than thirty-five or forty acres, upon which, perhaps, he entirely depends for his own support and that of his family. If you run a line diagonally through his little farm is it likely that he can receive the same benefit in proportion to his amount of land that the large landholder does? No, sir. It is as obvious as demonstration that the large landholder will be benefited while the small one will be damaged. Can you, then, talk to him of "prospective advantages," when the fundamental law would operate thus unequally? Not at all; not at all. Let us, then, place corporate bodies upon the same footing on which you place private individuals, and when they want land for any public improvement, let the value of the land be honestly estimated; and if there be any dispute, let it be settled by a jury of freeholders to say what is right. You will not countenance a poor man going upon the lands of the rich man and helping himself to what he may find there; and why should a rich corporation go upon the land of a poor man and take it from him, and pay him with an imaginary advantage—something which he can never realize? As well might you say that a man who goes on to the prairies and enters a farm where there is no timber, but finding it in the neighborhood goes and helps himself. He might as well enter upon the timbered land of some landholder and take the timber, and when complaint was made, reply, "Oh, I am improving your land; I am improving the country, and by my improvement you will derive a prospective benefit." The man who would thus argue, would argue quite as logically and quite as morally as he who argues that it is lawful for corporations or associations of individuals to seize upon private property and appropriate it to their own use, and offer "prospective advantages" in payment.

I am then for doing away entirely with this provision; and I do verily believe that when gentlemen upon this floor investigate the subject and consider the injustice which it works, I think that they will be cautious in embodying such a principle in the organic law of the land which may last for ages; and I hope that they will come up as they did when the amendment of the gentleman from Jefferson was voted upon and put it in the organic law of the State as it ought to be, and settle the general principle as it ought to be settled here. Leave it not to any Legislature. Here is the place for the determination of the general principle; here is the place where the question ought to be definitively settled. There has been little said upon the real question at issue since the defeat of the amendment of the gentleman from Jefferson. The whole question has been between gentlemen representing those public works that are finished, and those representing those that are unfinished; the one party contending that it was time to cease the odious practice, and the other saying that they were not satisfied, and wanted it to go on a little further. Now I think we ought to come to the main point and say that every company incorporated by a general charter should enjoy all the privileges that one individual should enjoy, and no more. This I regard to be perfectly in accordance with the general principle implied by the gentleman from Laporte, (Mr. Niles,) who asked "what can be more just than justice itself." That would bring the matter down to an equality; and there is no equality in any law which would allow a party to seize upon the property of another without paying the full value of that property in dollars and cents. If persons owning property are willing to surrender it to corporate uses they have the privilege of doing so; and in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred of persons owning large tracts of land it will be done; but when persons owning but a small amount of land are to be absolutely injured in their property in the outset, and are to wait for prospective advantages to repay them, the principle would operate unequally, unjustly, and inequitably.

Let me give another example. We know that along some of the canals in the State, it is not uncommon for persons working upon them, to go and cut down a tree, and take, perhaps, only a part of it. No compensation is offered for it. Perhaps the party owning the timber may get his pay if he sues the company. Now, suppose that I was to enter upon the lands of the gentleman from Jefferson, and cut down his choice timber, and put it to my own use; I would be a violator of the law. I might suppose that I was benefiting him, while all the time I am doing him a positive injury. But the "benefit," which may be no "benefit," is made such by express provision of the law. Now, what benefit would the gentleman from Jefferson be deriving under the circumstances?

If, on the other hand, there was an express provision of law that the profits of the money invested in any public improvement, should be proportionately divided between the investing parties and those whose land might be taken for such improvement, then there would be some equity in the proceeding. Where is the individual who invests his money in the enterprises of corporate companies, without anticipating some profit from the investment? Nowhere.

Tell me not that men invest their capital for the purpose of advancing the general interests of a State, regardless of benefits to be derived by themselves. There is not an instance of the kind to be found. Then, if the object be to advance individual interests in a corporate capacity—then, if the primary object in chartering companies, be the advancement of individual interests in a corporate capacity, why grant them the privilege of taking private property for their own use?

Sir, I repeat again, that there never was any equity in it: there never was any reason in it: there never was any justice in it. So long as the practice exists, the men of small capital will be subjected to the will of the aristocracy; and I feel, therefore, that we are called upon here to settle the question that no corporation shall take the property of individuals, without giving for the same, present and adequate compensation. As I have several times repeated in these remarks, that is a question which ought to be settled here. Every right which is denied to individuals should be denied to corporations; and every right which is conceded to individuals should be conceded to corporations. Then we would come to the subject itself. Justice would operate most justly. The principle would operate equally, and in a way that would give general satisfaction, and we would then have a system that never could operate unequally upon the people of the State. [Applause.]

Mr. EDMONSTON. Mr. President: It is with great reluctance that I rise to say anything upon this subject after it has been so lengthily debated; but I feel that it is due to myself, and to this House, and to the country, that the question should be placed in its proper attitude. The question has been placed in a false position before the Convention. It is made to appear here that the object of those gentlemen who are in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn is to cripple the improvements of the country. Those who have heard the debates in this Hall, or who read them in the newspapers, cannot view the matter in any other light. Such, however, is not the question before this Convention. I presume that there is no delegate upon this floor that would wish, in the least degree, to throw any hindrance in the way of the improvement of the country. But the question is, after having granted certain powers to these companies, shall we say to them, "You shall take the land and make it a debt of honor?" Now I view the question in this light. What is it, let me ask gentlemen in this House, what is it that constitutes one of these companies if it be not wealth, talent, and self-interest? Does any gentleman here suppose that men would form themselves into companies for the purpose of constructing any work of improvement unless they had in view some exclusive benefit to be derived to themselves? Does any body suppose that there is so much patriotism in these companies that they institute these improvements for the benefit of the masses? No man will be found to entertain such an opinion. Then it is clear that if patriotism and a desire to benefit the masses be not the object, it must be self-interest. When, therefore, you pass an act of incorporation endowing a company with the privilege of others, you pass an act which no deliberative body would attempt for a moment to grant to an individual.

It has been said that the legislative body are the guardians of the people's interests, and that this is a subject which may safely be left to them. Sir, we have had some experience in this respect, and experience, after all, is the best teacher, though often an expensive one. What is the course that has been pursued before? Have past Legislatures guarded the rights of the people in this matter? Our experience shows the contrary. How many injuries of this kind have been perpetrated upon individuals without their receiving any remuneration whatever? Then, sir, if a legislative body, or this Convention, will not guarantee to an individual the right to take his neighbor's property and appropriate it to his own use, why leave a question of this sort to the discretion of a Legislature to make a provision for the purpose of guarding against the overpowering influence of combined wealth and talent?

We have already seen that they are governed by motives of self-interest; and we all know how little such a motive is likely to respect the interests of others. Look at the matter now, for a moment, in its operation upon the small landholder. Say that a man has a farm of only forty acres, which supports his family and himself. A chartered company enter that farm and run a line diagonally through it, thus destroying the value of the entire tract. The owner of the land complains, and asks the company for damages. The company laugh in his face, and exclaim, "Damages! damages! my good man! why, don't you know that it is a great benefit to you that we should take your land!" Thus mocked, he appeals to the Legislature, and the Legislature again mock him by telling him that he may have recourse to law, and force from the company the amount of damages assessed. I ask any lawyer here to tell me what prospect of success a poor man has in commencing a suit against one of these rich companies? In the first place, you could hardly get a lawyer to commence a suit against one of them short of a fee of a hundred dollars, and in all probability when it comes to trial the plaintiffs will be non-suited on some technicality, and be thrown in for the whole costs. Now is this right? Have we come here to guard and protect the rights and interests of those who have wealth and influence, or the dearest rights of the more indigent classes of the community, whose interests—if any distinction is to be made—it is more especially our duty to protect? Money can always protect itself. The whole history of the world shows it; and although we are here to frame Constitutional laws that shall operate equally upon all, if there is to be a leaning on the one side or on the other, for heaven's sake let it be on the side of those who stand most in need of the law as their shield from the encroachments of capital.

Now, as it regards leaving this question open for the Legislature to settle, I again repeat that legislative bodies are not usually composed of the same class of men as this Convention is, or at least as it should be. Members of Legislatures usually have sectional and local interests to subserve, and they not unfrequently pass laws under these influences which are opposed to fundamental principles. I trust, however, that no man comes here to subserve any local or sectional interests, but that he comes here with feelings and interests common to every citizen of the State; looking only to one interest—the interest of the whole; dealing out justice equally to all, and taking each under the protecting wing of the whole community. This is the great purpose for which we have come here. But you never can find it so in a merely legislative body.

It never has been so in my experience, and if we may judge of the future by the past, it never will be so in the experience of mortal man. You will see them holding on to their local interests; and combination of interests not unfrequently lead to extravagant legislation. It is said that a general law will be passed governing all these corporations. Grant that it may be so; will that remedy the evil? I think not, because a general law may be as easily amended or altered as a local law. There is no difference. Legislatures make inroads upon the charters of general corporations, as readily as they do upon local charters. You cannot affect it in that way. You must, on the contrary, with clearness and carefulness in your organic law, protect the rights of the honest portion of the community from all oppression that may be attempted by the influence of wealth or incorporated power. There should be no argument used here to the effect that, because the Madison and Indianapolis corporation had had exclusive privileges, therefore they should be granted to all other corporations. Sir, there is no force in such an argument. It simply amounts to this: that because a law has been in force granting to me the power of trespassing upon my neighbor, and because I have availed myself of the benefit of this law, therefore it should be continued in force, so that every other man may trespass upon his neighbor. And is this a doctrine to be maintained in this progressive age? No, sir; it surely cannot be. Rather let us, where we see wrongs committed, endeavor to correct them. Where an error is found to exist it is the duty of a legislative body to correct it, and not to perpetrate it again because it has been perpetrated before. If one man has stolen a horse, that is no reason why the Legislature should sanction any man in stealing another horse, [cries of "hear," "hear"]. This would be a poor mode of argument indeed.

Mr. President, I did not intend troubling the Convention with any remarks on this question, but from the course the debate has taken, I felt that it was due to myself and the country to endeavor to set the matter right. It is not by any means a question as to crippling the improvements of the State. There is no man on this floor who would be more happy to see the progress of the country in every respect than myself; at the same time I must say that I hold so much in my esteem the poor unassuming laborers of the country, that I would be the last man to throw into the hands of corporate powers the right to take the property of any man without giving him just compensation.

Now what is the purport of this amendment? It is that a man's property should not be taken, except in case of the State, unless there be an appraisement and the value in money tendered to the owner. You cannot compel a man by law to credit his neighbor; and why not then leave it optional with the individual himself who is possessed of the property. He may compromise with the company, and in many instances will do so; but whether he should or not, I hold it to be wrong in this body not to guard a man in this right against a corporation, as you would guard him against an individual. If you give to corporations these powers you give them powers sufficient to overturn the rights of all the people of the State.

Mr. STEELE said—

Mr. PRESIDENT: I do not rise for the purpose of extending this debate. For argument has been piled upon argument so much, that I wish only to explain the reason of my vote as it will be placed upon the journal. Not long since—perhaps last Saturday—I voted to prevent the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Holman) from going to the table. I gave that vote for the express purpose of hearing the subject further discussed. I thought the amendment had merit in it, and I desired to see it illustrated and set forth; but, I was all the time in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles).

Sir, I wish to vote consistently; and I intend that the vote which I shall give upon this question shall tally with the votes which I have already given in this Convention; and they have been uniformly cast against restrictions.

At the time I was last upon the floor, I desired that the election of officers should be placed in the hands of the people, and let them rotate their servants as they might think best, in their sovereign capacity; I have the same feeling to-day. And with reference to our public works, I want them to progress; and I tell you, sir, they will progress, whatever we may do in this Convention; and as they shall progress, I want the Legislature, the courts, and juries of the country, to assess the damages of the individual whose private property may be taken for public use. I find, upon examination of the journal of debates in the New York Convention, that they have settled this question in nearly the same language of the proposition of the gentleman from Laporte, namely—that no man's property shall be taken without just compensation—leaving it open for the Legislature to provide the law, the courts to adjudicate, and the jury to determine the amount of damages which the individual shall receive.

I have uniformly yielded much confidence to the words of the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) and to-day he has enlightened my mind by telling us that the people of the county of Posey have invested and applied between seventy and eighty thousand dollars towards the construction of plank roads; and that they have had no difficulty about securing the right of way under the law as it now stands. And I confess that I was strongly impressed with the gentleman's argument, which, as I applied it, was, that it would be wise policy for us to "let well enough alone." [A voice, "consent."] I believe that no man can show any important point of difference between the amendment of the gentleman from Laporte and the old constitutional provision; and I believe also, that the Legislature, the courts, and the people, to whose hands these cases have been so long entrusted, are just as honest as the members of this Convention, and can do their duty just as well. [Applause.]

Mr. BRACKEN. Mr. President: What is the question?

The PRESIDENT. The pending question is upon the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Dunn) to the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Holman).

Mr. BRACKEN. I understand, then, that if the amendment of the gentleman from Jefferson carries, the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn will be equivalent to the proposition of the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles).

The PRESIDENT again stated the question, and rehearsed the amendment, and the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BRACKEN. This question has been debated for some days, and it is rather a curious matter to me that the question has not yet been plainly answered. What is right, just, and honest in the case? For this is the question upon which we are this day called to vote. Does not justice belong to the people? Is it not their right to claim justice? The question has been argued here on the score of expediency, and gentlemen have gone so far in this way to support the power and influence of corporations, that it seems they have so bewildered their minds that they have forgotten that there is any such thing as right and justice.

They say, leave all to the management of the Legislature and the people. Well, sir, if I understand myself, we are the people, and there is no Legislature that ever has been, or ever will be, convened, which may be called the people, with the same propriety that we may be so called. This government has been, and will continue to be, divided into three branches—the Executive, the Legislative, and the Judicial branches. We are the people, and, if this be so, it is for us to settle and determine what is right and what is wrong—whether right or expediency shall govern. There never has yet appeared, in all the history of men, a single case of public injustice, which has not been justified upon the score of expediency. Every tyrant has been justified in this way; and, for every act of his oppression he has had preachers and courtiers, to come up and advocate his conduct upon the score of expediency. But, sir, the question before us, is not a question of expediency; it is a question of right. Expediency is a very different thing from the establishment of organic law. We have come here, so to speak, to post up the books of the political knowledge of the State, to have to do with fixed, axiomatic truths. The Legislature comes here to make experiments. Legislation is always experimental. Well, sir, what does experience teach us? Does not all experience most conclusively settle this one fact: that, unless you put the bit and curb upon corporations, they generally run away with private rights? I repeat, sir, that right is often a different thing from expediency; and this question is but another feature of the old contest for the antiquated principle, that, if the government take care of the rich and well born, they will take care of the masses. But, sir, this is not my doctrine. We have come up here to take care of the masses, and we will take care of them.

One gentleman says, this question has not been agitated amongst the people. But, I have reason to entertain a different opinion; for I was elected a delegate here upon this very question. I was able to carry my county by two hundred majority,—and a whig county at that—upon this very principle, of the necessity of curbing the power of corporations. Should we then go back?—who, in this body, would be willing to go back and legislate for the benefit of the rich and well-born? I know that wealth and talent commonly go together, and, that they have a certain community of interest and influence. But it is not so with the honest yeomanry—they do not move together in phalanxes. Hence, it is, that the crafty and the wealthy often take them by surprise, and overreach and get the advantage of them. Therefore, I have said we ought to post up the books, so that this advantage may not be so easily taken.

Sir, it is an outrage to take private property without pay. None but the hand of the sovereign can do that, and I doubt whether it should be done at all. Take a man's property without pay!—why, sir, it is an outrage upon every principle of right—it is wrong, sir, radically wrong. Gentlemen may cover it up as much as they please, and still it will be oppression and wrong —one of those means, as all experience shows, by which power and influence gradually slips away from the many to the few.

Gentlemen have raised the cry of "mad dogs" against the Madison and Indianapolis railroad, showing that, with this improvement, there was established a system of stealing from the citizens of Indiana. They acknowledge this—their very argument shows that they have given an advantage to corporations; and, because they have succeeded in the case of this railroad, they desire to let them carry the same system all over the State. This is the deliberate argument. But, I insist that we are not here to settle principles which will favor any such doings, but to settle what is true, politic, and right. For example; if we intend to pay the public debt, should we not come up and make the Constitution say so? And, if we intend to compel corporations to pay their just debts, should we not say so?

Mr. NAVE. About five minutes time is all I ask. I am very much gratified that the gentleman who has just taken his seat succeeded so handsomely in his canvassing for the Convention; yet I am sorry to say, that he does not seem yet to understand very well the principles which should govern in the establishment of the organic law. The organic law consists of definite and well established principles; and I ask, if we should go further than to say that the Legislature shall never pass a law authorizing the taking of property for public use without just compensation? Should we go one step further than this, we would place ourselves in the same ridiculous attitude of the framers of the Constitution of 1816, when they appropriated all fines and forfeitures for the purpose of building up schools at the county seats. If they had stopped in that section of the Constitution at the word "education," the constitutional reform in this respect would never have been called for.

Gentleman ask us to gag and trammel the power of the Legislature for the purpose of carrying out their party views. Sir, is there anything like Democracy in tying up the hands of the people and the Legislature of the State, and crippling their most rightful power and influence.

Are we the people of Indiana? No, sir. We are but the delegates of the people. We are not clothed with the power of the sovereign; and, therefore, we should never pretend to restrain that power beyond those restraints which pertain to the organic law. I hope, then, to hear no more about Democracy, as opposed to corporations; but that the Convention will be allowed to go to work and construct the organic law, with an eye single to the protection of human rights and human liberty, taking care not to establish any restrictions upon the power of the people in any way whatever.

Mr. PETTIT. I ask for the yeas and nays upon this question.

And there was a second.

Mr. TAYLOR. I hope the Convention will indulge me, to call for the reading of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT then rehearsed the various amendments, and stated the question to be upon the amendment of the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Dunn,) proposing to strike out all after the word "compensation" from the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Holman).

The yeas and nays having been demanded and ordered, were now taken, and reported, yeas 45, nays 74, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Badger, Balingall, Beach, Beard, Bicknell, Blythe, Bourne, Bright, Butler, Carter, Colfax, Davis of Parke, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Foley, Frisbie, Gordon, Gregg, Hall, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Howe, Kilgore, Kinley, Maguire, Morgan, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Pepper of Crawford, Rariden, Read of Clark, Robinson, Sims, Steele, Stevenson, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Walpole, Watts, and Wolfe—45.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Barbour, Bascom, Beeson, Berry, Bracken, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Edmonston, Fisher, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Holliday, Harbolt, Hardin, Hitt, Hugin, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Warren, Lockhart, Logan, March, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Prather, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Tague, Wheeler, Wiley, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—74.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected; and the question renewed upon the adoption of Mr. Holman's amendment.

Mr. PETTIT. I am thoroughly satisfied myself, that this matter has been long enough debated, and that no gentleman can reasonably desire to debate it any further. Therefore I shall demand the previous question.

There was a second to this demand, and the question, shall the main question be now put? was decided in the affirmative.

And then the yeas and nays being ordered and taken upon the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn, they were reported; yeas 86, nays 35, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Barbour, Bascom, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Bourne, Bracken, Carter, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Fisher, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Goozee, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Holliday, Harbolt, Hardin, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Kent, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Taylor, Terry, Thornton, Wheeler, Wiley, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—86.

YAYS—Badger, Balingall, Beach, Beard, Blythe, Bright, Butler, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Foley, Frisbie, Gordon, Gregg, Hall, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Howe, Jones, Kendall of Warren, Kilgore, Kinley, Morgan, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Rariden, Robinson, Sims, Steele, Thomas, Walpole, Watts, and Wolfe—35.

So Mr. Holman's amendment was adopted.

The PRESIDENT stated that the question in order was the amendment of the gentleman from Franklin, (Mr. Berry,) to the substitute of the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles).

Mr. NILES' amendment was now read by the Secretary, and is as follows:

"That no man's particular services shall be demanded, or property taken and applied to public use, without just compensation being made therefor."

Mr. BERRY proposing to amend the substitute as follows:

"Strike out all after 'man's' and insert 'services shall be taken without compensation. Private property shall not be taken by law against the consent of the owner, for any other purposes than the defense of the State and the right of way for public improvement, and when taken for these purposes, it shall be paid for in money, irrespective of intrinsic benefit, in such manner as shall be directed by the General Assembly.'"

Mr. EDMONSTON. I move to lay the amendment to the amendment on the table.

The PRESIDENT said: that motion could not be in order, for the reason that the whole subject was under the operation of the previous question. If the gentleman would turn to the eighteenth rule adopted by the Convention, he would find that the operation of the previous question was very broad; and he read the following extract from said rule:

"The previous question shall be in this form: 'shall the main question be now put?' It shall be admitted only when demanded by a majority of the members present; and its effects shall be to put an end to all debate and bring the Convention to a direct vote upon amendments reported by a committee, if any; then upon pending amendments, and then upon the main question."

Mr. PETTIT. Is the question now upon an amendment to the section as originally reported by the chairman of the committee on rights and privileges? And was not the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn, which was adopted, also an amendment to the section reported by the Committee?

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark that the gentleman from Dearborn originally offered an amendment to the section reported by the committee, and the gentleman from Posey offered an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn, which that gentleman accepted.

Mr. PETTIT. The gentleman from Posey accepted the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn?

The PRESIDENT. No; the gentleman has got it wrong end foremost.

The yeas and nays being now demanded, ordered, and taken, upon Mr. Berry's amendment to Mr. Niles' substitute, the vote was reported; yeas 35, nays 85, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Berry, Bourne, Bright, Carter, Chapman, Cole, Cookerly, Crawford, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Edmonston, Foster, Goozee, Hardin, Hitt, Jones, Lockhart, March, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gibson, Ritchey, Sherrod, Smith of Scott, Spann, Terry, Wiley, and Mr. President—35.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Badger, Balingall, Barbour, Beeson, Bicknell, Blythe, Bracken, Butler, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Holliday, Harbolt, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Kent, Kendall of Warren, Kilgore, Kinley, Logan, Maguire, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Monroe, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, Wolfe, Yocum, and Zenor—85.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT stated the question to be on the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles).

Mr. RARIDEN. That is the motion to strike out and insert "no man's particular services shall be demanded without just compensation. No man's property shall be taken without compensation therefor." Is that the substance of the amendment?

The PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. RARIDEN. Then that is the proposition which I desire to see adopted. I believe it is going far enough and I think that it is now evident that it is the best proposition upon which the Convention can agree.

Upon this motion the yeas and nays were demanded by ten members, and being ordered, resulted yeas—47, nays—72, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Badger, Balingall, Barbour, Beach, Beard, Bicknell, Blythe, Bourne, Bright, Butler, Colfax, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Gordon, Gregg, Hall, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Howe, Kendall of Warren, Maguire, Milligan, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Robinson, Sims, Steele, Stevenson, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, and Zenor—47.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Beeson, Berry, Bracken, Carter, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Edmonston, Fisher, Garvin, Gibson, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Holliday, Harbolt, Hardin, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Jones, Kent, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, March, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Tague, Terry, Wheeler, Wiley, Yocum, and Mr. President—72.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHOUP. If it is in order I will move the previous question, on engrossing the article.

The PRESIDENT. Is the call for the previous question seconded?

The call for the previous question was sustained.

Mr. FOSTER. I question whether the motion, in the shape in which it was made, is in order.

Mr. COLFAX. There is certainly one section in this article which has never yet been read.

The PRESIDENT. The whole article has been before the Convention for several days.

Mr. PETTIT. Mr. President: I rise to a question of order. The pending question is not upon the engrossment of the article which is endorsed "number two," but upon the section of that article relative to compensation for private property taken for public use. It cannot be upon the whole article for there is a section therein which has not yet been touched. The question must be upon the engrossment of the section for a third reading.

The PRESIDENT. It is not customary to take the question upon engrossing a single clause or section of a bill or article.

Mr. PETTIT. But I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that we are suddenly required to vote upon an entire article, one section of which has not yet been read to the Convention.

The PRESIDENT. All the sections of the article have been printed together and read the first time. The whole article has now been before the Convention.

Mr. PETTIT. The article has not yet been read a second time.

Mr. COLFAX. If it would be in order to move a re-consideration—

The PRESIDENT. It is out of order, we are now under a call for the previous question.

Mr. COLFAX. Advantage has been taken of members in this matter by springing the previous question upon the engrossment of the whole article for a third reading.

The PRESIDENT. Are the yeas and nays demanded upon the engrossment of the article for its third reading?

The requisite number having risen and demanded the yeas and nays, the clerk was about to call the roll when:

Mr. PETTIT rose and said: Mr. President, I feel constrained to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair. I do not do so with any desire to embarrass the Chair, nor yet to find fault with the Chair—further than is really necessary. I feel constrained to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair, that the pending question is properly upon the engrossment for a third reading of an article, one section of which has not received a moment's consideration, although that section is intensely interesting and important to the great majority of members. The section to which I allude is the last section in the article and is this:

The General Assembly at its first session under the amended Constitution, shall pass laws prohibiting negroes and mulattoes from coming into or settling in this State; and prohibiting any negro or mulattoe from purchasing or otherwise acquiring real estate hereafter.

I do not think, sir, that the question should be taken on the engrossment of an article for a third reading when sections of that article have not been read a second time. I know of no rule allowing the engrossment of an isolated section of an article. On the contrary, the rule is that we should vote upon propositions by sections, and not by articles. I hope that the question may be taken upon the engrossment of the third section and not upon the whole article.

Mr. COOKERLY. I think the whole article has been read—though I may be mistaken.

Mr. PETTIT. No, sir, the whole article has not been read a second time.

Mr. RITCHEY. Has not the second section of this article been engrossed for a third reading?

The PRESIDENT. It has not.

Mr. MILLER. It strikes me, sir, that gentlemen do not view this matter in its proper light. It seems to me that gentlemen have forgotten the course taken. We have taken up the article under consideration, (on the rights and privileges of the people of Indiana) debated it for several days, concluded the consideration of several articles and now the previous question has been called for on the adoption of the whole article. The Convention has sustained the call for the previous question, which, not only cuts off all debate, but precludes all amendments to any part of the article. This is the state of the case, and the President, now that the Convention has sustained the call for the previous question which cuts off all amendments to or discussion upon any part of the article, can take no other course than the one he is pursuing. This is my view of the matter which seems to be exciting an unjustifiable amount of feeling.

Mr. PETTIT. The previous question was so suddenly sprung upon us that we had no opportunity offered to discuss or amend the last section.

Mr. DOBSON. We have had nearly a week of discussion upon this article and may perhaps have still more. I hope that gentlemen will keep cool. It is certainly the duty of the Chair to put the question as demanded by a clear vote of the Convention.

The PRESIDENT. The question is, shall the article now be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. COLFAX. One word, Mr. President. I desire to call the attention of gentlemen and of the Chair, to the twenty-first rule of this Convention. That rule provides that, "the article or section shall be subject to be debated and amended by clauses, before a question to engross it be taken."

Now I would inquire of the Chair, whether the last section of this article has ever been debated, or so before the Convention as to be "subject to be amended?" There has, as the gentleman from Tippecanoe observed, been no opportunity to do this. As it seems to me, that sections must be read separately at the Clerk's table, and be subject to debate and amendment, before a question to engross it can be taken.

I would ask if a motion to lay the article on the table would take precedence of the previous question? If so I should be glad to get this matter into such a shape as to relieve the Convention from its unpleasant position.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark, that it has no feeling upon this subject upon either side. Personally it is a matter of indifference what decision the Convention comes to. But the Chair understands the rule differently from the gentleman from St. Joseph (Mr. Colfax.) Reports may sometimes contain but one section, then again several. So far as my knowledge of parliamentary usage extends, and I admit my observation has been limited, I have never heard of such a proceeding as the engrossment of one section, or of several sections of a report, a bill, or an article, leaving one section or several, "hanging loose" (if the expression may be allowed.) I have neither seen, read or heard of, such a course being pursued. If the Convention shall decide to consider this section by itself and to order its separate engrossment for a third reading, I have not the least objection and shall not have the least feeling. This article has now been under consideration for about one week and if gentlemen have seen fit to direct all their energies to the consideration of one section, it certainly is not the fault of the Chair.

I would remark, however, that gentlemen who desire the further consideration of the last section will accomplish their object by voting against the motion to engross the article for a third reading.

Mr. COLFAX. If a majority votes against the engrossment, will it not defeat the article entirely?

The PRESIDENT. No, sir, not necessarily. The gentleman can move a reconsideration of the vote.

Mr. PETTIT. If it is the pleasure of the Convention, I will withdraw my appeal from the decision of the Chair. I had, as I stated, no intention to embarrass the Chair.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair is not at all embarrassed.

Mr. PETTIT. Well, then, I did not intend to embarrass the Convention. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRAHAM. I move a reconsideration of the vote sustaining the call for the previous question.

Mr. BERRY asked if he could withdraw his call for the previous question?

The PRESIDENT. The question is, shall the main question be now put?

The gentleman from Franklin can attain his object by voting against putting the main question now.

The Convention decided against putting the main question now.

A MEMBER. Would an amendment now be in order.

The PRESIDENT. The further consideration of the article lies over for one day, under the rules.

On motion, the Convention adjourned.

TUESDAY, Nov. 12th, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. MYERS.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. WALPOLE moved to take from the table a motion which he had made on a former day, in reference to amending the rules.

The motion was agreed to, and the resolution was taken up.

It is as follows:

"Strike out all after the word, 'majority,' in the beginning of the third line, and insert the following:

"To move for the reconsideration thereof, on the same, or any other day, during the session of this Convention."

The question was taken on the agreeing to the amendment, and decided in the affirmative.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. OWEN, pursuant to notice given yesterday, moved the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the rules be so amended that each section of the amended Constitution may be separately engrossed."

The resolution having been read by the Secretary,

Mr. HALL said: Mr. President, it occurs to me that we shall be involved in difficulty by the adoption of this rule. Such a thing as engrossing a section of a bill by itself, is never heard of; and as it occurs to me, the different sections of the same article are placed almost in the same position as the different sections of the same bill passed by the Legislature. I am not opposed to the principle, but I think that we shall embarrass ourselves if we determine that we will take a separate vote upon each section.

Mr. GRAHAM of Warrick, moved to amend the resolution of the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) by adding the words, "or passed." I look upon each section, said Mr. G., as forming a distinct proposition, and, in my opinion, each ought to be passed separately.

Mr. FOSTER. I differ a little with my friend on my right, (Mr. Graham,) in regard to the position that each section should form a distinct proposition. The committee have reported merely blank sections, and it will be the duty of the committee of arrangement hereafter to arrange them under their appropriate heads. What can be more distinct and different than the section which we had under consideration the other day, and the one that will come up to-day, in relation to negroes. They are entirely different, although they have reference to the same subject; therefore, we should pass them separately.

Every section of a bill passed by the Legislature must have some relation to the preceding section; but here, until the final arrangement takes place, they are entirely incongruous. Under these circumstances, I conceive that the proposition of the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) is correct. Pass them separately, and let the committee of arrangement arrange them under their proper heads.

Mr. STEVENSON. I have but a single objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Posey, and that is, the immense number of times that it will occasion the calling of the yeas and nays.

The object of the gentleman I suppose to be this: to give each member an opportunity to express his opinion of each section, by recording his vote upon its adoption. But this object is accomplished by proposing amendments. If a gentleman disapproves of a section, he can move an amendment and call the yeas and nays. This he may do as many times as he pleases. Well, now, the proposition of the gentleman will give the yeas and nays on every section separately, in addition to all this. It appears to me, that if gentlemen have an opportunity of showing what their views are in relation to each section by amendments, and by recording their votes upon those amendments, it is sufficient, without having the yeas and nays on the final engrossment; and an immense amount of time will be saved. I desire to show how I stand in regard to all these propositions, but that I can do by amendments; and upon their final passage it is wholly unnecessary to put the Convention to the trouble of repeating the yeas and nays upon each section by itself. It will occasion an immense amount of trouble, and I think there is no necessity for it.

Mr. OWEN said he would accept the amendment of his friend on the left, (Mr. Graham,) to insert the words "or passed."

He would remark to the gentleman from Gibson (Mr. Hall,) that although it was customary to take the question on the engrossment of all the sections of a bill together, yet the sections of a bill and the sections of the Constitution were entirely different things. Take for example, said Mr. O., the case of the two sections that are to be considered by the Convention this day. What possible connection is there between taking a man's personal services or property, on certain conditions, and the policy of excluding negroes from the State? Nothing in the world can be further apart. A section reported here, stands not only in the place of the bill, but sometimes in the place of a whole class of bills. Gentlemen will perceive that in the resolution as I proposed it, the word "may" is used. It is not imperative. It does not direct that each section shall, under all circumstances, be separately engrossed. When no necessity exists therefor, and no desire is manifested to call the yeas and nays upon the engrossment of a particular section, they will not be called; but it merely provides that the yeas and nays may be taken upon the engrossment of each section separately if the Convention desired it.

The gentlemen from Putnam says, that we may at all times express our views by our votes on amendments; but I put it to the good sense of the gentleman, whether, as the matter now stands, we have an opportunity of showing whether we are willing to take the section just as it stands or not. There will be on the proposition to exclude negroes, an opportunity to propose amendments and modifications, but the question will recur at last whether we will adopt the section at all or not. And so of other sections.

The question being taken on the adoption of the resolution, it was decided in the affirmative. So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. SHERROD in pursuance of notice previously given, asked and obtained leave to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That no member, in making a speech upon an original proposition or resolution, shall occupy more than thirty minutes; and on an amendment more than ten minutes.

The adoption of this resolution, said Mr. S., will not only have a tendency to condense the proceedings and debates of this Convention, but will greatly facilitate and hasten our deliberations to a speedy and happy close, which should be greatly desired by every member. Sir, I hope the resolution will be adopted.

Mr. GRAHAM of Warrick said, he certainly could not go for the proposition of the gentleman from Orange. There were questions yet to be debated, upon which gentlemen would find it exceedingly inconvenient to express their views within the time prescribed by the resolution. Unless some gentleman desired to discuss the resolution, he would move that it be laid upon the table.

Mr. WATTS rising to address the Chair,

Mr. GRAHAM withdrew his motion to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. WATTS. I will move to amend the resolution by adding the words "without leave of the Convention."

Mr. SHERROD. I do not desire, sir, to deprive the gentlemen of an opportunity of expressing their views upon every question that is presented here; but we have talked a great deal in this Convention about placing restrictions and limitations upon the people, in the Constitution that we are about forming, but not a word has been said about restrictions upon our debates. I am of opinion, sir, that there is no question that can be brought before this body, upon which any gentleman upon this floor cannot give his opinion in thirty minutes. I have noticed, particularly, the course that has been pursued by delegates in this Convention, in the debates that have taken place. In speaking upon the various questions that have been submitted, they have frequently referred to the proceedings and debates of the Constitutional Convention of the State of New York; and sir, what was the course pursued there? Members were restricted in debates, to fifteen minutes each; and the volume containing their debates and proceedings is a very interesting one; why? because the ideas and opinions of men in that Convention, and of distinguished men, too, are condensed within fifteen minutes in the delivery. Why, I might get up here and talk for two hours on many of the important questions that will engage the attention of this body, but there is no necessity for so much talking, and what I want is to induce gentlemen here to condense their ideas, and not talk eternally on a question which may not be of any practical interest.

As I have said, it is not my purpose to suppress debate. But thirty minutes, I think, is long enough for the full expression of opinion upon any question. But more than that, if there should be a question before the body which is interesting and important in itself, and any delegate discussing it should be throwing light upon the subject, by general consent he may be permitted to proceed.

I hope the resolution will be adopted.

The question being upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Watts) to add the words, "without leave of the Convention."

Mr. SHERROD said he would accept the amendment:

Mr. CRUMBACKER said, that as he was not one of the debaters, and had not troubled the Convention with any long speeches, it might not be considered inappropriate for him to make a few remarks in reference to the resolution just submitted.

If I have not, said Mr. CRUMBACKER, taken any great part in the debates, it is not because I have not felt a deep interest in the questions that have been debated; and there are some important questions yet to be presented for our action—questions of so much importance that I trust the wisdom, and sound, and enlightened views of all the members of this Convention may be brought to bear upon them, in order that they may be settled and adjusted in such manner as will be calculated to promote the best interests of the people of the State.

I should be very sorry, indeed, to see a gag law enforced in this Convention; and I am of opinion that this resolution should not prevail, from the fact that there are questions requiring argument, which will come before the Convention for our decision. I am desirous of hearing all that may be said, in order that I may be prepared to come to a correct conclusion upon each proposition. I do hope there will be no effort at this early stage of our proceedings, to restrain free discussion upon questions of so much importance as those which will necessarily be presented to us. I shall vote against the resolution for the reason that I think it entirely too soon to endeavor to limit or restrict the free course of debate.

Mr. GRAHAM of Warrick. The gentleman from Orange, in accepting the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn, has so modified his resolution that it will be entirely inoperative. It amounts now to nothing more than this, that no gentleman shall speak more than thirty minutes, unless he desires to speak longer; because the Convention will certainly not be so discourteous as to refuse to hear a gentleman who asks to be heard; and one gentleman being permitted to exceed the prescribed time, it would of course be considered an act of injustice towards others to refuse to extend to them the same privilege. If the gentleman desires to have such a stringent rule adopted that members shall not occupy more than thirty minutes at any one time in addressing the Convention, he ought not to have accepted the modification. But I am opposed to the adoption of any such gag law. We are sent here by the people to transact certain business; and we are not directed to do our work within a given time, we are not limited to any particular time; we are sent here to discuss calmly and deliberately, all those questions that are presented for our consideration. There are many questions on which my mind is not yet made up, and I am anxious, therefore, to hear arguments advanced by gentlemen upon those questions, in order that I may be enabled to form a correct judgment.

Sir, there are men who can tell all they know in thirty minutes. There is no doubt about that. I never expect to make a speech thirty minutes long, or the half of thirty minutes. But there are others who have more thoroughly investigated the subjects that are to be debated here whose views and opinions I desire to hear, and who will require a longer time than thirty minutes to explain their views fully. Some gentlemen may say that their opinions are already formed, and that they are not to be changed by argument. But opinions have been changed, and will be changed by the arguments of those who have qualified themselves by a thorough investigation of a subject to give us the benefit of a matured judgment.

If no gentleman desires to discuss this question I will move that the resolution be laid upon the table.

Mr. PETTIT. Consent.

Messrs. SHERROD and PEPPER of Crawford, demanded the yeas and nays.

Ten members rising, the yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken were, yeas 62, nays 52, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Badger, Balingall, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Carr, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Crumbacker, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Edmonston, Foster, Frisbie, Gibson, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Hall, Hawkins, Holman, Hovey, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Warren, Kilgore, Kinley, March, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Prather, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Shannon, Shoup, Sims, Snook, Spann, Steele, Terry, Thornton, Wiley, Wunderlich, and Mr. President.—52.

NAYS.—Messrs. Beard, 'Beeson, Blythe, Bourne, Bracken, Butler, Coats, Colfax, Cookery, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dunn of

Perry, &c., Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Garvin, Gootee, Gordon, Haddon, Holliday, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Howe, Huff, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, May, McClelland, Miller of Fulton, Moore, Morgan, Newman, Nofsinger, Pepper of Crawford, Read of Clark, Schoonover, Sherrod, Smiley, Stevenson, Tague, Taylor, Watts, Wheeler, Wolfe, Yocum, and Zenor—52.

So the resolution was laid upon the table.

Mr. MORRISON of Washington, from the committee "on education," submitted the following report:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The committee on education to whom was referred a resolution of the Convention instructing them to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the General Assembly to invest the profits arising from the State Bank in State stocks, or in State Bank stock, have had the subject under consideration, and have directed me to report that the committee are unanimous in the opinion that the General Assembly should be left free to select the best and safest investment for the common school funds. They, therefore, report the resolution back to the Convention, with a recommendation that it be laid on the table, and ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

The report was concurred in.

RIGHTS AND PRIVILEGES.

The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of the order of the day, being the section relating to taking private property for public use.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is the section still open to amendment.

The PRESIDENT. No, sir. The Convention yesterday sustained the call for the previous question, and afterwards refused to order the main question to be put; but reconsidered the vote seconding the demand for the previous question. The question now is, will the Convention second the call for the previous question.

Mr. PETTIT. What will the vote be upon if the previous question is sustained?

The PRESIDENT. On the engrossment of the article.

Mr. PETTIT. We have just adopted a rule that the question shall be taken upon the engrossment of each section separately.

The PRESIDENT. The question may be taken upon each separately.

Mr. PETTIT. Well is not the motion to engross amendable?

The PRESIDENT. If the Convention refuse to sustain the previous question it will leave the whole bill in the power of the Convention to amend, or otherwise, as they may determine.

Mr. EDMONSTON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will remark to the gentleman that debate is not in order.

The question being put on seconding the demand for the previous question; it was not seconded.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I now move that all the sections which were agreed to yesterday, that is all the sections except the last, be engrossed.

Mr. LOCKHART. Is it in order now to offer an amendment?

The PRESIDENT. It depends upon the character of the amendment.

Mr. LOCKHART. It is to amend the section by adding certain words.

The PRESIDENT. Such an amendment will be in order.

Mr. LOCKHART. The amendment is the following:

"Provided, That if the owner thereof, shall be a non-resident, a feme covert, infant, idiot, or lunatic, or in any way incapacitated from transacting business, it shall be deemed and taken as a valid tender or payment, to pay the amount of such assessment into the clerks office of the circuit court of the proper county, for the use of the owner: Provided further, That either party to such assessment shall have the right of appeal, under such restrictions and limitations as the Legislature shall prescribe."

The amendment having been read,

Mr. PETTIT. I rise to a question of order. It seems to me that this matter was fully settled yesterday. The previous question cuts off all further amendments.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will remark to the gentleman from Tippecanoe, that the Convention has reversed its action of yesterday, in reference to the previous question.

Mr. EDMONSTON. It does seem to me that the amendment of the gentleman from Vanderburg, is entirely legislative in its character. Unless some gentleman desires to make a speech upon it, I will move that it be laid upon the table.

Mr. LOCKHART rose to address the Chair.

Mr. EDMONSTON. If the gentleman wishes to make any remarks, I will withdraw the motion to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. PETTIT. If in order, I will move that the three sections that we have perfected, be engrossed.

The PRESIDENT. That motion is already made.

Mr. PETTIT. Then I call for the previous question.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I was under the impression that we were first to have a vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Vanderburg.

Mr. PETTIT. Was it not withdrawn?

Mr. EDMONSTON. No, sir; the motion to lay the amendment upon the table was withdrawn.

Mr. LOCKHART said, that the section about to be engrossed, was far superior now to what it was when it came from the committee; but that it was yet radically defective. As it now is, any public work, it matters not how trivial, or how important, might be retarded for an indefinite period. By the provisions of this section, it is made imperative on any railroad or plank road company, or other corporation that may desire to construct any public work through any tract of land, that the damages shall first be assessed and paid, or tendered to the owner. In many cases a tender could not be made without great expense and vexatious delays. Suppose the owner to reside in New York, Boston, or Liverpool: the company must hunt him up and pay him, or tender payment. It sometimes happens too, that the owner is incapable of receiving pay. In such cases, neither payment or tender would be of any service.

By adopting the amendment he proposed, the section would read, that "No man's particular services shall be demanded without just compensation. No man's property shall be taken without compensation; nor, except in case of the State, without such compensation first assessed and tendered to the owner: Provided, That if the owner thereof shall be a non-resident, a feme covert, infant, idiot or lunatic, or in any way incapacitated from transacting business, it shall be deemed and taken as a valid tender or payment, to pay the amount of such assessment into the clerk's office of the circuit court of the proper county, for the use of the owner: Provided, further, That either party to such assessment shall have the right of appeal, under such restrictions and limitations as the Legislature shall prescribe."

Mr. L., continuing, said, it seemed to him that no proposition could be plainer, than that the Convention should adopt this amendment, or else come back to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles). That amendment, he thought preferable to any yet proposed. He begged to assure the Convention that, in proposing this amendment, he did not wish to retard its action; his only aim was to make the section as palatable as possible.

Mr. PETTIT. I am satisfied, sir, that we have had debate enough upon this subject. I move that the amendment be laid upon the table.

The question being put on the motion of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, it was, upon a division—yeas 65, noes not counted—decided in the affirmative.

So the amendment was laid upon the table.

Mr. PETTIT. I now move that the first three sections of the article, that have been already acted upon, be engrossed, and ordered to a third reading.

The PRESIDENT. That motion is already made.

Mr. PETTIT. I move, then, the previous question.

The PRESIDENT. The question before the Convention is, will they second the demand for the previous question?

On this motion, a division being called for, it was decided in the affirmative—57 yeas, 24 nays.

So the previous question was seconded.

The PRESIDENT. The question for the Convention to decide is, shall the main question be now put.

This question was also decided in the affirmative.

The PRESIDENT. The main question is upon ordering the three sections of this article to be engrossed for a third reading.

The question was put and decided in the affirmative.

The PRESIDENT. There are now two articles which have been under consideration, portions of each of which have been ordered to be engrossed. No time has been fixed, as yet, for their third reading, and the rule is, that after the engrossment of articles or sections, a day shall be fixed upon for their third reading. Will the Convention fix upon a day for the third reading of those articles?

Mr. READ of Clark moved that the sections engrossed be read a third time on to-morrow.

The question was put, and decided in the negative.

Mr. PETTIT. Although the rule on this question appears to be imperious, yet it is within our control. It is not of so imperative a character as that it is necessary to appoint a day now. It is true, that when articles are engrossed a day should be appointed for their third reading, but it does not matter whether we appoint that day immediately after their engrossment or subsequently.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair is under the impression that immediately after the engrossment of articles, a day must be fixed upon for their third reading. As the Convention were about passing over the subject, the Chair thought it necessary to call their attention to the rule in relation to it.

Mr. READ of Clark. I move that these sections be read a third time on Monday next.

Mr. PETTIT. I should like to inquire of the Chair whether, in case the motion of the gentleman is adopted, the third reading of these sections will be the special order for Monday next, or whether it will come up as a general order? It is not to be expected that we will read them a third time on that day; the fixing of the day, it appears to me, is merely a matter of form.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the third reading of these sections will not be the special, but the general order for Monday next.

Mr. DOBSON. I hope the usual course of procedure on this subject will be adopted. It is always customary when an article is engrossed, say to-day, to order its third reading on to-morrow. If this rule is not carried out, I fear we shall get into confusion. If we say to-morrow, we need not necessarily read the articles to-morrow. It is only the usual form of procedure.

The question was taken upon the motion of the gentleman from Clark, (Mr. Read,) and it was agreed to.

RIGHTS OF NEGROES.

The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of the fourth section of the second article, reported from the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of the State.

Mr. HOWE moved to strike out the entire section.

Mr. HOWE said, I consider it my duty. Mr. President, to offer this amendment to the present section at the earliest practicable period. I offer it, sir, because I object to the measure contained in the section, and because I would avoid, if possible, the consequences that will necessarily follow from its adoption, without, at the same time, submitting it separately to the people. If it is to be forced upon us no lentes aut volentes, I am in favor of submitting the question, in a distinct form, to the people under whose authority we have assembled here. If we had assembled here in accordance with the present Constitution, which was adopted some thirty-four years since, and which is, in my judgment, binding in all things, as to the time when and manner in which it may be amended, or a new one established, I should not have offered an amendment of this kind, but the Constitution we are about to make, if adopted, will receive all its efficacy—whatever that may be—from the consent of the people, and therefore there is no greater impropriety in submitting a distinct proposition than in submitting the entire Constitution. If the fiat of the people is to make this Constitution valid and binding, then their fiat may also make any distinct proposition that may be submitted to them valid and binding. I state this by way of explanation, to show the ground on which I have offered this amendment. I again repeat, that if we were assembled here agreeably to the provisions of the organic law, under which we have lived for the last thirty-four years, and under which we can only amend the same once in twelve years, which provision is as binding as any other in that organic law, we could not validly submit any distinct proposition whatever to the people. Such a proceeding would be unauthorised.

If it is objected that we have no express or implied authority to submit anything to the people but an entire Constitution, and not its parts, I answer that we are estopped from setting up this objection. Assembling, as we have done, agreeably to the votes of the people, and the law of the Legislature, only the Constitution we shall make—if adopted by vote—will become de facto the organic law in virtue of that adoption, and consequent acquiescence under it, and a similar vote may, with equal propriety, adopt or reject a single section.

The Constitution we are about to make, then, may, by the consent of the people, become the organic law de facto. We are therefore all interested in making it as perfect as possible, and avoiding, if possible, the danger of its rejection as a whole. So much for the object had in offering this amendment.

One other ground I may urge under this head although not strictly in order; but it comes within the scope of the argument. There is another section in this article which has already passed, and which will most probably succeed on its third reading. I refer to the section immediately preceding the one now under consideration. There are many important consequences which will follow from the insertion of this section into the organic law, which but few gentlemen have appeared to consider in their true light. I refer to the section in regard to compensation for personal services and property. Gentlemen have not reflected upon the fact that by this section some hundred thousand dollars of additional expense may be entailed upon this State. They may not be aware of the fact that this section, by a just construction, will require the State, in every instance of criminal prosecution, to pay her own costs where she is cast. Will the people of this State, I ask, be willing to submit to such a consequence as that? To say the least, this will be a novel practice, and one that has been adopted in no other State of this Union to my knowledge, and if there is any honor at all connected with it, it will result from its novelty alone. Under the practice elsewhere before many criminal tribunals informers, when acting from malicious motives, may be mulcted with the costs. The non-payment of witnesses in a criminal cause, where the State does not prevail, is a grievous wrong, but the whole subject, with all its exigencies, should be provided against in a code and not in a Constitution. This section then, if left as it is, enhances the danger of a rejection of the whole.

In view then of the fact that this Constitution is to undergo a trying scrutiny by the people, let us endeavor to make it as perfect as possible, and prevent the insertion of any provision which will endanger its adoption.

In relation to the section now under consideration; although I must say that I am not prepared to declare what are the sentiments of the people of other portions of the State; yet, I know that I speak the minds of those I more immediately represent, when I say that if the sentiments of the people in my part of the State shall generally prevail, the rejection of the Constitution, if this section is engrafted in it, is sure and certain. Why, sir, a more tyrannical and unjust provision could not be inserted. It is not only opposed to the fundamental principles of liberty, justice, and equality, but I undertake to say it is in defiance of the Constitution of the United States itself. It is unfashionable to talk about guaranteed rights, contracts, Constitutions, and the ordinance of '87, or any ancient obligations in questions of this sort, when the sentiment of a popular majority is in the way; but at the same time, as an honest man, I believe I am bound by them wherever they apply.

I view this section then, sir, as not only opposed to the principles of justice and equity, but as opposed to the Constitution of the United States, and as such it receives my hearty condemnation. This is a plain proposition, and under a free government, any argument in its favor ought to be impertinent and unnecessary. It is such a law as might suit the genius of a despotic government, but it does not suit the free governments of the Anglo-Saxon race.

Gentlemen talk much about liberty and equality, and their extension to all men in our republican States, but can not a majority in a republic, I demand, inflict as much injustice and oppression upon the minority, as a despot on his throne upon his subjects.

What is tyranny? It is the action of the Supreme power, without, or in defiance of Constitutional limits, and it makes no sort of difference, so far as the exercise of the power is concerned, by whom it is exercised, whether by a despot on his throne, or by a triumphant majority of the people, in defiance of their own Constitution and solemn guaranties. This wanton abuse of power, and defiance of right, is one of the causes which subject our country to so much denunciation abroad. It is constantly placed to our account, and with great justice too, that under the pretense of right, we are constantly sacrificing the rights of minorities and individuals, through an unjust exercise of power by the majority.

If there is anything that ought to make the last dying speech of the great statesman, Calhoun immortal, it is the expression that there may be as much tyranny in the exercise of power by the majority, as there is in the edits of a despot on his throne. And the remark is emphatically true in reference to this country. We are constantly going from one extreme to another. This is the tendency of republican institutions; this is the tendency of a people possessing the active minds that are a characteristic of the Anglo Saxon race, and thus is exemplified the truth of the maxim—"The price of liberty is eternal vigilance"—vigilance against the inroads of passion and prejudice. Here sir, is the rock upon which we are destined to split, unless wise counsels prevail; and it is the duty of every conservative who has the interests of his country at heart, to stand up and oppose fanaticism and faction, in every quarter. As much as I am opposed to the faction of the abolitionists, to the same degree and extent do I hate and abhor the faction of the opposite extreme.

I desire to occupy a position between these two extremes. While I am willing to stand up and defend the Constitutional rights of my fellow citizens, at the same time I sincerely deprecate the fanatical spirit which now exists among us.

I have said that the tendency of the people of all republican governments, more especially the American, is to adopt extreme opinions and measures. Two or three years ago what would have been said if a proposition, in character like the present, had been originated in this State, in a body of this kind, or in the Legislature, if it had assumed to pass an act embodying the provision of this section. Why the man who should have introduced a proposition of this kind would have been considered stark mad. How is it now? Public opinion has been reacting, and in its reaction it has gone over to the other extreme. I affirm then, in view of this state of things, that it is the duty of all the true friends of liberty—all thinking men who have the interests of their country at heart, to take the middle ground and oppose fanaticism and faction on either hand. I have said there is another ground of objection to this section, and that is its utter defiance of rights, guaranteed under the constitution of the United States. Gentlemen are doubtless well aware that I refer to the section which declares that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states. Under that section we all learn, that several of the States have conferred, sub modo, upon negroes and mulattoes, the rights of citizenship.

What is the meaning of the term citizen? There are two kinds of citizenship or domicile—political and social. I apprehend that every State has the right to determine who shall be her citizens, and to say who shall have a political and who a social domicile within her boundaries. The States of New York and Massachusetts have given negroes and mulattoes certain qualified rights. In New York, in particular, a negro who has a certain amount of property is entitled to vote. That State then has given to the negro and mulatto a political domicile, and under the Constitution of the United States, if one of them emigrate into this State or any other, he is entitled to the same privileges that any other citizen of the State he enters enjoys, in respect to the right of social domicile.

Gentlemen may insist—and there is nothing so absurd as not to find supporters—that a negro is not susceptible of civilization—is not capable in point of fact of becoming a citizen. To this I answer, that it is an elementary principle in a free government, that every State has a right to judge whether there are any persons residing within her borders to whom should be extended political and social rights. There is no appeal from her decision. And if the States of New York and Massachusetts have seen proper to assent that a negro, under certain qualifications, is a citizen, what right has the State of Indiana or any other State to declare the contrary. But the Constitution of the United States settles the question by declaring, as I have before stated, and what rights of a citizen are referred to here? Not political rights, but the rights of social domicile. I do not affirm that, because the negro has the right of voting in New York he has, therefore, a right to vote in this State. That provision of the Constitution is merely intended as a guarantee of the rights of civil liberty, that kind of civil liberty which has been the theme of British and American jurists, and of which Lord Mansfield remarked that true liberty consists in the administration of equal justice to all—to the king as well as the beggar. That is the kind of civil liberty referred to in the Constitution, and which faction has not the power to overturn. One of the elementary principles of social citizenship is the right to acquire and enjoy property; and it is clear, that in introducing such a proposition as this, we are treading on dangerous ground, because we are taking upon ourselves, not only the violation of natural rights, but the violation of guaranteed rights.

Let us now, for a moment, look at the question of the expediency of this provision. As I said before, it is incumbent upon every conservative of sound and intelligent mind, and who is honestly inclined, to stand on the middle ground between the two extremes; and it behooves all such to enquire, is it expedient to introduce a section of this character into the organic law? Clearly it is not. Much difficulty and much inconvenience may result from the emigration of negroes into the State. This I am not prepared to dispute. But it is a mere temporary embarrassment, an existing difficulty, which will be done away with in a few years. The difficulty is not at all permanent; and shall we merely for the sake of removing a slight embarrassment which will exist but a few years, incorporate so obnoxious a provision as the present one, which will remain for a score or more of years as a portion of the organic law?

Gentlemen may say that they would vote against this section, were it not that they feel bound to vote in accordance with the wishes of their constituents. Now, I affirm, sir, that we are not to represent counties merely, but the whole State;—and it is our duty, as citizens of the State, and representatives of the people not to introduce anything into the Constitution that is repugnant to the principles of civil liberty, or established rights. If our constituents do not like our action we cannot help it—we must do our duty. For one, sir, I take my position ab-strictly, without regard to the views or feelings of any particular section of the State—but having regard to the interests and well being of the entire community. And let me warn gentlemen that those who advocate this measure, are wielding a two-edged sword.

While with the forward stroke they are cutting out the liberty and guarantied rights of the free colored citizens of other States, with the backward stroke they are assassinating their own liberties. They thereby declared, that natural rights, Constitutional guaranties, and the most elementary principles of liberty, are not worthy of regard, when in the way of a tyrannical majority, and manifestly exhort posterity to follow their example and improve upon their measures. In all history there can not be found a more tyrannical act of State. No coup d'Etat of Revolutionary France, no ukase of the autocrat of all the Russias, no inhuman mandate of any of the masters of the Roman world, can exceed this measure in severity and injustice. It is of itself, a mere coup d'Etat, a mere odious decree of banishment and confiscation, without law and without trial.

But gentlemen have become familiarized with this measure, until they have gradually, and only gradually become its advocates;

"And grown familiar with its ugly face,
They first endure, then pity, then embrace."

The drift of the argument on the other side, will be the expediency and necessity of this measure. Whatever is expedient, it will be said is right. But Heaven has decreed the damnation of such a doctrine. No expediency can compensate in political affairs, for the sacrifice of a great and elementary principle. Expediency—without and in defiance of principles—may be palatable now, but it will be bitter in the end.

And last of all, have gentlemen duly reflected that public opinion at the north, now occupies an extreme, the reverse of that occupied a short time since, and that it may soon oscillate to the latter and beyond it.

"He who of old would rend the oak dreamed not of the rebound." It is our duty to disregard all extreme opinions.

If this General Government, or the State is destined to become the prey of faction, anarchy, and tyranny, then extreme opinions form the introductory part in this awful drama.

Let us all bear in mind this maxim, that under the cover of the "will of the majority," the most abominable tyranny may be introduced, which will soon sap all the foundations of liberty.

Mr. GREGG moved to amend by striking out all after the word, "section," and inserting the following:

"That the general, great, and essential principles of liberty and free government may be recognized and unalterably established; we declare that all men are born equally free and independent, and have certain natural, inherent, and unalienable rights; among which are the enjoying and defending life and liberty, and of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property, and pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety."

[Mr. G. advocated the amendment at considerable length. His speech is withheld for the purpose of revision.]

Mr. READ of Monroe said—

Mr. PRESIDENT: I do not propose to detain the Convention many minutes. What I say, I shall endeavor to compress within the smallest possible compass. Least of all shall I attempt any thing like eloquence.

While I accord to the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Gregg,) and those who act with him, honesty of purpose, benevolence of heart, and love of liberty, I have a right to claim the same for myself, and those who, on this subject, act with me.

All the gentleman has so graphically said on the horrors of warring and dissevered States, I most heartily respond to. I may, perhaps, not so clearly as himself, see its bearing on the present subject.

Before taking our seats as members of this body, we went forward to the Secretary's table and swore to support the Constitution of the United States. We are now considering a section proposed by the committee, which is held to be in conflict with that instrument. The words of the United States Constitution relating to the subject are the following:

"The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

If negroes and mulattoes are citizens within the meaning of the Constitution, and if every State is bound by that section to admit to a residence within its territory all citizens of other States, the question is settled. It is our sworn duty to vote against the section reported by the committee. The Constitutional question, are negroes and mulattoes such citizens? meets us at the very threshold.

I hold, Mr. President, that they are not.

In determining the scope and meaning of a law, we are to look at the intention of the law-making power. We are to look at the law in all its parts, and, if possible, give it a construction which will make it a reasonable and consistent whole. We are to consider the time, the circumstances, the condition of society, the meaning of language in use when the law was enacted.

What, then, was the intention of that body of men who framed the Constitution of the United States? Did they contemplate negroes or mulattoes as citizens?

But, first, what is a citizen? The lexicographer, Dr. Webster, who was also a professional lawyer, says in the United States it means a person native or naturalized, who has the privilege of exercising the elective franchise, and of purchasing and holding real estate.

Any word may be used in different senses. The word "inhabitant," for example, may mean simply a dweller. It means, also, one who has gained a residence—one who is a legal inhabitant—and this last is the technical meaning of the word. So the word citizen has different meanings, according to the connection and style of language in which it is used. In a loose sense, I do not doubt, but the word has always been used as nearly synonymous with the word inhabitant or resident. But the question for us to settle is the meaning and import of the word, in the legal phraseology of the day when the Constitution of the United States was written.

What, then, was the condition of society in 1787, when that instrument was formed? Why, then as now, there were three races of men in the States composing the American confederacy. There were white men, negroes, and Indians. To the first alone belonged political rights. To them alone, at that time, belonged those attributes which, according to Webster, make the American citizen. The two last, as citizens, did not exist in legal contemplation. The African race, as a body, were slaves. Not a single State, in our present sense of the word, was a free State. Even Massachusetts and Connecticut had not long previously passed their acts of gradual emancipation, and at that time there were few free blacks even in those States. Washington, the illustrious President of the Convention, owned more than one hundred slaves, and held them as property. Most of the members of that Convention were slave-holders. That is a simple fact which it is useless to disguise. The Constitution itself, though avoiding the use of the word slave, still, by a periphrasis, recognizes slavery. The same persons cannot be slaves and citizens. That is a contradiction in terms—an absurd use of words. Nor did that Convention ever contemplate one portion of the African race as their property, and another portion of the same race as their fellow-citizens. The inquiry is not now whether the views of the statesmen of that day were right or wrong on this particular subject. But it is evident enough, that they not only did not regard the black, whether free or slaves, as citizens, but they did not intend that they should ever become citizens.

In the first Congress, after the Constitution was adopted, and composed of many of the same men who formed that instrument, the very first naturalization act was passed.

The following exact and technical language is used in that law: "Any alien, being a free white person may become a citizen &c." In 1795, a further regulation was made, and the following language is used: "any free white person may become a citizen." The same language is used in four subsequent acts. So also in the Post Office law, Congress early marked the distinction of color. No person of color can be engaged in the Post Office, or in the transportation of the mail. These laws were enacted for the very purpose of putting the Constitution into operation and may be regarded as expressing its true intent. If negroes were citizens of the States, within the meaning of the Constitution, Congress clearly mistook its duty.

The current of judicial decisions is uniform in the same direction. Judge Daggett, the late eminent Professor of law in Yale College, Connecticut, in the Prudence Crandall case, instructed the jury, that free colored persons are not citizens within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States. In his charge to the jury, that eminent judge uses this strong language. "To my mind, it would be a perversion of terms, and the well known rule of construction, to say, that slaves, free blacks, or Indians were citizens, within the meaning of that term, as used in the Constitution."

In the State of Tennessee in 1838, it was also decided in the case of the State vs. Clabourn, that free blacks are not citizens according to the meaning of that word in the Constitution of the United States.

But the different States have always by pauper laws, excluded paupers, though citizens of other States, and prohibited their immigration, and I believe these laws have been held to be Constitutional in the highest courts. The State is surely not to be hindered from excluding a bad or dangerous population. In the emphatic language of Judge Washington in the case of Corfield vs. Coryell: "These fundamental rights are secured to the citizens, subject nevertheless to such restraint as the government may justly prescribe." By a different and more strict construction, a State against its own consent, might be overrun with paupers and vagabonds from other States and there would be no remedy.

But, again, as showing the restricted construction of the section above referred to in the United States Constitution, I may remark, there is not a State Constitution, which, without limitation, confers upon the citizens of other States, the political privileges and immunities of its own citizens. Upon removal into a new State, no man at once enjoys the privilege of voting or of holding office. He must wait six months—a year—and in the case of holding the highest offices in some States, several years, before he can enjoy every privilege of citizenship. By the Constitution of the State of Maine, students from other States cannot vote upon any term of residence. And who would hold, that a negro because he can vote in some State, has a Constitutional right to vote in all the States?

But I have not time to look up and collect all distinctions of this sort which exist in the several State Constitutions, the Constitutionality of which as measured by the United States Constitution, has never been questioned.

The laws and Constitution of the United States contemplate negroes and mulattoes, in what relation and condition? Why, in the language of the late Chancellor Kent, as "essentially a degraded caste, of inferior rank and condition in society." "Marriages," he says, "are forbidden between them and whites, in some of the States; and when not absolutely contrary to law, they are revolting, and regarded as an offense against public decorum."

How is it possible that a race of men so contemplated by the laws and usages of society, should be regarded as citizens in the same society? It is proper, however, that I should state that Chancellor Kent, notwithstanding the strong language which he uses, expresses the opinion rather doubtfully, that they are to be regarded as citizens, sub modo—laboring under disabilities—as citizens not having the rights of other citizens. The very decisions, however, which he quotes, are all adverse to this opinion. I may remark that in addition to the above judicial decisions, he gives also the official opinion of the United States Attorney General (I believe the late Mr. Wirt) that free blacks are not citizens in the contemplation of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. President, the provision, as contemplated in the reported section, for excluding the further settlement of blacks among us, may seem harsh and severe, but if we look at it in the spirit of candor, I cannot but think, we must all admit, that the true interests of each race, and more especially those of the black race, imperatively demand under all practicable circumstances, their complete separation. The blacks can never compete with our powerful and overbearing race. That wise and philanthropic society which founded the colony in Liberia, made it a fundamental regulation in their system, that white people shall not be permitted to settle there. This regulation is founded not only in the soundest philosophy, but in a tender regard to the black race. The settlement in Liberia is one of the most remarkable, and I may add, benevolent schemes, in which our age, so distinguished for noble and generous undertakings, has been engaged. But the philanthropy which planned it, was obliged to take into consideration the distinction of race, and wisely forbade in the very organization of their system, the immigration and settlement of the whites. This same prohibition is incorporated in the new constitution of Liberia, formed by the blacks themselves. They thus recognize the necessity of separating the races in their organic law. The negroes are surely best off by themselves. Let us, then, afford no encouragement to their coming among us. To those who, unhappily for us, and still more unhappily for themselves, are among us, let us even by our organic laws, provide for giving a home, so far as they are willing to accept the boon—a home where they may attain all the elevation which their nature permits. Let us furnish them no motive to come in or remain among us, to be bondsmen and worse than slaves to us and to our children.

In Virginia, the annual sum of $30,000 for five years to come, has been appropriated to convey their free blacks to Africa. Let us oblige the other slave States to make a similar provision, by refusing to receive to our bosoms the shufflings off of slavery.

Policy, justice, humanity, self-defense, require this at our hands.

Mr. HALL. I believe that the question is on the motion to strike out and insert. It is in order according to parliamentary usage, to amend the original section before the question on the motion to strike out can be taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Morrison of Washington). It is not now in order to amend the original section, but it is in order to amend the amendment.

Mr. HALL. I understand that it is in order to amend the original section before the question on the motion to strike out can be taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the motion to amend the original section by striking out a part of it, and inserting some other words.

Mr. HALL. The motion is to strike out and insert, and before the question is taken on that it is in order to move to amend the original section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the gentleman's amendment is for the purpose of perfecting the original section. The Chair is of opinion that it is in order to amend the amendment.

Mr. HALL. I do not propose to amend the amendment. I understand that the amendment is to strike out the original section and insert a new proposition. Now I want to amend the original section as it stands, before the question on the motion to strike out is taken.

Mr. THORNTON. It is in order to amend the original section before the question can be taken on a motion to strike it out entirely. The proposition of the gentleman from Gibson is perfectly in order. It suspends or rather supersedes, for the time being, the motion to strike out. The friends of a proposition have a right to perfect it as much as possible before any proposition can be entertained to destroy it entirely. The proposition of the gentleman from Jefferson is to strike out the original section entirely, and the proposition of the gentleman from Gibson is to amend the original section, which he has a right to do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has heretofore decided that it will be in order to amend and perfect the original proposition before a motion to strike it out can be entertained.

Mr. HALL. Then I move the following amendment to the original section, that is by adding after the word "mulatto," in the third line the words "hereafter coming into this State." I will now read the section as I propose to amend it.

The gentleman accordingly read the section.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. It read that way before. [Laughter].

Mr. HALL. Well my object in the amendment I have offered is to have the clause so worded as not to operate upon the present inhabitants of the State—I mean the present negro population. I wish then to have the same right secured to them that they now enjoy, of purchasing and holding property. If that is secured, that is all I want.

Pending the question on the amendment,

On motion of Mr. KILGORE, the Convention adjourned until two o'clock.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

The PRESIDENT stated that the subject under consideration when the Convention adjourned, was an amendment offered by the gentleman from Gibson.

Mr. BRACKEN. I wish to offer an amendment. It is to strike out all of the original section after the word "assembly."

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would inform the gentleman from Rush, that there is no such word in the amendment.

Mr. BRACKEN. Then I cannot reach my object till that amendment is disposed of.

Mr. THORNTON. I would like to learn what the amendment of the gentleman from Jefferson is.

The Secretary read the amendment offered by Mr. Gregg.

Mr. BRACKEN. But my amendment was to the original section, and not to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT. The pending question is an amendment to the original section, and the gentleman's amendment does not apply to that amendment, as there is no such word as "assembly" in it.

Mr. THORNTON. I understood the amendment of the gentleman from Jefferson was to strike out the whole paragraph.

The PRESIDENT. All but the word "section."

Mr. THORNTON. I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Jefferson is to strike out the whole section, and substitute another. Now, according to parliamentary law, the friends of a bill, or section, or resolution, have a right to move to amend before any motion to strike out can be entertained. A motion to amend has preference over a motion to strike out.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair has so decided. The Secretary will read the amendment offered by the gentleman from Gibson.

The Secretary read the amendment as follows: Insert after the word "mulatto," the words "hereafter coming into the State."

A MEMBER. Read the section as proposed to be amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

"The General Assembly, at its first session under the amended Constitution, shall pass laws prohibiting negroes from coming into or settling in this State, and prohibiting any negro or mulatto hereafter coming into this State, from purchasing or otherwise acquiring any real estate hereafter."

Mr. HALL. I would modify my amendment by adding, strike out the word "hereafter," at the end of the section.

Mr. THORNTON. I do not think that the proposition of the gentleman from Gibson, to strike out the word "hereafter," at the end of the section, and insert what he proposes to insert, would answer the object which this Convention has in view, and I cannot, therefore, vote for this amendment.

Mr. HALL. If the section, as reported by the committee, be read over, it will be found that it prohibits negroes and mulattoes from hereafter purchasing or holding real estate. That is the sense of the section. It is not those negroes who may hereafter come into the State, but it applies to the resident negroes; and surely, it is not the intention of the Convention to prevent those negroes who now reside within the State, from purchasing or holding real estate within its limits. The object of my amendment is to apply the restriction to negroes and mulattoes that may hereafter come into the State. The language of the section will, perhaps, accomplish that; and then the word "hereafter" will make it apply to those who may come in, and not to residents.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. THORNTON. I move to amend the section by striking out the words "or otherwise acquiring;" and insert the word "holding," so as to make it read "prohibiting any negro or mulatto from purchasing or holding any real estate hereafter." The object of the amendment which I have proposed is to obviate a difficulty that might arise, if the words were retained. I know of many persons of color who possess real estate, and if they should die, this provision would prevent their heirs from coming into possession of their property. Now I am willing to go as far as any other man in passing the most stringent laws to prevent negroes from coming into the State, but I cannot sanction a principle, which in my estimation is tantamount to robbery. I can name a man of color in the city in which I live, who owns real estate to a large amount. Now that man may die; and the question is, would you, by retaining the words "or otherwise acquiring," prevent his heirs from inheriting his property. This clause of the section as reported by the committee, would prevent them from "acquiring" real property by descent. The object of my amendment is to preclude them from purchasing or receiving real estate by gift; but I have no intention of holding with the idea that would rob these people of property which would come to them by descent from their parents. I understand well enough, that the preceding part of the section goes to exclude all those persons from coming into the State hereafter. The section as it stands now, will not only apply to them but to those who are here now; and, although I would even go so far as to say that those negroes who are now in the State, and do not possess real estate, should be prohibited from purchasing, or otherwise acquiring it, I cannot and will not vote for any provision which might result in excluding them from holding property which might descend to them from their parents. My proposition is to strike out the words "or otherwise acquiring," because that provision is so broad that it would prevent them from acquiring property by descent. I would then fix it in such a way as to preclude them from purchasing or receiving by gift; but I never could consent to say that children should not "acquire" real estate by descent, because, in my opinion, that would amount to absolute robbery.

Mr. GIBSON. I agree with the gentleman from Floyd in many of the observations he has made, but I cannot agree with his amendment, because I regard it as going further than the original section. It goes further than I am willing to go. The effect of the amendment, if it should be adopted, would be to force those negroes who hold real estate in our State to dispose of it. I do not go that far. I intend to propose to amend the section by striking out the words "or otherwise acquiring," and that, I should think, would meet the gentleman's views much better than the amendment he proposes.

There are only two modes in which real property can be acquired, and these are by purchase or by descent. If you acquire real property by "gift" or devise it is a purchase in the language of the law. If you strike out the words "or otherwise acquiring," you will, I think, accomplish all that is desirable. I am willing to leave it in that position, for while it will not interfere with the descent of real property from the parent to the child, it will have this good effect, that whenever the holders of real estate among the colored race are disposed to sell, they must of necessity, sell to a white man. They cannot sell to another negro, because the provision prevents them from "purchasing," and the property thus held will, therefore, in the course of a very short time, pass into other hands.

While I am upon the floor, I will detain the Convention with a very few observations; and I will observe in the outset that I hope, with the exception of the amendment which I have proposed, the Convention will reject all others, and adopt the section. That a stop should be put to the immigration of negroes into our State, I believe to be the will of almost the entire people. I believe that there is no question on which the will of the people has been so clearly and definitely given, as on this. In canvassing the county which I represent, in every stump speech and in every public assembly I proclaimed this doctrine—that the immigration of negroes should be prevented; and I must say that the doctrine met everywhere with the most hearty response on the part of the people. In the whole course of that canvass, I found but one solitary man who did not agree with me. An old gentleman whom I met in one of the back townships came to me and expressed his surprise and horror that the people of Indiana, so well known for their hospitality, should advocate such a doctrine as that of excluding from our borders the poor unfortunate negro. The observation struck me with surprise, inasmuch as he was the only man I had met with in my canvass who did not appear not merely willing, but anxious, that this influx of negroes into our State should be stopped. Well, I inquired who he was; and who do you think he was? Why, he proved to be a Virginia slaveholder, who was there on a visit. On learning that, I was not surprised that he should wish that our borders should be left open for all their worn out and cast off slaves.

In considering this question, it divides itself into two branches. In the first place, the question is, have we the power to make such a provision? That is an important inquiry; for if we have not the power, there is no use whatever in talking about the expediency of the thing. On that question I see no necessity to trouble the Convention with any observations, for I conceive that my friend from Monroe (Mr. Read) has set that matter effectually at rest. I have never had any doubt on that point. I have no more doubt that the State of Indiana has the power to exclude that class of persons from coming within her borders than I have that she has the power to exclude the paupers that might be sent from other States, or the felons that might be disgorged from their penitentiaries. No rational man would doubt that we have this power. I have no more doubt on this subject than I have upon any other question that could be raised. We were told some ten years ago, that no sane man would have thought of making such a proposition. Times however have changed, and with the change of times has come a change of circumstances. Ten years ago the same state of things did not exist. Had things been then as they are now, we should have heard a very different expression of opinion. Look at the action of the other States. What have they done? One of them has incorporated a provision in her organic law to the effect that if any free negro shall immigrate to, or any slave hereafter emancipated in, shall refuse to leave said State, or, having left, shall return to and settle in said State, he shall be deemed guilty of felony, and shall be punished by confinement in the penitentiary of such State. I agree with the gentleman from Jefferson in his denunciation of that law. I say it is an insult to human nature for these men to say that when their slaves are old and worn out they should be cast off and driven from the State under pain of confinement in the penitentiary should they dare to return. But to use again the illustration of the old horse again put in harness by the gentleman from Jefferson. If your neighbor turns out his old horse to die, or rather if he turns him into your garden, or your pasture, is there any moral obligation on your part that you should suffer him to remain there? None—none in the world. And on the same principle, I contend that we are under no obligation in the world to receive within our borders the worn out and cast off slaves of Kentucky or any other slaveholding State. Sir, the action of other States has placed us in this situation. Look around you and see what is being done. Illinois has shut her door against the immigration of negroes into her territory. Ohio will, in all probability, do the same. Everywhere you see the slave States thrusting out their old and worthless negroes; and unless we would become the Liberia of the South, it is necessary for us to act, and to act promptly. And it is time for us to act now. I am not fond of reading extracts from the newspapers to establish any position; but I cannot refrain from reading one taken from a North Carolina paper (The Aurora) to show the feeling which exists in that State:

"A STAMPEDE.—The people of this district being excluded from all participation in the common property of the United States, by a recent act of Congress, have wisely determined to compel all free colored persons to emigrate to their brethren of the North. We understand 700 have lately left here for New York, Philadelphia, and Boston, and about 800 more are making preparations to remove as soon as the ensuing Legislature adjourns, unless they succeed in their petition to that body to be recognized as State property, receiving support and protection in consideration of their services on the public works.

We would advise every district in North Carolina to adopt similar measures, as the Guinea population, deprived of all outlet by this act, will very soon supplant the whites, unless they are sent off—thereby ridding ourselves of one great nuisance in the way of free negroes. Let us try and oblige the Northern fanatics. If they want negroes, let us send them these, the most worthless race upon earth. Then if they desire more we will endeavor to accommodate them from time to time, as fools and dotards shall see cause to emancipate their slaves."

That, sir, is the tone of the whole southern press. And even in Canada, where the fugitive slave law is driving thousands of fugitive slaves within their borders, the people are beginning to wake up, and in three different Canadian papers I have seen calls upon the Government to take action in the matter, and do something to prevent the great influx of negroes there. I am told by some delegates here, that in the counties which they represent, there are not, perhaps, more than half a dozen negroes, and such gentleman have expressed surprise that any such feeling should be manifested against that race as is implied in the section reported by the committee. Their counties, however, stand in a position different from many others. In my county there are from 1800 to 2000 negroes, and within the last twelve months more than 150 cast off slaves have settled within that county. I know of one tract of 500 acres owned by a man in Kentucky, who liberated his slaves, and settled them upon that tract. Now what is the result? These negroes are there upon that tract, and the land in the neighborhood of their settlement can now be bought for half the price for which it could have been bought two years ago. One man, living in the neighborhood of this settlement, was obliged to sell out, for the reason, as he alleged, that he had every thing stolen from him. So it is; they come among us; they wont work, they must live, and they live by stealing.

Sir, I said that we were under no obligation to receive them into the State. On the contrary, I hold that we are under the highest and holiest obligations to ourselves, and to posterity, to shut them out. We are bound to do this in self-defense. It is not alone in the case of a man assailed by violence that he may defend himself, even if it be at the expense of the life of another. There is a case in the books which I regard as being analogous to the present. It is when in the case of a shipwreck, a man has secured to himself a plank barely sufficient to keep him above the water, and another seeks to get upon it—he has a right, both in the eye of God and the eye of man, to thrust him off into the ocean, and cling to it himself. Now, sir, that is precisely our case. It is an act of self preservation. However much we may pity these men, we know that we and they cannot live together in peace. We know that when we are over-run with them—as we most assuredly will be unless we adopt some stringent measures to prevent it, there will be commenced a war which will end only in extermination of one race or the other.

Does any man in the South believe that the white and colored population would live together there if the latter were freed? No, sir, no man believes it. If they were freed to-day, then the war would begin, and it would not cease until the whole colored population of the South were driven from their borders. And, sir, if we do not prevent them from coming in here, we shall be made the receptacle for the worthless negro population of every Southern State.

But, sir, there is another reason why we should adopt the most stringent measures in self-defense. As I have already said, I have no sympathy with the men who adopted that clause in the Constitution of Kentucky, to which reference has already been made; nay more, I will say that I regard it as an infamous stain upon the character of that Convention, and upon the State itself. But, sir, if we leave the door open and give them power to impose their worthless colored population upon us, you may depend upon it, that they will enforce that law. But if we say at once, "you shall not thrust your worn out slaves upon us, we will not have them," then they will not dare to enforce that infamous provision; they will not dare to bring upon themselves the universal execration of mankind, by enforcing it; they will not dare to face their God and do it. If, however, by our own negligence, and want of self regard, we leave them the opportunity of doing it, you may depend upon it, that it will be done, and we will have the freed negroes in Kentucky thrust upon us by thousands and tens of thousands. If, on the other hand, we say promptly and determinedly, "you shall not send them here," then I would be willing to stake my existence that no freed negro would be sent to the penitentiary for the offense which by that section of the Constitution of Kentucky is made a felony—no liberated slave will be punished as a felon because he does not do that which he cannot do; because he does not emigrate to a free State, the laws of which State prohibit his entrance there. To punish a man for not doing that which it is impossible for him to do, is too outrageous a proposition to receive the sanction even of a southern slaveholder.

I am not partial to occupying the time of this body with the relation of anecdotes, but I cannot resist the temptation of relating one here, because I not only have every reason to believe in its actual occurrence, but also because it somewhat serves to illustrate the feeling of many slave-holders towards their worn out slaves. Old Major Geiger of Kentucky had an old negro servant, who had lived with him all his life. He had been a great favorite, on account of his fidelity—a sort of family servant, who, all his life, had done pretty much as he pleased. But, he grew old, and, like all old negroes, sometimes he would work and sometimes he would not. He had served his master so long and so faithfully, that he doubtless thought he was entitled to a little leisure in his old days. Well, the Major got tired of him, and he, determining to get rid of him, had his emancipation papers drawn out in due form. This done, he went to the negro and said to him, "Sam, you have been a very good nigger, and I am now going to do you a great favor." "Ah! massa! what be dat?" replied Sam. "Why," said the Major, "you have been so good; you have served me all your lifetime so well, that I'm now going to give you your liberty—I'm going to set you free." "Ah, massa!" said Sam; "you can't come dat, massa; you done eat de meat, and now you must pick de bone." [Great laughter].

Well, sir, we have been told that, if we adopt this provision, it will be a dead letter in the Constitution: in other words, that the "higher law" of Mr. Seward is to be introduced into the State of Indiana. I would like to know if that "higher law" is one of the cardinal principles of that party to which the gentleman belongs, who enunciated it here this morning? It is important that we should know this, in order that we may have a proper appreciation of his arguments. But, sir, that doctrine of a "higher law" did not originate with Mr. Seward. It originated with the borderers of the west, and is what is more commonly known by the name of a "lynch law"—[laughter, and cries of "good, good!"]—that law which rises above all Constitutions—above all constitutional principles—and which finds its only rule in the breast of every man, accordingly as his feelings or his interests may dictate. The adjudications of Judge Lynch in the west and south-west, are the only reported cases we have of record under the "higher law" of Mr. Seward. [Applause.]

But, suppose we make a practical application of this doctrine to one branch of the question under consideration. One of the arguments of the opponents of this section is, that we are forbidden, by the Constitution of the United States, from adopting such a provision. What if we should answer them, that there was a "higher law" than that Constitution—the law of self-preservation.

Sir, if such a doctrine is to be tolerated in this country, we had better burn our books, and buy bowie-knives and rifles; better go back at once to savage life. For savage life would be infinitely preferable to civilization without laws, or what is the same thing, laws which may be disregarded by every man whose conscience, or whose interest—for, in many instances, the terms are perfectly synonymous—tells him that he ought not to obey them. I did not expect, Mr. President, to hear such a doctrine as this from the gentleman who, this morning, so eloquently denounced all attempts at disunion. That gentleman should remember the old Spanish proverb—"Curses, like chickens, come home to roost." [Applause.] He should have looked to the future; he should have looked to another period in the history of Indiana; he should have looked to the time when your State will be dotted all over with negro cabins—when the white man will be driven out from the State, and his place be occupied by the African—for that will be the effect of permitting their immigration into the State. You fill your land with negroes, and the white man will either drive them out or he will leave the State himself, and seek another home. If the citizen of that day should happen to pick up our debates and read the gentleman's speech, upon whose head, think ye, his curses would be likely to fall?

Sir, while I am far from wishing to oppress the negro in any form, I must, on the other hand, be allowed to say that I have no sympathy with the abolition faction of the country. I have nothing to hope for from them; nothing to expect from them; nothing to desire from them; and never, by word or deed of mine, shall I be found pandering to their hopes or feelings. But, sir, we have been threatened with a rejection of the Constitution by the people, if a provision of this nature is incorporated into it. Well, sir, I have just this to say upon that question: if a majority of the people of Indiana are so wedded to the negro; if they prefer the company of the black and sooty African to their own race, and would rather encourage their immigration than that of their white brethren from Europe, or from other States of this Union; if they would prefer this to all the reforms contemplated in the new Constitution, why, I say, in such case let the Constitution fall; the people who have such preferences—such predilections, are not fit to enjoy the reforms which were contemplated by the calling together of this Convention: they would be unworthy of them; they would not be worthy to live even under the present Constitution. I say, in such case, let it fall—let it fall. But, I have no fear upon this ground; for I do not believe that there is any question that has been or will be discussed in this Hall, on which the people are less divided than on this.

The gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Gregg) read a number of extracts from newspapers, with the view of showing the great danger of a dissolution of the Union. I, perhaps, have as many apprehensions on that score as he has. I know that the horizon looks dark and gloomy; I know that there is danger ahead and behind, and all around about us; but that, to my mind, furnishes another and a conclusive argument why we should adopt this provision. Sir, what would be the effect to us of a dissolution of the Union, irrespective of any greater political considerations? Why, sir, the slave States would drive all their worthless slaves across our borders, and we would be perfectly inundated with the vilest and most worthless population on the face of the earth. And what could we do? Where would they go? We must either take them in or drive them back. Without such a provision as this we could not drive them back, and we must, therefore, take them in. We should remember, too, that we are making a Constitution now, under which we are to live in case the unhappy event of disunion should ever arrive.

If this vast and powerful nation is to be dismembered—if that proud flag which bears hope and joy to the oppressed and down-trodden in every region of the earth—which has waved in triumph over many a field of blood—is to be stricken down and trampled in the dust—if this glorious Union is to become only a thing of history, and to be a reality no more—then let us be prepared for it; let us at least guard, as well as we may, against this great, this immeasurable evil which would follow from it. There is no evil we have to fear more than that from a dissolution of the Union.

And if we do not act now, when should we act? Is it to be next year, or the year after? Is it to be when our negro population is tenfold increased over its present amount, and when the evil will, consequently, be experienced in a tenfold ratio? Sir, by proper Constitutional provisions, you may keep them out of your State, but I defy you to drive them out when once they are in. Once here, you cannot get rid of them. The only way is, to keep them out while they are out; and if we are to do that, we must act promptly and efficiently—we must act now. [Applause.]

Sir, this is a question of vast importance to our State. The negro race and the white race cannot live together; and it behooves us, under these circumstances, not only to furnish no encouragement to the colored race to enter our borders, but effectually to protect ourselves against their entrance. Nay, more; we must not afford any encouragement to those who are already here to remain here. We have a colony on the coast of Africa of his own race, but there the negro will not go if he can help it. No, no; he wishes to be fed and fostered here, with the hope of being put upon an equality with the white man. So long as he has friends among the whites, so long as he may hold property and transmit it, so long as he can find friends in the State, you never can induce him to leave the country and go to Africa, although I believe that the scheme of African colonization is one of the most benevolent that ever was attempted.

Much has been said at various times about the horrors of the African slave trade. Horrible enough has it been; but who can say that even out of this, the greatest evil, good may not come? Providence "moves in a mysterious way;" and I have often thought that even the African slave trade might be the means employed by Providence to Christianize and civilize the negro race. If you compare the condition of the African as he comes from his native country—and I have seen thousands of them land upon the Island of Cuba—you will find that they bear no comparison even with the lowest and meanest of their race who have been raised in this country. They are scarcely a shade exalted above the brute creation in any respect. Well, sir, they have been brought here and civilized; and though many, even of those who have been raised here, are but little above the brute creation, either in their habits or their intellect, we have made them much better than when they came; and by sending them back to their own country, they may confer benefits upon their race which, perhaps, could not be acquired by them in any other way.

I have detained the Convention longer than I purposed when I arose. I will not detain it further than by saying that I shall vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Floyd. I am opposed to saying that those negroes who are here now, and "hold" real estate, shall not continue to "hold" it. The ground is too broad; but at the same time, I feel the necessity of adopting such a Constitutional provision as will prevent any more from coming within our borders hereafter, and as will prevent those already here, from acquiring any further hold than they now have upon the freehold of the country. The time is not far distant when every foot of soil in Indiana will have an owner. Let us, then, keep steadily in view the fact that every negro freeholder necessarily excludes from the same land, some one of our own race. Between the two, the choice cannot be difficult. [Applause.]

Mr. FOSTER. I have nothing to say in relation to the section as it now stands, or to the amendments which have been proposed to it; but when these amendments are voted down, as I have no doubt they will be, I shall offer an amendment to the section, which, with the permission of the Convention, I will now read for information:

"The General Assembly shall pass laws providing that any free negro or mulatto hereafter immigrating to, and refusing to leave, this State, or having left, shall return and settle within this State, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and punished by confinement in the county jail, or being farmed out to the highest bidder for the term of six months, and the proceeds donated to the Colonization Society, in trust for the benefit of those negroes in this State who are willing to emigrate to Liberia."

Now, sir, I feel disposed, for one, to take the bull by the horns at once. [Laughter, and "hear," "hear."] This milk-and-water course I have no opinion of. I disapprove not only of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Jefferson, but also of the section as reported by the committee. They merely give to the General Assembly the power to pass laws, and there is no penal sanction attached to it at all. Now to pass any law which implies a duty to be performed, without attaching a penalty for the non-performance of the duty, amounts, as an Irishman would say, to just "nothing-at-all-at-all" [laughter]; and I am rather fearful that some gentlemen on this floor, although it may, perhaps, be rather unparliamentary to say it; [several voices, "oh say it, say it; out with it;"] well, perhaps some of them are afraid to take the responsibility of this thing upon themselves, and would rather cast it upon the Legislature. If the matter is left in that way, you may rely upon it that there never will be any law passed at all upon the subject, and this section reported by the committee, will be as nugatory in its operations as the law of the State of Illinois. The chairman of that committee, I believe, told me that this section was an exact transcript of the section provided in the Constitution of the State of Illinois. That provision of the Constitution was referred to the people and they rejected it. And why did they reject it? Simply because it was not sufficiently stringent.

Now, sir, I have one thing to say, and that is, that if there be any one question in which the people of my county feel more deeply interested than in another, it is this question in relation to the immigration of negroes to the State. I have no hesitation in saying that nineteen-twentieths of the people of the county of Monroe, without regard to party, are opposed to the further immigration of negroes into the State; and at a convenient time I shall offer this amendment, because I know it will meet with their decided approbation, as it does with my own.

My attention was directed to this, in the first place, in consequence of a provision inserted in the Constitution of Kentucky. The members of that Convention did not feel disposed to shirk any responsibility devolving upon them; but they met the question in a bold, manly, and open manner. Here is the section in relation to that subject:

Now, sir, I propose that such negroes shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be subjected to the penalties named in the amendment I have read; that is, "confined in the county jail, or farmed out to the highest bidder, and the proceeds of his labor shall be devoted to the Colonization Society," with the understanding that the negro himself shall, with the view of going to Liberia, have the benefit of his earnings. If we merely say that the General Assembly shall have power to pass laws to prevent the immigration of negroes into the State, and thus shirk the responsibility which legitimately devolves upon us, I venture to say that no such laws ever will be passed. And in connection with this subject permit me to say that I hope no proposition will be made to submit it to the people as a distinct proposition—that the Convention will say “yea” or “nay.” I am willing to vote for such a principle as that which I have read in the hearing of the Convention, or any modification, so as to retain the principle in substance. The gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Gregg) argued his position with great ability; and, indeed, I was fearful at one time that if the vote had been taken when he concluded, the Convention might have been carried away with the torrent of eloquence which he poured out upon us. I felt the same feelings, I presume, that were experienced by many members of the House of Commons of England, when the celebrated Sheridan delivered a philippic against Warren Hastings, in consequence of which, they immediately adjourned, the House fearful of the effect which his eloquence might momentarily have produced. When I say this, I say it not for the purpose of flattering my friend from Jefferson, for I really was afraid that had the vote been taken immediately after he sat down, his eloquence might have produced an effect to my mind by no means desirable. It is true that the gentleman was argumentative, but he was also somewhat declamatory. His speech was very eloquent, and I listened to it with a great deal of pleasure, but I really must confess that I could not swallow his arguments.

The gentleman read an extract to prove that when the Constitution of Missouri was adopted, Congress was opposed to their admission on the ground of the adoption of the fourth article of the twenty-sixth section of the Constitution of that State; and that they passed a resolution to the effect that the Legislature of Missouri would have to take back that provision in the Constitution, or be remanded back to a territorial condition. He read this resolution in support of his position:

“Mr. Clay, from the joint committee appointed on the Missouri subject, reported the following resolution:

“Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Missouri shall be admitted into this Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, upon the fundamental condition that the fourth clause of the twenty-sixth section of the third article of the Constitution submitted on the part of the said State to Congress, shall never be construed to authorize the passage of any law, and that no law shall be passed in conformity thereto, by which any citizen of either of the States in this Union shall be excluded from the enjoyment of any of the privileges and immunities to which such citizen is entitled under the Constitution of the United States: Provided, That the Legislature of said State, by a solemn public act, shall declare the assent of the said State to the said fundamental condition, and shall transmit to the President of the United States on or before the fourth Monday of November next, an authentic copy of the said act; upon the receipt whereof, the President, by proclamation, shall announce the fact; whereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of the said State into this Union shall be considered as complete.”

Now, I have the best authority for saying, that Missouri did not comply with the requisition of Congress—and that is the form of the Constitution itself. Well, on this subject I will read another short extract:

“Mr. Adams of Massachusetts delivered his objections to the resolution, on the ground of the defect of the power of the United States to authorize or require the Legislature of a State once admitted into the Union to do the act proposed by this resolution to be demanded of the Legislature of Missouri.”

Now, on looking at the Constitution of Missouri, and the schedule attached to it, you will find nothing in relation to this resolution of Congress; but you find that the provision in the published Constitution of Missouri, is just as it was enacted by the Convention of that State; and speaking of the Legislature, it there says, in short and terse terms—

“It shall be their duty, as soon as may be, to pass such laws as may be necessary,

“1st. To prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to and settling in this State under any pretext whatsoever.”

Mr. GREGG. Read the whole article.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no; there is no necessity for detaining the Convention; I read just as much as suits my purpose. [Great laughter.] You see, I am acquainted with the gentleman from Jefferson; and I am only pursuing the course which he pursued. [Renewed laughter.] I know the gentleman to be pretty much in the same fix with myself in regard to this thing.

Now, speaking of the organic law of Kentucky, what would be the effect of that law were it enforced? Our State would be inundated with free negroes and mulattoes. The State of Illinois has forbidden them to enter her borders. Ohio will unquestionably do the same; and unless we protect ourselves, the result will be, that Indiana will be the great refuge of all the worthless, the halt, the maimed, and the blind negroes that are to be found in the Southern States. What are the laws of Kentucky with regard to the negroes there? Anterior to the adoption of the present Constitution, the laws of that State provided that no individual should emancipate negroes there unless he gave a bond to the county for their maintenance, and he also had to execute a second bond so as to become responsible for their good behaviour.

Now, we ask, is it fair that the slaveholder there, after having, as it were, sucked the sweat and blood of his negroes, should send them away to die in the free States, where they can have no friends and no sympathies in their behalf? Suppose a slaveholder in Kentucky has half a dozen of those negroes, old and worthless, how easy for him to come over the river into the State of Indiana, and to enter forty or eighty acres of land and settle these negroes here. What is to prevent him from doing that, and thereby ridding himself of all responsibility for their maintenance? Thus, perhaps, for the amount of fifty or a hundred dollars, he gets clear of an annual expense of several hundred dollars, and palms the expense of maintaining these poor creatures upon a people who have no interest whatever in their welfare. Let me state it as my firm belief, that if we do not pass a law, and a very stringent one, too, to prevent their coming into the State, our State will certainly be filled with these negroes, not only from Kentucky, but from Tennessee and other slave States. Sir, during the canvass last summer, I recollect seeing an account in the papers of some five or six hundred negroes emigrating into this State, and we were assured that there were more who were about to follow their illustrious example. [Laughter.]

Some gentlemen say that such a provision is contrary to all principles of humanity. They exclaim with holy horror: "what! would you prevent human beings from immigrating into the State?" Sir, to that I reply, what course do we pursue with white men? What course do we frequently pursue with those who have fought and bled for our country, in times that were calculated to try men's souls? Why, sir, if a pauper, even though he has rendered these services, should come from one county to another, he is immediately sent back to the county in which he had his residence. If a pauper residing in Monroe should migrate into Vigo, or if a worthless husband should run off and leave his wife and children to the mercy of the world, the overseers of the poor very kindly escort the lady and her children to the next county in a carriage, if her legal residence should happen to be there.

Now if it is not considered improper and inhuman to escort a pauper from one county to another, and these, mind you, white persons, is it improper or inhuman to reject another class of beings coming, not from one county to another, but from another sovereignty. I think not; nor can any reasonable man think it is. We cannot therefore be charged with inhumanity in preventing our State from being overrun with these vermin—for I say they are vermin, and I know it. [Laughter.] I was born and raised in the city of Philadelphia. There are great numbers of them there, and they are everlastingly creating disturbances. I have been on the Island of St. Domingo, where there are vast numbers of them, and a more miserable race of beings, I think, scarcely ever existed. Talk of their capacity for free government! Go to Hayti and see the celebrated emperor, Soloque, who had formerly been a cook, with his dukes, and earls, and lords, and barons, and knights, and a whole paraphernalia of humbugs! Look again at the Island of Cuba, where there are slaves, and you will find that they are much happier there than in St. Domingo, where they are free. Add all the advantages of sixty years experience of freedom, and you will find that where the inhabitants of St. Domingo then exported twenty hogsheads of sugar and as many bags of coffee, they do not export one now.

Sir, they are a different race from ours, and they will ever remain so. They cannot be amalgamated, they cannot be dove-tailed in any point of view. [Great laughter.]

The gentleman (Mr. Gibson) has alluded to the Island of Cuba, and I can say from observation and experience, that his remarks were correct. Indeed, sir, I have seen the negro race in such low stages of developement, with such inferior mental and physical organizations, that I have been tempted to give credence to the theory of Lord Monboddo, that man originated from a Monkey [laughter]. I do not know but that man is the highest order of a species originating from the Ape, and connected therewith by a regular gradation of races. It may not generally be known that a celebrated philosopher, Professor Agassiz, has promulgated a theory, which, though new, is attracting much attention. He thinks that the negro does not belong to the same race with ourselves. Be that as it may, I do know from Holy Writ that the negro race, whether they belong to the same race we do or to a higher order of animals, are under the ban of Heaven—a curse that was pronounced upon them by Almighty God still remains upon them. The race was cursed, and it was declared that they should be the servants of servants. That curse has never been removed. If any gentlemen doubt my statement I shall be able to quote the Bible, and they will find me as fully sustained as when my statement of the circumstances of the admission of Missouri was questioned.

The right to prohibit the immigration of negroes and mulattoes into the State has been questioned. Now, sir, I do not know what the decision of the Supreme Court will be in this case, but I know the doctrine held by the Supreme Court of the United States upon a collateral subject—the immigration of paupers into the United States from Europe. The case was argued at great length on an appeal, I think, from the decision of a New York court, relative to the landing of paupers from emigrant ships at that port. It was finally decided that the State has the right to exclude the paupers of a foreign country, and to prevent their being landed upon its shores. This being established

I contend that one State has a clear right to exclude the paupers of other States from immigrating and settling within its borders. If the New York Legislature can pass laws to prevent the landing of European paupers, Indiana can provide against the immigration of the worn out and cast off slaves of the slaveholding States.

But it has been said that a law like that which I have proposed, conflicts with the powers of the General Government, and in the language of Chief Justice Taney—"The first inquiry is, whether under the Constitution of the United States, the Federal Government has the power to compel the several States to receive and suffer to remain in association with its citizens, every person or class of persons, whom it may be the policy or pleasure of the United States to admit. For if the people of the several States of this Union reserved to themselves the power of expelling from their borders any person, or class of persons, whom it might deem dangerous to its peace, or likely to produce a physical or moral evil among its citizens, then any law of Congress invading this right, and authorizing the introduction of any person or description of persons against the consent of the State, would be an usurpation of power which this court could neither recognise nor enforce."

I had supposed this question not now open to dispute. It was distinctly decided in Holmes vs. Jennison, Graves vs. Slaughter, and in Prigg vs. the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

If these cases are to stand, the right of the State is undoubted. (to pass the law under consideration). And it is equally clear, that if it may remove from among its citizens any person or description of persons, which it regards as injurious to its welfare, it follows that it may meet them at the threshold and prevent them from entering. For it will hardly be said that the United States may permit them to enter, and compel the State to receive them, and that the State may immediately afterwards expel them. There could be no reason of policy, or humanity for compelling the States by the power of Congress, to imbibe the poison, and then leaving them to find a remedy for it by their own exertions and at their own expense. Certainly no such distinction can be found in the Constitution; and such a division of power would be an inconsistency, not to say an absurdity, for which I suppose no one will contend. If the State has the power to determine whether the persons objected to shall remain in the State in association with its citizens, it must as an incident inseparably connected with it, have the right also to determine who shall enter. Neither can this be a concurrent power. It must be paramount and absolute in the sovereignty which possesses it. A concurrent and equal power in the United States, and the States, as to who should and who should not be permitted to reside in a State, would be a direct conflict of powers repugnant to each other, continually thwarting and defeating its exercise by either, and could result in nothing but disorder and confusion.

I think it, therefore, to be very clear both upon principle and the authority of adjudged cases, that the several States have a right to remove from among their people, and to prevent from entering the State, any person, or class or description of persons, whom it may deem dangerous or injurious to the interests and welfare of its citizens; and that the State has the exclusive right to determine, in its sound discretion, whether the danger does or does not exist, free from the control of the General Government.

But the gentleman on my right (Mr. Gregg) declares that we cannot prohibit the immigration of negroes and mulattoes because it is in violation of that clause of the Constitution of the United States which declares that—

"The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

Well, sir, I say negroes and mulattoes are not recognized fully as citizens, with all the rights and privileges thereunto appertaining, in any State of the Union; no sir, not even in Federal old Massachusetts. In New York they are only recognized as citizens, after they become possessed of real estate to the amount of two hundred and fifty dollars. In those States even in which they are allowed to vote upon a property qualification, they are not citizens because they are not eligible to office, and are subject to other restrictions. Therefore, I say, that no provision of the Constitution of the General Government will be violated by the adoption of this section, because in no State of the Union is a negro fully a citizen.

And aside from this view of the case negroes and mulattoes are not regarded as citizens and scarcely as human beings, in Kentucky, Virginia, Tennessee, Missouri, and other slave States from whom this peculiar kind of immigration is most to be dreaded. It is against the immigration of worn out slaves of these States, and their settlement within our borders, with all their impoverishing and demoralizing effects, that we desire to protect the people of Indiana, and especially the inhabitants of the Southern tier of counties. They are not considered as citizens in those, and crossing the Ohio river will not confer those rights upon them. Why any gentleman will contend that crossing the river should convert them into citizens of Indiana, I cannot tell.

Mr. President, although the features of this section seem, at first sight, harsh and cruel, I sincerely believe that it will result to the good of the negro. For them to live in this State is out of the question. Public feeling is so strong against them, that they must ever remain a degraded and a wretched class of population. Allowing more to come, will only increase and extend the evil. But, sir, provide in this Constitution that they shall not come into the State, and the result will inevitably be that the slave States will be compelled to colonize their free negroes and emancipated slaves. Now they take advantage of us, because we will allow ourselves to be imposed upon, and they are not driven to the last resort. But let the Free States shut them out, and they must colonize. It is their only resort, for the ratio of the increase of the black population of the South, is so much greater than that of the white, that they would soon be overrun by their negroes. This is already the case in Virginia, and her Legislature has appropriated the sum of thirty thousand dollars annually, for the colonization of her emancipated slaves in the republic of Liberia. Other slave States will be forced to follow her example.

Let me here remark that the negroes cannot complain very bitterly, at least, not with a good grace, of our prohibiting their immigration and settlement amongst us, for it is a fundamental law of Liberia, that no white man shall be allowed to immigrate and settle there.

There is no scheme of philanthropy, no project better adapted to the amelioration of the condition of the African race, than African colonization. In Liberia they can enjoy equal rights and privileges, and live free from the depressing influences of a national prejudice. The climate and the soil is that naturally adapted to them by nature, and there they may yet rise to be a powerful and a civilized nation.

I must be permitted to express my admiration of the sentiment expressed by Daniel Webster, upon this subject. He declared that he would vote for appropriations from the national Treasury to provide for the expenses of a grand national scheme of colonization. He declared that he did not care what amount it would take, he would take the responsibility of voting an appropriation yearly, for the object of transporting the negroes of this country to Africa.

Talk about suppressing the slave trade, &c., by means of armed fleets cruising on the coast of Africa! It is idle—the fleets of England, France, and the United States, have been cruising on that coast for many years, at an annual expense of five millions of dollars, and what have they done? Comparatively nothing. On the other hand, the republic of Liberia, by purchasing several hundred miles of the coast, and extending her dominion over that territory, where once were the largest slave factories, has forever abolished the slave trade of all that coast. I mention this, that the practical effects of colonization may be seen, and I think it is a monument to their credit, that with their slender means, they have accomplished more for the suppression of the African slave trade, than the fleets of the three great nations of the world, at an expense of five millions of dollars annually.

I have no disposition to protract these remarks. The gentleman who preceded me (Mr. Gibson) has so ably gone over the whole subject, that there is less need of my advertising to all the points involved in the debate. I believe that we owe it to ourselves to prohibit the immigration of negroes into the State, and furthermore, I believe that the practical effect will be that the slave States will be driven to follow the example of Virginia, and colonize their free negroes and emancipated slaves. Thus our provision will result to the benefit of the negro, as there is no doubt of the constitutionality of a provision of this kind. My colleague has ably demonstrated this; not only from numerous authorities, but those of the highest character; and the great majority of members of this body are perfectly satisfied in regard to its expediency.

Mr. President, I have been disappointed in procuring, or perhaps too indolent to seek several of those authorities, upon which I relied to sustain my position; but I think that I have demonstrated to the satisfaction of every liberal and unbiassed mind, that the only correct course we can pursue in this matter is to adopt a Constitutional provision, which shall be sufficiently stringent to completely effect the grand object which we have in view, and thereby, not only subserve the best interests of the State, but promote in a very great degree, the cause of humanity. I have nothing to say in relation to those negroes who are already inhabitants of this State.

It would be inhuman to cast them forth to the cold charities of the world, and to follow the example of Kentucky, in expatriating these free negroes and emancipated slaves. No, sir; let us do the best we can to ameliorate the condition of the colored race which are amongst us, and elevate them in the scale of society, and the blessing of Heaven will attend all well directed efforts for that purpose.

Mr. MILLIGAN inquired what amendment the pending question was upon.

The PRESIDENT. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Floyd (Mr. Kent) to strike the words "or otherwise acquired" from the original proposition.

Mr. THORNTON. I desire to modify my proposition by striking out the word "personal" so that its effect will be to prevent negroes and mulattoes from acquiring real estate hereafter.

Mr. HOVEY. The views of the gentleman can be carried out by adding after the word "hereafter" in the section, the words "except by descent." I think the adoption of that amendment, would make the section more brief and accomplish the object aimed at. I do not wish to strike out the words "or otherwise acquiring" as there might be an advantage taken of that language by negroes, by having property held in trust for them or by purchasing long leases of real estate. For this reason I hope that any motion to strike out the words "or otherwise acquiring" will be voted down.

I shall not express my views at length upon the expediency and propriety of this section—my votes will plainly declare my sentiments.

THE PRESIDENT. The pending question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Floyd, to strike out the words "or otherwise acquiring," so that the section as amended would read :

"The General Assembly, at its first session under the amended Constitution, shall pass laws prohibiting negroes and mulattoes from coming into, or settling in this State, and prohibiting any negro or mulatto from purchasing real estate hereafter."

The question being put upon the adoption of this amendment, the same was adopted.

MR. BASCOM moved to amend by striking out all after the word "State."

MR. BASCOM. The effect of my amendment would be simply to prohibit the immigration of negroes and mulattoes into the State without declaring that those now here shall not enjoy the rights of property.

The amendment was not agreed to.

MR. TERRY. I move to amend by inserting between the words "mulattoes," where it occurs last in the section, and the words "from purchasing," the words "who shall have immigrated into this State since the first of January, eighteen hundred and fifty."

My object in offering this amendment is to secure an application of this provision to those whom, with the original form of the section, it would never reach. It will be two years before the session of a Legislature under the amended Constitution, and all this time the immigration of negroes and mulattoes into the State will be going on with impunity and accelerated and stimulated by the fact of the prohibition which is soon to take effect. Into the county adjoining the one in which I live, three or four hundred negroes have immigrated within the last year. It is for the purpose of immediately securing the State against that class of immigrants that I offer my proposition. If it is not adopted we shall see the free negroes of the adjoining slave States hastening to secure a residence in the State before the new Constitution goes into operation.

A MEMBER. The principle of the amendment may be well enough, but as the amendment is proposed to be made, the section will not read correctly. The amendment will have to be so prepared as to "fit in" with the last sentence of the section.

On motion, this amendment was laid on the table.

MR. HAWKINS. I move to amend the section by striking out of the first line after the words "the General Assembly" the words "at its first session under the amended Constitution shall" and insert the following: "Whenever the public interests shall demand it, may," so that the section as amended would read "The General Assembly, whenever the public interests shall demand it, may pass laws prohibiting negroes and mulattoes," &c.

MR. COOKERLY moved to lay the amendment on the table.

Upon this motion the yeas and nays were demanded, and, being ordered, resulted—yeas 81, nays 35—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Badger, Barbour, Blythe, Bourne, Bracken, Bright, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Coats, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbaker, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hall, Holliday, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Jones, Kent, Lockhart, Logan, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Nave, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Terry, Thornton, Vanbenthusen, Wiley, Wolfe, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—81.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Balingall, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Clark of Tippecanoe, Colfax, Conduit, Dunn of Jefferson, Foley, Gregg, Hawkins, Hitt, Hugin, Howe, Kilgore, Kinley, March, May, McClelland, McFarland, Milligan, Morgan, Mowrer, Murray, Newman, Niles, Steele, Taylor, Wallace, Watts, Wheeler, Work, and Wunderlich—35.

So the amendment was laid on the table.

MR. SMILEY offered the following: "amend by striking out of the first line the words "under the amended" and insert the word "this," so that as amended the section would read :

"The General Assembly at its first session under this Constitution shall pass laws prohibiting negroes," &c.

MR. SMILEY remarked, that this amendment would effect the object of my friend on my right (Mr. Terry) and will make the section more brief than in its present shape.

MR. McCLELLAND moved to strike out all after the word "State" in the fourth line of the printed Section.

MR. HOVEY rose to a question of order. An amendment precisely similar to the one just offered had previously been proposed by the gentleman from Wells and laid on the table. This proposition being the same as that, one cannot be entertained.

The CHAIR decided the amendment (Mr. McClelland's) to be in order.

A motion was then made that the amendment lie upon the table.

The yeas and nays having been demanded upon this motion, the same were ordered, and resulted—yeas 76, nays 39, as follows :

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Badger, Barbour, Blythe, Bourne, Bracken, Bright, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Coats, Cookerly, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Edmonston, Fisher, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hall, Holliday, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Kent, Lockhart, May, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Nave, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Terry, Thornton, Todd, Vanbenthusen, Wiley, Wolfe, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—76.

NAYS.—Anthony, Balingall, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Clark of Tippecanoe, Colfax, Crawford, Crumbacker, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Foley, Gordon, Gregg, Harbolt, Hawkins, Hitt, Howe, Kilgore, Kinley, March, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Morgan, Mowrer, Murray, Newman, Niles, Steele, Taylor, Wallace, Watts, Wheeler, Work, and Wunderlich.—39.

So the amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. HOGAN moved to amend the section by striking out all after the word "pass," and insert the following: "Such laws relative to negroes and mulattoes as shall be deemed right and expedient." The section would then read, "The General Assembly, at its first session, under the amended Constitution, shall pass such laws relative to negroes and mulattoes as shall be deemed right and expedient."

Mr. COLFAX. Mr. President, before the usual motion "to lay upon the table" is made and carried by the majority, who take this mode of disposing of all amendments to this section, which are proposed by the minority, or which modify the harshness of its provisions, I desire to say a few words. Not because I flatter myself that I shall thereby affect the conclusion of the Convention, or change a single vote. I know the disposition that prevails, too well: he, sir, that wars with prejudice, has but an uphill work. To argue before gentlemen, whose minds are settled and possessed by a strong prejudice against a particular subject, a particular class or race, in favor of that class or race, that, sir, of all other tasks, is most difficult. It might be added, sir, that those who have charged upon the minority a disposition to make offerings to the anti-slavery sentiment of portions of the State, might themselves be charged with pandering to the pro-slavery prejudice that exists in some other portions.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from St. Joseph will avoid charging members with improper motives.

Mr. COLFAX. Yes sir, I will endeavor to heed the directions of the Chair.—I am willing to judge charitably of the acts of gentlemen who would deny to any portion of mankind the commonest rights of humanity, and to believe they are acting from a sense of what they deem an expedient and politic course to be pursued. I am willing to believe that they are acting under an appreciation of the responsibilities and obligations of the oath they have taken; but at the same time I look through different spectacles; I cannot but see matters in a different light. And, as they have repeatedly charged upon those who dared to assert the human attributes of the black man and his right to protection from utter social annihilation, a desire to pander to the Free Soil sentiment of the people, and as gentlemen have been unchecked in this by any member upon the floor, or, allow me to say, by the Chair, I must be permitted to state, that while we bore it patiently without complaint, there may be—there is, sir, another sentiment in the State to be ministered to, beside a hatred of the negro and a sympathy with his enslaved condition. Now there appears to be a dominant sentiment, if not avowedly in favor of Slavery, most bitter in denunciation and proscription of all who avow their opposition to acts of oppression and tyranny, perpetrated against that unfortunate class. That sentiment being apparently in the ascendant, it may be more profitable, as well as more popular, to pander to that feeling, than to the anti-slavery sentiment of the north, to the sentiment of men who have been reviled and denounced here as agitators, fanatics—the casters of fire-brands and apples of discord into the State and National councils.

But, Mr. President, though gentlemen may succeed in making the names of all those who avow my respector sympathy for this latter sentiment, as it were, a "bye word and a hissing," yet will I not charge them in return with political design in their acts. They are acting as their constituents require of them; they are representing what they doubtless believe to be the feelings of the people who sent them to this Hall. But sir, I ask gentlemen to pause one moment, to look out beyond the narrow circle of this Chamber and of this State, and reflect what position we occupy before the world. Are we in South Carolina—are we sitting in this chamber as delegates of the people of South Carolina—delegates representing their feelings, and making haste to fulfil their behests? No, sir, strange as it may seem, we are the delegates of the people of a Free State—of a State, at least, which claims to be free. We are the assembled Representatives of a State that has lived for thirty-four years under a Constitution which, at its opening, at its very threshold, contains this sublime declaration:

"That the general, great, and essential principles of liberty and free Government may be recognized and unalterably established, WE DECLARE that ALL MEN are born equally free and independent, and have certain natural, inherent, and inalienable rights; among which are the enjoying and defending life and liberty, and of ACQUIRING, POSSESSING, and protecting PROPERTY, and pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety."

This Constitution, framed at a distance of more than a quarter of a century from our privileged point of Light and Progress, of vaunted advancement from the narrow and illiberal prejudices of the past, declares that all men—ALL men shall be inalienably entitled to those rights which, in 1850, we propose to strip from one class of men. We propose—for the committee who reported the section under consideration, expressly and purposely omitted that noble declaration—we propose, if I may be allowed the expression, to abolish that great and undeniable truth, uttered in our present Constitution—that truth which was ushered into the world on the auspicious morning of our Nation's birth, which had for its author, Jefferson, and for its vindicators his compatriots of the Revolution. For thirty-four years we have lived and prospered under the beneficent principles of a Constitution which declares as its great, fundamental, primary proposition, that all men shall enjoy the right of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property, and now, after the lapse of a cycle of years, most eventful of human progress, not only in the arts and in science, but in philanthropic enterprises, and great popular movements of reform, it is proposed to take a step—not forward, but most manifestly a step backwards—and adopt a solemn Constitutional provision that one class of men, a class most needing sympathy and protection, shall be prohibited in the enjoyment of the simplest, humblest rights guaranteed to them by our fathers. I appeal to gentlemen if this is in consonance with the spirit of our time—is it a step impelled by the out-gushing heart of humanity, or is it a stride backward into the darkness of past prejudices and oppression? Are we prepared to take such an attitude before the country and the world, because some of the delegates from the Southern portion of the State represent it to be the desire of the majority of their people? Let me cite to you the Constitution of a SLAVE STATE. If all other arguments are ineffective—if all other appeals fall dead—as it appears probable that they will upon the majority in this Chamber, let me ask them to look at the magnanimity of a Slave State. I cannot believe they will consent to do worse than a Convention of Southern Slaveholders! The preamble to the Constitution of DELAWARE declares:

"Through Divine goodness, ALL MEN have, BY NATURE, the right of worshiping and serving their Creator according to the dictates of their consciences, of enjoying and defending life and liberty, of ACQUIRING and PROTECTING reputation and PROPERTY."

Observe that the language of the Delaware Constitution, the first truth that it annunciates and settles, is that ALL men are entitled to these rights. No illiberal distinction here, no amendment as has been proposed to the Declaration of Independence so that it should read "all men are born free and equal,"—"except niggers" [laughter]. No such proviso finds a place in the organic law of this patriotic slaveholding State, but in an enlightened spirit they laid down, and still maintain a platform broad enough on this question for all classes and conditions of men to stand upon.

We make professions, which seem in strong and marked contrast with a provision like this one proposed for our new Constitution. We say to our constituents, to the nation, and to the world, that we abhor the institution of human slavery. In their presence we fervently exclaim "would to God that slavery were abolished in the southern States, but we have no power over the institutions of a sovereign State, we cannot compel them to abolish slavery, but we would rejoice if they would themselves wipe out that blot." And while we are professing such liberal, and, with the people of nearly the whole State, such popular sentiments, what are we doing here, what example are we setting to the people of the slaveholding States, whose peculiar institution every gentleman on this floor is ready to condemn! We are showing them, sir, by a solemn Constitutional provision, that the prejudice of this free state against negroes and their descendants is greater, and embodies itself in more oppressive and unjust laws than in the slave States themselves. There the prejudice is against the condition of the negro; the dislike is not personal in its character. In the South they live in constant intercourse with the blacks, they have them in their families from infancy to old age, from the cradle to the grave. They are their companions, dependent to be sure, but oftentimes trusted at home and abroad. But here in Indiana, one of the great States carved out of that North-Western territory, over which the beneficent ordinance of 1787 was extended, we are about to abrogate what the founders of our State declared to be inherent and inalienable rights, and to declare that the black man shall be prohibited from immigrating within our limits, and from purchasing a homestead with the proceeds of his toil! A delegate of the people rises in the dignity of his place and position, and characterizes the whole class as vermin; that, I regret to say, was the language of the gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Foster).

Sir, I shall not deny that the black race of this country is debased, that as a class they are inferior to the whites, that they are poor, weak, and to some extent degraded. I admit their intellectual and social inferiority. But I ask gentlemen who tell me all these things, who, before the judgment bar of God who created us and them, is responsible for that degradation? They are debased by the lust and avarice of the white race. The same God who made you and I, deemed it expedient in his wisdom, to create them also. Yes, sir, take all the advantage of them that power gives us, still the truth stands, they have the same common Creator. As the gentleman from Steuben (Mr. May) said a few days since in that calm, cool, and firm utterance of his sentiments, (sentiments which, so far as the extension of suffrage to them, by a Constitutional provision, were concerned, he knew were opposed by every other delegate in this Convention,) "the negro is either a man or he is a brute." The moral courage evinced in the avowal of the sentiments which he alone held, gained him honor; and although I did not concur with all his conclusions, I cannot but feel that he has deserved all the commendations I have heard from those most opposed to him, for the fearlessness which, upon that occasion, he so fully displayed.

But that presentation of the case is a forcible one, "the negro is either a man or a brute." If a brute, let us in all respects treat him as we treat other brutes; if he is a man let us act towards him as we should act towards those who, in common with us, received life from the same Creator. If he be degraded and mentally and morally inferior, then reserve, if you will, the bestowal of the highest privileges of citizenship, such as the exercise of the elective franchise. We ask here, we expect here, no extension of their privileges, but we ask you to treat them with humanity, and not to crush them as you would vermin out of your sight. But if you will not do this, let no man on this floor speak against the cruelties inflicted on the race in the Southern States, the slave factories of the African coast, or the horrors of "the middle passage." Your mouths will be stopped, the utterance of your condemnation checked, for by your own solemn and deliberate acts you declare the negro a brute, by excluding him from the commonest, the poorest, the humblest, privileges of human beings—the right to live and to possess the means of living purchased by the sweat of his toil.

Mr. President, do as we may here, our action is not final. Sooner or later this case will receive a fairer hearing, and calmer consideration at the bar of public opinion. That judgment we cannot, if we would, escape. What is done here precipitately, under the influence of prejudice, will receive a searching examination there and thence will come a condemnation of this matter as withering as it will be just. Cover over the matter as you will, with the pleas of expediency, this act will hereafter stand out in its naked deformity, unshielded even by popular prejudice, as an act of inexcusable tyranny done to a prostrate and defenseless class. Public opinion, if not right now, is ripening for an hour when we shall look back to this act with burning cheeks.

In the days of our Revolution, when those who laid the foundations of the Republic, struggled against tyrannic and sceptred power, why was it that their swords were not alone unsheathed? Why was it that France with her fleets and her chivalry came to our rescue? And why was it, when they had achieved the final victory, that the governments of the old world made haste to recognize our position as independent and our place as a sovereign among the nations, despite the frowns of that overshadowing power, that mistress of the seas, from whom we had revolted! It was because they saw that we had struggled against tyranny, and the hearts of men everywhere leaped instinctively with our own. Why was it in our own time and fresh still in our recollection, that Austria has been summoned to that bar of public opinion, and was sent thence with the brand of a world's reprobation? Because she pressed the iron heel of power into the heaving breast of the prostrate Magyar. And Russia, in spite of her colossal power, for pouring her hordes upon Hungary already struggling with Austrian armies, has been arraigned at the same bar, and stands a nation culprit. Her name has been made synonymous with despotism, and the blot upon her character will grow deeper and darker as coming time shall reveal in clearer relief the blackness of her crime against liberty—of her alliance with oppression.

But, sir, we are told by the gentleman from Clark (Mr. Gibson) and others, that the slave States are expelling the free negroes and emancipated slaves and therefore we in self-defense must prohibit them from immigrating into this State and from acquiring and possessing property. The gentleman (Mr. Gibson) denounced in the strongest terms of his sarcastic eloquence the provision in the Kentucky Constitution prohibiting an emancipated slave from remaining in the State upon pain of confinement in the State's Prison, and yet, such seems the inconsistency of gentlemen in a bad cause, they ask us to engraft a similar provision in the Constitution of this free State. We have not the excuse of Kentucky; we were not born and reared in the midst of slaves, our minds accustomed to treating them as chattels and prejudiced against every assertion of their manhood. We live surrounded by the beneficent influences of freedom, and yet, forsooth, we must follow the example of slaveholding Kentucky! Sir, the argument of the gentleman is bad—two wrongs can never make one right. Let us do right, that by its superior contrast with the wrong it shall condemn that wrong.

But, Mr. President, I wish to ask the majority how they propose to apply their remedy for a black population intermixed with the whites—how will they carry into effect the provisions if ingrafted in the Constitution? Are we to have perpetual quarantine around the State to prevent them from entering our borders, or are we to fill our county jails and State Prison with colored people and their descendants. I believe neither of these plans are advocated. If I am not mistaken the favorite proposition, and it has been already avowed and advocated here, is, that all persons in whose blood negro descent shall be detected, shall be arrested and sold for a period of six months to the highest bidder and the proceeds applied to the operations of the Colonization Society! And what a spectacle will Indiana in that attitude present to the civilized world? We reprobate slavery and the slave trade, denounce the one as inhuman and the other as piracy punishable with death. And yet what is it proposed to do? Nothing less than to erect shambles at every county seat, enjoin it upon officers to sell, not slaves, but those who are confessedly free, into a slavery, differing only from the Southern States, as to its duration.

Sir, such scenes are denounced in slaveholding States. High minded Southern men themselves openly denounce such revolting scenes but we in Indiana propose to re-enact those horrors. I ask gentlemen to pause; reflect upon the step you are asked to take. Is this to be the wreath of honor to be woven around our fair State?

Mr. President, this evil that gentlemen complain of may be inconvenient. I would not add to it by any act of mine. I would not propose to ingraft anything in the new Constitution that would invite them to immigrate into the State; but I do contend that we should leave them in the enjoyment of the paucity of rights and privileges now allowed them. And suppose other of the free States should be incited to follow our example, what then becomes the condition of things? The slave States drive the free negroes from their borders, and the free States declare they shall not come within their limits. Where shall the negro go? He has not the means to transport himself to his native land, or rather the land of his ancestors, whence, Mr. President, let us remember—we must remember—he came not of his own will. The lust and avarice of the white man stole them from their homes, herded them in the slave factories, doomed them to the horrors of the "middle passage," and landed them on our shores to live the bondman's life of unrequited toil. He was dragged from his home, and now by the accidents of life a portion of the race find themselves free but ordered off the earth by constitutional provisions, like the one now before this Convention. Where shall the negro go? Into the Ohio river!

The evil of a black population in our midst may be a great one; the inconveniences in particular localities may be severe; but, sir, through the darkness of the present I see the dawn of a brighter day. I hail the colonization movement as the most beneficent yet projected for the amelioration of the condition of the African, and at the same time, the relief of the people of this country from the evils of a black population in their midst. And when the National Government comes forward and employs steamers to transport the free negroes to Liberia, free of expense to themselves, the work will be consummated. Thus will our country requite to that injured class the wrongs done it as a nation. Thousands will go cheerfully to that land, and especially when a greater aggregate of intelligence amongst them shall convince them that they will thereby improve their social and moral condition, as they can never hope to in a country where they are, and ever must be, inferior.

When the United States thus brings the resources of a mighty nation to bear upon the colonization of Africa, the shores of that Continent which once echoed to the shrieks and groans of the captured native, and witnessed the manacled coffles driven on board the slaver, and consigned to the terrible sufferings of the passage across the ocean, will be lined with republican settlements, instead of slave factories; the slave trade will be abolished, and civilization and Christianity will illumine its dark interior. I look hopefully forward to that day. But no such measures as the one now before the Convention will aid in the realization of this hope; they are calculated rather to intensify the prejudice against the race, and put afar off the day of their deliverance and ours.

Let us not adopt such measures as we shall hate to look back upon, from the future; such provisions as we shall burn with shame to see inscribed on the first page of our organic law. Let us do equal and exact justice, regardless of creed, race, or color. If we value liberty let us not step beyond the Declaration of Independence and declare its sublime truths a living lie.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark that in interrupting the gentleman from St. Joseph at the commencement of his remarks there was no intention to circumscribe him more than other gentlemen in debate. I supposed the gentleman was, perhaps slightly, under the influence of excitement, and might be led into making charges upon gentlemen which he might regret.

One other remark. The gentleman from St. Joseph intimated that the Chair had permitted a greater digression and liberty in gentlemen of the majority on this question. I have no recollection of such a case; my impression was that the charges had been about equal on both sides. The first remark of the kind—in derogation of the motives and influences actuating gentlemen, came, I believe, from the party in this debate to which the gentleman (Mr. Colfax) belongs.

Mr. COLFAX. My recollection differs from the President, but, of course, I desire no alteration with the Chair.

Mr. KILGORE. I think the President is mistaken. Gentlemen of the majority made the first charge of this kind—one gentleman accused the free-soilers of being factionists and agitators, and of throwing fire-brands into the councils of the nation, and, also, alluded similarly to gentlemen upon this floor.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I presume the gentleman from Delaware makes the allusion for my benefit. I did make an allusion similar to the one mentioned, but it was to the party, not to the individuals of that party on this floor or elsewhere.

Mr. DOBSON. I charged that the resolution of the gentleman from St. Joseph, (Mr. Colfax,) might have a political object in view, and I am not yet prepared to take back the charge.

On motion by Mr. SHERROD, the Convention adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, Nov. 13, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. CRESSY.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. READ of Clark moved to postpone the order of the day, for the purpose of taking up the article relating to the Treasurer and Auditor of State, that it might be read a third time.

The motion was agreed to, and the said article having been read,

The yeas and nays were demanded upon its passage.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will remark that the rule requires that the yeas and nays should be taken.

Mr. PETTIT. I rise to ask for information. I want to ascertain the views of the President, and of the Convention, upon this point, viz.: at what period these sections are to go to the committee on revision and arrangement; whether after they are finally passed by the Convention, or before their final passage.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that they should go to the committee of revision after they have been passed. The different sections will then be arranged by the committee, and they will come back as a whole.

Mr. PETTIT. There will be a final vote then by the Convention after such arrangement of them shall have been made?

The PRESIDENT. Certainly. The question will be on concurring in the report of the committee.

Mr. PRATHER suggested, that before taking the yeas and nays upon the adoption of this article, there should be a call of the House.

Objection was made by several delegates, and the call was not insisted upon.

The yeas and nays were then taken on the adoption of the article, which reads as follows:

SECTION.—There shall be elected by the qualified voters of this State, a Secretary, an Auditor and Treasurer of State, who shall hold their several offices for two years, and until their successors shall be elected and qualified; they shall perform such duties as shall be enjoined upon them by law, and no person shall be eligible to either of said offices more than four years in a period of six years.

AYES.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Badger, Balingrill, Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Bracken, Butler, Carr, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c. Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hall, Hardin, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hogin, Holman, Huff, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Warren, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Newman, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Shoup, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wiley, Work, Wunderlich, Zenor, and Mr. President—90.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barbour, Blythe, Bourne, Dunn of Jefferson, Howe, Nave, and Wheeler—7.

So the article was adopted.

Mr. CHAPMAN'S name being called, he rose and said,

Mr. President, I am in favor of annual elections—

The PRESIDENT. It is not in order to make any remarks.

Mr. CHAPMAN. May I not assign the reasons for my vote?

Mr. PRESIDENT. It is not in order.

Mr. CHAPMAN. Well, then, I will vote "aye." As I cannot get such a provision as I would prefer, I must be content with this.

Mr. FOSTER not having been within the bar when his name was called, asked permission to vote.

His vote was not received. He desired to vote in the affirmative.

Mr. EDMONSTON inquired of the Chair whether it did not require two-thirds of the members to make a quorum. He observed that two-thirds had not voted.

Mr. KENT. The act calling this Convention reads as follows:

"A majority of members shall constitute a quorum to do business."

The PRESIDENT. The Convention will now take up the section that was under consideration yesterday at the time of the adjournment.

The section is as follows :

SECTION —. The General Assembly, at its first session under the amended Constitution, shall pass laws prohibiting negroes and mulattoes from coming into, or settling in, this State; and prohibiting any negro or mulatto from purchasing or otherwise acquiring real estate, hereafter.

The pending question being upon the following amendment, proposed by the gentleman from Grant (Mr. Hugin) :

Strike out all after the word "pass," in the second line, and insert "such laws for the government of negroes and mulattoes as they may deem right and expedient."

Mr. EDMONSTON moved that the amendment be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALL. Is there any amendment now pending?

The PRESIDENT. A motion has been made by the gentleman from Jefferson to strike out the section.

Mr. HALL. I suppose that a motion to amend the section will have precedence. I have to say, sir, that I am for going as far as the farthest, for the purpose of preventing an additional immigration of black population into the State. I want to prohibit them from coming here to live among us. I am also in favor of going as far as any other gentleman for the purpose of providing the means of colonizing the blacks who are already here—for the purpose of sending them to Liberia. I shall be in favor of any proposition for that purpose. But, sir, I am opposed to placing restrictions upon the blacks who are now in the State, many of whom were probably born and raised here. The section under consideration, prohibits any free black man in this State from purchasing and holding real property. This, I conceive, to be wrong in principle. They are here among us; many of them have been born here, and it occurs to me as being an outrage upon the feelings of the community, to say that they shall not hold real property as well as personal property. It is wrong in principle to deprive them of this right. If they are to be allowed to purchase and hold personal property, upon the same principle they ought to be allowed to hold real property. I therefor propose to add the following proviso to the last section of the article, and shall ask the yeas and nays upon its adoption.

The proviso was read as follows:

"Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent any negro or mulatto residing in the State from holding real property as heretofore."

Mr. GIBSON moved to lay the proviso upon the table.

Mr. HALL, rising to address the Chair—

Mr. GIBSON said, that if the gentleman desired to make any remarks he would withdraw the motion.

Mr. HALL. I wish to say this, that I should be glad to have a vote directly upon the proposition, but if a majority of the Convention are in favor of laying it upon the table, let us take the vote upon that motion. I shall of course yield to the will of the majority.

Mr. GIBSON said that it could make but little difference whether the vote were taken upon the motion to lay the proviso upon the table, or upon its adoption. The sense of the Convention could be obtained in either way. The only difference, continued Mr. G., is this: if a majority of the Convention are in favor of the amendment, I should like, before its adoption, that there should be an opportunity to make some modification. That is the object I have in view in moving to lay it upon the table. The minority, if there be a minority, will have an opportunity to record their votes upon the motion to lay it upon the table, as upon the adoption of the proposition. But if I am not mistaken, this principle has been directly voted upon, on amendments that were offered yesterday, and voted down by the Convention. I renew the motion to lay the amendment on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RARIDEN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark to the gentleman, that debate is out of order.

The yeas and nays were taken on the motion to lay the amendment on the table, with the following result—yeas 44, nays 57:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Badger, Barbour, Blythe, Bourne, Butler, Carr, Chapman, Coats, Cookerly, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dunn of Perry, &c., Edmonston, Fisher, Gibson, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hardin, Helmer, Jones, Kent, Lockhart, Logan, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Moore, Morrison of Washington, Nofsinger, Pepper of Crawford, Read of Clark, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shoup, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Stevenson, Tague, Thornton, Wiley, and Wolfe—43.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Balingall, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Bracken, Clark of Tippecanoe, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Crumbaek, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Hall, Hawkins, Helm, Hitt, Holman, Howe, Huff, Kendall of Warren, Maguire, March, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Morgan, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Shannon, Snook, Steele, Taylor, Todd, Watts, Wunderlich, Wheeler, Work, Wallace, Yocum, and Mr. President.—58.

So the amendment was not laid on the table.

Mr. GIBSON. For the purpose of rendering the amendment definite, I will move a further amendment: to insert after the word "holding," the words, "or purchasing," so as to prohibit negroes from hereafter holding or purchasing real estate, which, I suppose, is the purpose of the proviso. I shall, however, vote against the amendment myself; and, for the purpose of recording that vote, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PETTIT. I wish, sir, to make a brief statement in reference to this matter, simply showing how I shall vote, and the reasons that influence me in so voting.

In the first place, I shall vote to exclude further immigration of negroes and mulattoes into this State, believing it to be for our and their benefit, so to do. All experience has taught me and all research has confirmed me in the opinion that no two distinct races of people can live together for any length of time harmoniously, though one be a slave race, and the other a slave-holding race. Much less will they be able to live together if you attempt to confer equal privileges upon the inferior race. We are confirmed in this by the teachings of all history; even the sacred scriptures themselves, tell us so. In the political economy of Moses, we are taught this doctrine, that two distinct races cannot live together. One of the distinct commands given to Moses, amidst the thunders of Sinai, was, that he should command his people to put to the sword the ancient Canaanites; every one of them was to be exterminated, and the failure to complete the work of extermination, on the part of Joshua, the successor of Moses, brought upon him countless difficulties. In violation of the command from Heaven, to exterminate all the ancient Canaanites, Joshua made a treaty with one of the tribes, and undertook to conciliate them and make them friends and allies of the children of Israel; but a rebellious spirit manifested itself, and he was compelled, after all, to put them to death.

I hope that we shall never be driven to use such harsh means as Moses used, in reference to that people. But no one will doubt the authenticity of the history relating to this matter; we have it upon the authority of the sacred scriptures themselves.

You will find in Mexico, the same condition of things. That country has been overrun by swarms—by waves of population from the north, and at three different times has almost an entire extermination taken place. There is now being made, a vain and abortive attempt, on the part of the Spaniards, who are there settled, to mingle with the Mexicans, or the race originally occupying that country. The attempt will prove utterly futile. It cannot be successful or prosperous.

What has been the condition of things consequent upon the settlement of this country by Europeans? When our ancestors, our immediate progenitors, landed on this continent, they found here a different race of the human species. What is the condition of that race now? Have we amalgamated with them? Quite the reverse. They have disappeared with the Elk and the Buffalo. They have receded before the advancing wave of civilization,—they have receded and diminished in numbers, as the Anglo Saxon race has advanced. The races cannot commingle. It is contrary to the laws of nature. I shall, therefore, having briefly stated my reasons for believing that it will be better for both races, that they should continue to be separate and distinct in all their political relations, without any affectation of sympathy—without any mawkish sentiment of compassion and philanthropy; believing, as I do, that it will be for the benefit of the negro, that he should not be placed upon a footing of equality with the white man, I will second any measure having for its object the removal of the blacks to their native climate. I shall be ready to aid, by my voice and vote, in the adoption of any feasible plan for colonizing them—for inducing them to go to Liberia.

But, that is not the whole question. If those blacks who are here now, and their descendants, are to be allowed to remain here, I shall be in favor of encouraging them to acquire property, instead of discouraging them. I think this a sound principle; and why is it a sound principle? Sir, if you have a body of men among you, so entirely disfranchised as to have no interest in the harmony, well-being, and prosperity of the community; men who contribute nothing to the coffers of the State, and who have no stake in the country; nothing to lose, and consequently no responsibility: fires may rage in your towns and villages, without an effort, on their part, to save your property. They would rather rejoice and chuckle over your losses: they would behold your dwellings consumed with a feeling of satisfaction; regarding you as inimical to them; entertaining towards you a feeling of ill-will, on account of being deprived of the right to participate in your political privileges. But, if you induce them to acquire property beside you, they will always (self-interest will prompt them to do so) be ready to contribute their aid in the protection of your property. They would then have an inducement to aid in suppressing riots and disorders; you would make them better citizen and safer neighbors. If you cut off from him the right to hold property, you take away from him the inducement to become a good and peaceable citizen. I say to you, sir, show me the country where every man in the community can be a land holder, and I will show you a society, a community, that the world in arms cannot trample on or disturb. I will show you a healthful order of society, a combination of people for mutual support and protection, that no outward oppression can disturb. Every man will stand by his neighbor's rights, and protect his neighbor's interests. But, under a state of things such as that which existed in ancient Rome, there is no community of interests, and consequently no safety. When all the landed estates had gone into the hands of the nobles, and the common people were appealed to to come forward and to shed their blood in defence of the country, their reply was, "We have no country."

If you would have men stand by the country, and shed their blood in its defense, you must give them an interest in the country. If you would have a law-abiding community, you must give each man an interest in maintaining the law and preserving good order, suppressing riots, and disorders, and protecting property.

I shall vote, therefore, first for excluding the blacks; for preventing them from coming into the State, but if they are to be permitted to come, I shall vote for inducing them, or rather offering them inducements, to hold property, for the purpose of giving them an incentive to suppress disturbances and to maintain order in the community.

The hour having arrived for the consideration of the special order,

RIGHTS OF MARRIED WOMEN.

The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the section reported by Mr. Owen, from the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of the State in relation to the rights of married women.

The gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) being entitled to the floor, he rose and addressed the Convention.

MR. OWEN. I confess to my anxiety regarding the fate of the sections that have just been read. No subject of greater importance than that to which they refer has come up, since we met here. No subject of greater importance will engage our attention, till we close our labors and go hence. As in estimation next to the right of enjoying life and liberty, our Constitution enumerates the right of acquiring, possessing, protecting property. And these sections refer to the latter right, heretofore declared to be natural, inherent, inalienable, yet virtually withheld from one-half the citizens of our State.

Women are not represented in our legislative halls. They have no voice in selecting those who make laws and Constitutions for them. There may be good reason for that. I enter not on the inquiry. One reason often given for excluding women from the right of suffrage is an expression of confident belief, that their husbands and their fathers will surely guard their interests, and see fair justice meted out to these, the especial objects of their care.

I should like to have a little more confidence in this opinion than experience has given me. I should like, for the honor of my sex, to believe, that the legal rights of women are, at all times, as zealously guarded as they would be if women had votes to give to those who watch over their interests, and to withhold from those who pass by and neglect them.

I impute to no gentleman the deliberate intention to render less than justice to the other sex merely because they have not the right of suffrage. I but say, that self-interest is a marvellous sharpening of the wits, and causes us to think of, and enables us to discover, many things, which, without its quickening influence, might escape our observation.

Suffer me, sir, in defense of my scepticism on this point, to lay before you and this Convention, an item from my legislative recollections.

It will be thirteen years next winter, since I (then a member of the Legislature and of its committee to revise the laws) reported, from a seat just over the way, a change in the then existing law of descent. At that time the widow of an intestate dying without children, was entitled, under ordinary circumstances, to dower in her husband's real estate and one-third of his personal property. The change proposed was to give her one-third of the real estate of her husband absolutely, and two-thirds of his personal property; far too little, indeed; but yet as great an innovation as Mr. Marshall of Jefferson, and myself (we were the sub-committee to whom that law had been referred) thought it probable we could carry.

A stormy debate ensued; in the course of which—I remember it well—I was assailed by a distinguished lawyer, then a member of the House, in no mild or measured terms, as a man seeking to subvert the whole order of society; as an innovator, to whom nothing was sacred, not even laws and principles dating back to the days of Edward the Confessor. The attack failed in its object; the proposed change became the law of the land; was every where received, so far as I have heard, with approbation, and remained in force until a commission, appointed in 1841, reported, a year or two afterwards, our present Revised Code.

How stands the law now? As regards real estate, you will find the answer on page four hundred and thirty-seven of that Revised Code. Nothing but an actual inspection of the law itself could have persuaded me, that in this nineteenth century, and in this republican land, such could ever have been permitted to disgrace our Statute Book. I am very sure that there are gentlemen on this floor to whom, even now, some of its provisions will appear incredible.

The widow of an intestate, in case there be no children, and in case there be father, or mother, or brother, or sister, of the husband, alive, is heir to no part whatever of her deceased husband's real estate. She is entitled to dower only; that is, to the rents and profits, during her life, of one-third of his estate.

If there be no father, no mother, no brother, no sister, you imagine, perhaps, that the law suffers her then to enjoy, unmolested, the property her husband has left behind him. Vain expectation! The law goes in search of a grandfather or a grandmother; or, failing these, of an uncle or an aunt; or, failing these again, of some cousin or cousin's child; and if it find any such, it grants two-thirds of the husband's property to these relatives; living, perhaps, in some distant region; unknown, it may have been, even to the deceased, from whom they inherit.

But yet again. Say there be no father, no mother, no brother, no sister, no grandfather, no grandmother, no uncle, no aunt; not even a cousin or a cousin's child; then, you feel assured, the law will be satisfied, instead of wandering over the world in search of kinsfolk more distant still, to let the widow take the property left by the husband she has lost. Again you are at fault! The law has no such intention! It institutes the inquiry, whether, under the title of "nearest of kin," some far off relative, little dreaming of such a windfall, cannot be ferreted out, upon whom it may bestow, as the statute has it, "one equal half of the inheritance, as an heir of the intestate," the widow receiving the other half only.

And it is at last, after the law has exhausted its ingenuity in discovering some relative, no matter how remote in feeling or in blood, in whose favor it may divert the dead husband's property from her who was once the wife of his bosom, it is then only, as a last, reluctant alternative, that the law permits the childless widow to inherit the farm, where, perchance, her youth and womanhood have been spent!

I marvel, since we are all somewhat related through our common ancestor, Adam, that it has never been proposed to carry out the iniquitous principle a little further, and enact that where no relatives, how remote soever, can be found, half the widow's portion shall be equally divided among the citizens of the county, or of the State.

The gross injustice in its practical workings, of such a rule of descent does not fully appear, until we call to mind, as in approaching all questions of legal reform it behoves us to do, the actual condition in life, of the mass of our population in this State. We have few among us, who are, in the proper acceptation of the term, poor; we have few who may be called rich. Most of our citizens are in moderate circumstances. But look a little farther. We are an agricultural population. Farming is our chief occupation. A large majority of our people are small proprietors of land; the best, and happiest, and most independent class in the world. They live on their own farms, purchased or inherited, usually in early youth; worth, on an average, if the owner have survived to enlarge and improve them, perhaps from a thousand to two thousand dollars, and affording an annual rental, say of from one hundred to two hundred dollars. Suppose the rental to average a hundred and fifty dollars. That is a living; a very humble one, indeed, but still a living. If the law permitted the widow to inherit it, were it in life rental only, she would be raised above pecuniary dependence. And is it not right and just that she should be? In the heavy labors incident to the settlement of a new country, who takes lot and part? Is it the man alone? Is there no task but that he performs? no home duties, no domestic labors, sometimes weighing down his weaker partner even to the grave? I appeal to the successful settler, who has raised his cabin first in the wild woods, has gradually opened a flourishing farm, and, at last, has seen flow in upon him comfort and plenty, whether he, alone and unaided, built up his fortune and made comfortable his home! I ask him whether there was not one who saved, while he accumulated; whether, when his arm was busy without, her hand was idle within? I ask him whether his heart does not revolt at the idea, that when he is carried to his long home his widow shall see snatched from her, by an inhuman law, the very property her watchful care had mainly contributed to increase and keep together?

Yet this idea, unnatural, revolting as it is, is carried out, in all its unmitigated rigor, by the statute to which I have just referred. Out of a yearly rental of a hundred and fifty dollars, it is seldom that the widow of an intestate becomes entitled to more than fifty; a sum wholly inadequate to her support. The other hundred dollars go—whither? To the husband's father or mother? Yes, if they survive; and in that case, there is a chance that they may aid, and care for, their daughter-in-law. But if they are dead, what then? A brother-in-law or a sister-in-law takes it. Why are their rights preferred to the wife's? But let that pass, and suppose that there are no brothers and sisters. Then comes in the claim of the husband's uncle or his aunt, or his cousin. Do husbands toil through a lifetime, in order to support their uncles, and aunts, and cousins? What would be thought of a law that should compel a man to maintain them, in preference to his own wife? Yet they inherit two-thirds of the farm. They take two-thirds of the income. Ay! if but a single cousin's child, be it only six months old, survive, to that infant go a hundred dollars of the rental, and to the widow there remains but the pittance of fifty. Can injustice go beyond this? Yes! for if aunts, and uncles, and cousins all fail, some undefined relative, making out a claim as nearest of kin, still carries off from the widow one-half her deceased husband's estate.

What think you of a law like that, on the statute book of a civilized and a Christian land? While the husband survives—while his sustaining arm is still busily providing for her whom, when she stood beside him, a bride in her youth—ful prime, he had sworn through life to comfort and support—so long their entire property is there, to aid his exertions. When that sustaining arm is laid in the grave, and the widow is left without husband to cherish, without son to offer her a home, then comes the law, more cruel than death, and decrees, that poverty shall be added to desolation!

I have a better opinion of those with whom I now serve, a better opinion of my sex, a better opinion of the people of my adopted State, than to believe for an instant, that, if this law were held up distinctly before us, in all its revolting deformity, for our acceptance or rejection, we would hesitate a single moment in condemning and rejecting it.

But there are sins of omission as well as sins of commission. What avails it that we think justly and feel rightly, if that just thinking and right feeling bear no fruit? Say, delegates of the people of Indiana, answer and say whether you, whether those who sent you here, are guiltless in this thing? Have you done justice? Have you loved mercy? Have you visited the widow in her affliction? Have you not rather, by tolerating on your statute book such a law as that, trodden down the crushed heart, added new weight to the heavy burdens, fresh stings to the grievous sorrow of her whom the bereaving hand of death has already cut off, alike from affection and from support?

The instance here selected in proof that our law makers have neglected to guard the interests of that sex who never enter our legislative councils to speak for themselves, is far from being an isolated one. Take another item from the same statute of descents: the every-day case of a husband dying intestate and leaving a widow and children. In that case, as every one knows, the widow, as to her husband's real estate, has dower only; she is entitled, during life, to one-third of its rents and profits. The law considers it impolitic to trust her with more than a third of the rental. Ask any member of the legal profession the reason for such distrust, and he will remind you that the interests of the children must be cared for, must be guarded against neglect or injustice. Neglect! injustice! from whom, I pray you? From their own mother? But reverse the case, and suppose it is the wife who dies, and leaves a widow and the children she has borne him. What portion of the rents and profits of his wife's real estate does the law assign to him? The whole. As tenant by the courtesy, he takes the whole. But there are the children; are their interests not to be cared for? Are they not to be protected against neglect or injustice? No; not in the case of the father. No mistrust of him! No fears that he may marry again, and that a step-mother may rule his household. The father is trusted; the mother is not. Does not nature, does not experience, does not Holy Writ itself cry out against the invidious preference! "Can a mother forget her child?" If there be in this world one holy sentiment, one feeling, strong, faithful, trustworthy, universal in its prevalence, that sentiment, that feeling, is a mother's love for the child she has borne and nursed.

I ask you, Mr. President, I ask my fellow-delegates, whether it need further argument to prove, that we ought to mistrust ourselves when we act in any matter touching the rights and interests of women? The absent have been forgotten; they who have no vote or voice here have been neglected; it avails nothing to conceal or to deny it.

But let us turn to the question more immediately before us. Let us pass from the case of the widow and look to that of the wife; and let us inquire, whether the interests of the one are better cared for by law than those of the other.

The old doctrine of the common law, that the legal existence of the woman is suspended during marriage—the same doctrine that has existed for centuries in England—still substantially regulates, in a majority of the States, the relations of husband and wife as to property. In a general way, the legal effect of marriage is,—

A married woman cannot, therefore, legally sell the smallest article of personal property; she cannot, legally, give away the most trifling trinket, no matter whether it was inherited, or the produce even of her own labor. A farmer's wife cannot, in her own right, sell the poultry she has raised or the butter she has made. Under ordinary circumstances, a sale by her of poultry or butter in the market is, indeed, good; but that is only because the law regards her as her husband's agent; just as it would regard his hired laborer, sent to town to sell the same articles.

Even if a husband neglect to provide for his children, and the wife by her labor support them, the produce of her labor is his. Say that he has been absent for weeks or months, squandering what money he has in dissipation; say that, in the mean time, his wife, faithful to her home duties, has contrived, by constant labor as a seamstress, perhaps, or a washerwoman, to supply his place; suppose that she has laid by in her trunk—the same trunk, perhaps, in which her mother had packed, with careful hand, on her daughter's marriage day, the little property she had to give her—suppose that the wife had laid by in that trunk a few dollars, hardly and bitterly earned, saved with difficulty as a scanty fund to purchase clothing for her children against the inclemency of winter; and suppose—alas! how often is the case a real one!—suppose, that the drunken husband comes home some evening, breaks open the trunk and carries off the money; is that larceny? has he stolen? By no means; he broke open his own trunk; he took—so the law declares—his own money!

Secondly. The husband acquires, in virtue of the marriage, the rents and profits, (in all cases, during her life,) of his wife's real estate.

The wife loses them, as absolutely as she does her personal property. The husband's prospective right to them throughout his life may be sold, at common law, for the benefit of his creditors.

Thus, if we suppose a married woman bringing, in marriage, real estate, say of the yearly rental of some two or three hundred dollars; enough, if it were assured to her, to maintain herself and her children; then, if the husband, by extravagance or otherwise, become involved in debt, his right during life, to this rental of his wife's estate may be taken and sold on execution. The fee of the real estate remains, indeed, in the wife; but its rents and profits—all that it shall yield during the husband's life—goes to another. If, under these circumstances, the husband desert his wife and children, she remains without remedy or resource. Death alone, by removing her unworthy partner, can restore to the deserted one, the means of supporting and educating, from the produce of her own land, her own children.

The flagrant injustice of this provision of the Common law, led, about four years ago, to the passage of a Statute by our Legislature, that the rents and profits of a married woman's lands, "shall be deemed and taken to be her separate property," and may not be sold for her husband's debts. These words of the Statute bar, I believe, the marital right. All this is well, as far as it goes.

In all cases, then, in which a farmer or other person, is sufficiently rich to be able to give to his daughter, on her marriage, or to bequeath to her, at his death, property in land, she is already, under our Statute, protected in its rents and profits. But this protection does not extend to personal property. If a father, or a mother, be too poor to spare to the daughter a farm; if all they can give be but certain household furnishings, turned off from the old loom, perhaps, that stands in the cabin corner; the produce of long hours of maternal labor, spent, that a favorite daughter may not go empty-handed to her future home;—if this be all the young wife's property, the law refuses her any protection whatever, whether against the husband or the husband's creditor. The mother's last gift may be sold off in the public street by a careless constable or a reckless husband. I have seen it done. Some years ago, there came to New Harmony, the village in which I reside, two young men, from Kentucky, where but a few weeks before they had married sisters. While awaiting a boat, they persuaded their wives, on the plea of economy, to occupy a cabin about a mile in the country, leaving behind them some five or six large boxes, containing various articles of home manufacture of the most substantial character, sheetings, towelings, coverlets, blankets, and a large stock of home-made clothing. The next day the scoundrels opened these boxes, sold off at public auction, every article contained therein, and, the day after, left for parts unknown, with the money which they had legally, but most iniquitously, obtained. The poor girls, thus robbed and deserted, were indebted to the private charity of our citizens for the means to return, desolate and penniless, to their father's house.

Is all this as it should be? Do we mete out fair and equal justice to rich and poor, when we enact laws to protect the land-owner in her rents, and neglect to afford similar protection, to the less fortunate and wealthy? to her who owns, perhaps, but a single hundred dollars worth of property? or, (a graver injustice yet!) to her who has inherited nothing but willing hands and a stout heart, and who but asks, in case a vagabond husband leave her to toil on, unaided, in fulfilment of the duties he violates and neglects, that the law will secure to her, that, to which every human being has an inherent right, the ownership of the produce of her own labor.

But there are reasons urged in favor of refusal. The peace of the family may be invaded, the harmony of the conjugal relations marred, by this division of interest. I reply, in the first place, that we have already risked these consequences by the law we have passed as to real estate. Nearly four years have elapsed since its passage. Do husband and wife live together less harmoniously now, in our State than they did before? I have heard no such complaint. And if we have thus trusted, and safely trusted, in the greater, shall we fear to trust in the less?

But I meet this objection on broader ground. Let us look at it in the face. Let us dissect and carefully examine it; for therein is contained after all, the substantial argument urged by the opponents of this reform.

The argument plainly stated is, that, to ensure conjugal harmony, the wife must be divested of all rights of property whatever, and remain, at every moment, wholly dependent upon the sense of justice of the husband for every thing beyond that bare support which the law, if it be appealed to, will allow her.

Is, then, the secret of domestic felicity to be found in pecuniary dependence? A strange anomaly it would be in human affairs, if that were so! Has pecuniary dependence a tendency to elevate, to purify, to civilize the character? Is that a doctrine a man would choose to teach his son—ay! or his daughter? Dependent, to some extent the relation of a wife to her husband, is and always must be. Men have monopolized all the most profitable occupations of life; custom sanctions this; and even if it did not, women would be, in a measure, shut out from these, by the engrossing character of their maternal cares and duties. There is great danger, that this dependence, natural and necessary as it is, should give birth, on the one hand, in coarse and overbearing natures, to tyranny, and on the other, in timid and yielding natures, to abject fear. Shall the law increase this danger, aggravate these evil results? Shall it make the pecuniary dependence of a married woman absolute, hopeless; reaching to an utter denial of the right to call her own even the smallest article of household property?

And to this abject dependence, are we to trace, as to their birth-place, the virtues, the endearments, that make HOME the cherished word it is? From source so base and low can any thing good or noble spring? Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles? Is woman's domestic virtue the creature of a Statute that places her as to property, in the same category with the African bondsman, the infant, the idiot, the insane? Out upon it! Woman is the good, the unselfish being we find her—far better she always was, in every moral attribute, than man—woman is, what she is,—not in virtue of a heartless law—in spite of it!

Look, I pray you, a little more narrowly yet, at the doctrine that the harmony of the family connection rests upon the pecuniary dependence of the wife. The very argument presumes in the husband kindness, indulgence, generosity. It presupposes in him a spirit which virtually abrogates the law. I know, I rejoice to know, that there are many cases of married couples in whose relations to each other an alteration of the law which should make the wife an independent owner of property, would work no practical change; cases in which the husband, uncompelled by law and following a delicate instinct of justice, either legally or virtually places his wife in a position of pecuniary independence. But it is not for such men, or such cases, that laws are made, or are necessary. It is the province of law to restrict, not the generous and the just, but the violent, the unjust, the encroaching. It is for the bad, not the good, that legislation is required. Yet even in the case of a husband good, and just, and kind, can we assert with truth that the law is free from injurious effect? The power of granting pecuniary favors ought not to be all on one side. It must grate, sometimes, on a sensitive and generous nature, to repeat, even to an indulgent husband, the request, before every little purchase, for money; made at a moment, perhaps, when it can ill be spared; just and proper, it may be, yet to which, beyond a bare support, the petitioner has not as much legal right as the hired servant-girl has, to demand her wages.

The confidence of familiar affection takes, it is true, from this, as from every other false position, its sting; but the position is not the less false, the law not the less inequitable, on that account.

We trust to the husband's generosity to supply the wife with all she may properly demand. And can we not trust to the wife's generosity, if she be the independent owner of property, to grant to the husband, in his time of need, all he can reasonably require? Do we find, in the other sex, less liberality than in ours? Are their affections less warm, their sympathies less active? In the dark hour of adversity, do they cling less faithfully, do they sacrifice less freely, than we do? That is not my experience of women. Ruth, in her self-devotion, when, in the expressive words of Scripture, she slave unto Naomi, is but the type of her sex. The language of woman, not to a faithful friend alone, often to one most unworthy, to be called her cherisher and protector, is the same to-day, as it was three thousand years ago. "Whither thou goest, thither will I go. Where thou lodgest, there will I lodge. Where thou diest will I die, and there will I be buried. The Lord do so to me and more also, if aught save death part me and thee."

Women, even with their whole property in their own hands and at their sole disposal, are much more likely to bestow it imprudently than to withhold it selfishly. Ought we to deny to them the gratification, dear to every generous mind, yet within the reach only of the independent owner of property, of aiding, by pecuniary sacrifice, the object of their affections?

Under the happiest marriages, the provisions of the Common Law are but nugatory. They are never better than useless. But what shall we say of them when the dependence of the wife for everything is, not upon a generous friend, but upon a harsh, selfish, exacting master? or—a less aggravated case,—upon a reckless, improvident spendthrift? These are the cases where a change of law is wanted. These are the cases where the wife should have power to secure, from tyranny or extravagance, some pecuniary protection for herself and her children, against dependence and want.

It is an argument both weak and worthless, that if we do, by law, withhold a fair share of independent power from women, they will still contrive, by management, to get that and more than their share. Say that women in the mass did, much more frequently than they do, usurp, by artful manœuvring, the rights which the law denies them, is the denying law, therefore, just in its principle, moral in its influence? An Eastern despot's fawning favorite, though his life be, at any moment, at his master's disposal, may acquire unbounded sway, and become the virtual ruler of the land. But favoritism is an improper, because immoral, source of power.

A noble nature will not stoop to the intrigues through which such power is commonly reached.

We ought not so to place women, that any of their rights must be won by arts of blandishment. That is a demoralizing situation. Where true affection exists, it will show itself without any reference to property. Where it does not exist, it degrades the character to wear its counterfeit, from mercenary motive.

There is a species of very silly sentimentalism which it is the fashion to put forth in after dinner toasts and other equally veracious forms, about woman being the only tyrant in a free Republic; about the chains she imposes on her willing slaves, the despotism of her resistless arts, the sovereign power of her conquering beauty. It would be much to our credit, if we would administer a little less flattery and a little more justice.

A VOICE. Consent to that sentiment! [Cries of "consent, consent."]

Mr. OWEN. It needed not such expression from the Convention to assure me, that the sentiment finds an echo in their hearts. I know well that it does.

Mr. President, I have thus briefly and slightly sketched the doctrine of the Common Law as it regards the property of married women, and have adverted in general terms to the consequences of that doctrine. So harsh has that law been found in all modern nations, where it prevails; so unjust in its working under frequent contingencies; so widely at variance with that mild spirit of civilization which is gradually replacing the law of the stronger; that the mitigating aid of equity has been universally invoked, to modify the oppressive severity of its provisions.

The chief relief thus afforded, rests in a species of evasion. The wife may not own property, may not receive gifts, may not accept legacies; but others may own, accept, receive, for her. A married woman may acquire and control both real and personal property by the intervention of trustees.

Upon this principle, marriage settlements, so common in Great Britain, are executed. The extent of relief there obtained by this evasion of the common law, may be judged from the opinion expressed by an English lawyer of great experience, and referred to by Chancellor Kent, that so extensive have become the trusts growing out of marriage settlements, in England, that half the property of the Kingdom is now vested in nominal owners.

Among us, in this Western country, this cumbersome and expensive, and somewhat dangerous machinery of trusteeship, is, comparatively, but seldom resorted to. It is too elaborate for our common use. And why should it be required at all? If it be right and proper, that married women should own and acquire and control property, why this tortuous and doubtful manner of permitting it?

The change embodied in the sections now under discussion is radical, but it is gradual also. It affects marriages hereafter contracted, and applies to existing marriages only in case the parties record their desire to come under its provisions. Thus, it will not too rudely jar on present usages and existing interests. If a woman, about to be married, desire to convey her property to her future husband, so as to subject herself to the same disabilities under which she now labors, she will have the opportunity to do so. If she do not avail herself of that opportunity, it may be taken as presumptive evidence, that she prefers to the present law the amendatory provision which I am advocating.

It may be said, that by parity of reasoning, if a woman about to marry now, neglect to protect her property by marriage settlement, that should be regarded as presumptive evidence that she prefers and elects to be governed by the existing law. But this would be a false inference. At no moment of life, under ordinary circumstances, is the confidence of a woman brought so actively into play, and all prudential considerations so lulled to sleep, as when she gives her hand to the man of her choice. We take improper advantage of this trustful state of mind, if we so frame the law that we compel the bride, as the only means of obtaining reasonable security in the future, to show, or seem to show, suspicion of him to whom she is entrusting the happiness of her life. It is quite enough that the question, legally suggesting itself, should be: "what will you give him?" And, even in that case, she is likely to grant too much. But to give to that question the odious form, "what will you withhold from him?" and expect her, in reply, shutting her ears and her heart against the all-confiding impulses of youth and love, to follow out, with cold deliberation, the severe dictates of an experience which we owe to years of wrong and suffering alone—this is to evince either ignorance of human nature or disregard of human welfare.

The lawgiver is, or should be, dispassionate and experienced; the young betrothed is usually neither the one nor the other. The law, therefore, interposing its protecting shield, should, by general enactment, create those checks and guards which she is not likely, even though she has the right while yet single, to provide in her individual case for herself. If she see fit to dispense with the guards and checks thus provided, so be it; but let us not expect her to create them. The forethought of parent or guardian may, indeed, and often does, supply the deficiency; but in this there is no certainty, nor can the chance of such interposition at all justify neglect on the part of that General Guardian, the Law.

But in securing to married women rights of property, we must bear in mind that those rights bring with them duties. The laws of

New York, Wisconsin, and other States, seem to have been framed in forgetfulness of this; but, the Civil Law admits and provides for it; requiring that the wife shall bear a portion of the marriage expenses. This proportion varies according to the necessity of the case and the means of the wife.

To meet this, the Constitutional provision should declare that the property of married women shall be declared to them, under equitable conditions. It is for the law afterwards to determine, in detail, what these conditions shall be.

Again: as a legislative provision we would do well to adopt another principle from the civil law. Under that system the wife has not, strictly speaking, equal rights with the husband; for to every partnership there must be a manager, and the husband, from the character of his avocations as compared with the wife and mother, naturally becomes such. If the wife leave her property in her husband's hands, failing personally to administer it, it is considered to be under his management.

It is only in case of formal opposition on her part, that he becomes responsible for its rents and profits. In ordinary cases under any law, the wife will usually leave the property in her husband's hands. In a general way she will resume her control over it only if he evince a reckless or spendthrift disposition; as it is just and prudent she should do.

One other provision we should copy into our Statute from the civil law, namely: that in the case of debts contracted by the wife before marriage, the husband shall not be holden, but the wife and her estate shall be liable.

It is unnecessary that I should enter into further detail. General provisions are all we can properly adopt in an organic law.

And now, Mr. President, in conclusion, let me advert to one objection, always a strong one, always carrying with it much weight when there is question of novel reform.

It is commonly dangerous, we are told, to enter a new and untrodden path. So it may be. Yet if we of pioneer America—if we, the tenants of these Western wilds, where roamed and ruled but half a century ago, the Indian and the beast of the forest—if we had never entered any but the beaten track, where, I pray you, would have been the power, where the prosperity of the West, to-day? In the distant future; yet unwon, untried for!

True it is, that we should not enter an unfrequented path without seeking to learn, from experienced guides, what is its character, and and whither it leads. Nor, in the case before us, have I done so. Thirteen years ago, when this matter first especially engaged my attention, I addressed private letters on the subject to two of the most distinguished names among the then living jurists of America—now numbered with the dead!—to Chancellor Kent and to Judge Story. From both I received replies: and from these, with the permission of the Convention, I will here read a few extracts.

Chancellor Kent begins by admitting that he is "not insensible to the many harsh features contained in the English Common Law code relative to the relation of husband and wife." He is not in favor of an entire substitution of the civil law for the common law; nor is any such proposition embodied in these sections. He says: "I am not for changing the Common Law system as a whole and introducing as a substitute, that of Louisiana. I prefer our own, but with an inclination to have parts of it ameliorated."

In Judge Story's letter to me he expresses, in more decided terms than did the author of the celebrated commentaries, his opinion in regard to the propriety of radical reform in this matter. His words are:

"The present state of the Common Law, with regard to the rights of property between husband and wife, is inequitable, unjust, and ill-adapted to the purposes of a refined and civilized society." (Can language be stronger than that?). "There are," he continues, "in the Civil Law system, a great many admirable provisions; and I am not sure, as a whole, whether it does not work better than that of the Common Law on this subject."

Farther on he adds, that, in his opinion, our law, as it stands, "requires great alterations and amendments for the protection of the property of married women, coming to them after, as well as before, marriage."

I consider myself fortunate in thus being able to produce, in support of the position I am now defending, the opinion of one of the most eminent jurists our country has ever produced.

Can we find more experienced guides than these, from whom to obtain information touching the new road we are proposing to enter? But this is not all. The road has been travelled by thousands, by millions before us. In Europe, the nations of France, Germany, Spain, Holland, and others, give independent rights of property to the wife. And let me cite to you what Kent says of the result. "Whatever doubts,"—this is his language—"whatever doubts may arise in the mind of a person educated in the school of the common law, as to the wisdom or policy of the powers, which, by the Civil Law, and the law of those modern nations that have adopted it, are conceded to the wife in matters of property; yet it cannot be denied, that the pre-eminence of the Christian nations of Europe and of their descendants and colonists in every other quarter of the globe, is most strikingly displayed in the equality and dignity which their institutions confer upon the female character."

But we need not cross the Atlantic to find examples of the adoption of this principle; no, nor yet need we descend the Mississippi, to New Orleans. Nearly half the States of the Union have already led the way before us. Women are already recognised as independent owners of property in New York, in Pennsylvania, in Maine, in Ohio, in Wisconsin, in Arkansas, in Florida, in Alabama, in Texas, and in other States; among them the youngest sister of the Confederacy, but recently welcomed into the Union. I read from the Constitution of California:

"All property, both real and personal, of the wife, owned or claimed before marriage, and that acquired afterwards by gift, devise or descent, shall be her separate property; and laws shall be passed more clearly defining the rights of the wife, in relation, as well to her separate property as to that held in common with her husband. Laws shall also be passed providing for the registration of the wife's separate property."

This section goes farther than ours. It recognises that feature of the Civil Law, which is usually called the "community of gains," or the "conjugal partnership," according to which the produce of the joint industry of husband and wife, during marriage, becomes and remains their joint property. Our sections, as reported, leave the introduction, or the omission, of that principle optional with the Legislature.

The path before us, then, is no wild, untrodden one, surrounded with hazardous adventure; beset with untried dangers. That same path has been trodden already, safely, happily, by other States, by other nations; and which of them all has ever yet sought to retrace its steps!

Do you scruple, do you still doubt, whether our people at home will second and approve so righteous a change? Think better of your State, more worthily of your fellow-citizens! Has no generous chord been touched within yourselves, even by the appeal, feeble though it be, compared to the justice of the cause, which I have this day made to you? And think you no responsive chord beats in the hearts of those who sent us here? I tell you, there does! Again and again, to crowds assembled in the country school house, or under the shelter of the forest tree, I have myself appealed to it—and never appealed in vain! I predict, that if you now record, on the pages of our new Constitution, the declaration, that never again shall the right to acquire, to possess, to protect property, be denied by our laws, to one half the human race,—I predict that the declaration, when it goes forth from this Hall, will be met with one cordial, heart-felt "well done!" from every nook and corner of the land.

Mr. HADDON. Mr. PRESIDENT: I have a few words to offer upon the subject before the Convention—and I shall detain the Convention but a very few minutes. Although I am a member of the committee that reported this section, and was present when the committee passed upon it, I am opposed to the adoption of it into the Constitution. I did not urge my objections to it before the committee, because I knew it to be a favorite measure with the Chairman (Mr. Owen) and I was willing it should be reported, so that that gentlemen could have an opportunity of giving his views on the subject at length. I have now heard the gentleman's views, and although I have great confidence in his judgment, I am still of the opinion that to adopt this proposition will not have a tendency to ameliorate the condition of married women.

And I feel sure that mature reflection will induce a majority of the delegates of this Convention to arrive at the same conclusion. I regard this proposition as more important than any that has been acted upon by this Convention. If we establish the principle that the pecuniary interest of women is separate and distinct from that of men, we should establish also their right of representation, and their right of suffrage: it would be but just, that their separate interest should be represented. Let us look but for a moment at this position. When it concerns the election of a Legislative Assembly, we give the right of voting only to those who have the confidence of the people for exercising it.

The choice made by persons who have not the confidence of the people would weaken their confidence in the Legislative Assembly.

The necessary degree of political knowledge cannot be presumed to exist in women, who, by their domestic duties, are led away from the consideration of the affairs of the State and the affairs of the nation.

The natural employment of women in all ages and in all stages of civilization, is of that peaceful, affectionate, and domestic character—that necessarily limits their knowledge in matters of civil government. I, therefore, cannot see the propriety of establishing for women a distinct and separate interest—the consideration of which would of necessity withdraw their attention from that sacred duty which nature has, in its wisdom, assigned to their peculiar cares.

I think the law which unites in one common bond the pecuniary interests of husband and wife should remain. The sacred ordinance of marriage and the relations arising out of it ought not to be touched or disturbed.

The common law does seem to me to afford sufficient protection. It establishes the most entire and absolute union and identity of interests and of persons in the matrimonial state. The property of the husband, the property of the wife, being one united and identical interest. No rich husband and a poor wife; no rich wife and a poor husband; the wealth of the husband is the wealth of the wife, and his prosperity her pride, her great source of power and distinction.

Woman as wife, or as mother, has known no change of the law which fixes her domestic character and guides her devoted love. The firm union of interests in married life as established by the common law, occasionally in special cases, produces deplorable evils, but its general influence upon the manners of society is most benign; and is conspicuous in the existing condition of our people.

I do not wish to see the law changed. If it is changed, and man and wife converted as it were into mere partners, I believe a most essential injury would result to the endearing relations of married life.

A wife with a separate estate secured to her independent disposal and management, might rival her husband in trade, or become the partner of his rival—adverse and opposing interests would be likely to grow out of such relations, controversies would arise, husbands and wives would become armed against each other, to the utter destruction of the sentiments which they should entertain towards each other, and to the utter destruction of true felicity in married life.

I might illustrate by exhibiting the thousand shapes and forms in which these conflicting interests would operate mischievously. And though each might seem trifling in itself, yet in the aggregate they would form a mighty force in their oft recurring presentment, they would form a fatal means of irritation and dissension.

It may be said that the utterance of this thought is an unmerited reproach upon Indiana wives and husbands—nothing, Mr. President, is further from my purpose. It is the perpetuation and purity of those relations as now actually existing, that commands my admiration. My object is to defend those relations against the imputation that they would be improved or reformed. Married life as it is, I wish to protect.

The gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) I have no doubt is of a high sensibility and has had his observation directed to special cases such as he has just mentioned to us, where great injustice has been done by unfeeling and profligate husbands, and it has excited his sympathies in behalf of such unfortunate wives, and induced him to seek a remedy for them. I admire the goodness of his heart, and the kind feeling he has shown in behalf of such unfortunate wives, but I feel sure the adoption of the proposition which is before the Convention will not afford the remedy he seeks. To adopt it would be to throw a whole population morally and politically into confusion. It would be to create a tempest in order to get a drop of water in the hollow of the hand. To establish this principle in the Constitution would be the radical change of family and of property. In order to repair and ameliorate the condition of married women, is it necessary to begin by exploding a volcano under the foundation of the family union?

Self-interest, Mr. President, rules the human family to a very great extent. The affections are apt to follow that interest, and we should keep united the pecuniary interests of husband and wife, and not separate them. We should not create the slightest cause for a separation of affections between them. We should, if possible, strengthen those bonds, rather than weaken them. Union and identity of interest with husband and wife is the strong bond of union in the family and in the community. It is the heart, the seat of vital warmth in the family, and in the community—there is no need to urge on its beatings, but only to restrain and control them.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to strike out the second and third sections and insert the following:

SEC. —. Every married woman shall have the right to the exclusive use and benefit of all real estate and every interest therein of which she may be seized or possessed at the time of the marriage, or of which she may become seized or possessed at any time during the coverture by devise or descent, or in any manner other than by gift from her husband in fraud of third persons; and laws shall be passed, effectually securing to the wife, on equitable principles, the use, issues, and profits of her separate property, and a just interest in her husband's estate, in the event of the dissolution of the marriage contract by the death of the husband or otherwise."

Mr. RARIDEN. I desire to discuss the main question involved in the proposition of the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen). I wish to give my opinion, also, upon that very delicate and important question. But I would like to turn the matter in my mind, at least, until two o'clock. For this, I move that the Convention take the usual recess.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WOLFE. Is it in order now further to amend?

The PRESIDENT. It is in order to amend the proposition of the gentleman from Dearborn.

Mr. WOLFE. If I were to move a substitute for that proposition, would it be in order?

The PRESIDENT. It would be in order if the gentleman were to accept the substitute, but not otherwise.

Mr. WOLFE then proceeded to read his substitute for information. It is as follows:

"Women shall all have the right to hold and enjoy, for their own benefit and use, in common with their husbands and families, any real or personal estate that may descend to them by devise or otherwise, which shall not be subject to execution for the debts of their husbands."

The PRESIDENT. Does the gentleman from Dearborn accept the substitute?

Mr. HOLMAN intimated that he could not accept it.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe said: Mr. President, I have but a few words to say upon this subject; and I think, perhaps, I can get through before the time for the recess. I know, Mr. President, that it is an unfavorable time to speak upon this question—following, as I do, the eloquent gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) and in opposition to him. I know very well that I labor under both these disadvantages; but, to avoid wasting the time of the Convention, I will proceed to offer the few thoughts which I desire to express on this subject.

Now, sir, I object to the gentleman's proposition, because it is in contravention of one of the great fundamental principles of the Christian religion—that great elementary truth, religious and social, which was announced to the world by the Divine Author of our holy religion himself: The husband and wife are one; they twain are one—one flesh! This fundamental idea of Christianity the proposition before us assails, and seeks, by a constitutional enactment, to eradicate from our legislation. This principle has been recognized—has influenced more or less all Christian nations, and has contributed to elevate and improve the domestic and social condition of man wherever it has prevailed.

Now, sir, all the social relations of our community are based on this principle of our religion. The common law only embodied this divine law, and invested it with the ordinary sanctions of a human law. It sought to execute and carry out that principle which our Savior declared to be the true relation which existed between husband and wife: that they are one. And likewise in almost all Christian nations the marriage contract is invested with a degree of religious sanctity. This same principle was recognized—was a holy, an elementary law among our German ancestors, long anterior to the origin of the common law, and before the introduction of Christianity among them—before the advent of Christianity itself. So we are informed by Tacitus. He tells us that among the ancient Germans, in their domestic relations, their manners were most pure, chaste, and virtuous. In the language of their customs or unwritten laws (I suppose they had no literature): The husband and wife were one. One body, one mind, one life. And it was a law among some of the tribes, that a woman, once married, was married forever. One husband, one life! Beyond this, she never thought to look. That holy relation could be formed but once; it could not be severed, even by death itself.

Such was the high and pure law of our German ancestors. And it is remarkable how some of the elementary characteristics of the races of men descend through long periods of time to their remotest posterity. Barbarous and uncivilized as they were, still the marriage relation was recognized as something sacred; and we are told they regarded women as having something divine in their nature. History informs us with what unshrinking courage—with what heroic fortitude—they encountered the perils and disasters of war. They suffered themselves to be hewed to pieces, refusing to retreat before an enemy.

Inspired with a reverence for females as objects almost divine—fighting for such wives, mothers, or sisters—no German hesitated to defend them at the expense of his own life. No German fled from the enemies of his country, or turned away from the battle in its defense. Filled with such high and ennobling sentiments, how could he be otherwise than generous and brave. Now, sir, this primeval and elementary trait of the Saxons, the proposition of the gentleman from Posey seeks to remove (so far as we can accomplish it) from the jurisprudence of the Anglo-Saxon race. A principle descended to us from our remotest ancestry, coincident, also, with the law of the great Christian Lawgiver—a principle which I believe is hereditary in the Anglo-Saxons, and to this day manifests itself in their domestic manners and their governmental institutions—a recognition of the sacred nature of the marriage tie—an acknowledgment that there is something divine in woman. Wherever the Christian religion prevails, there is woman most honored and respected; there civilization is most advanced, and the condition of man most elevated. Arc we admonished by this to forsake our religion and laws?

But what does the gentleman from Posey seek to do? He seeks to make husband and wife twain. He seeks, by law, to establish a division of interests between them. He would repeal the common law and the sanction of the Christian institution, in this respect. He would allow the husband to sue the wife, and the wife to sue the husband; and so make division in families; for nowhere could the separate interests of the wife be maintained, unless she were capable, in law, of suing the husband. She must be vested with this authority; and will the gentleman say, that is to encourage and protect the purity of the married relation?

How is it at present? The husband and wife are the mutual hostages of each other. The welfare of one is the welfare of the other, but by the ordinance of nature, the position and station, the wealth, if not inherited, is derived chiefly from the husband. The welfare of the wife, therefore, depends on his good conduct. Her character depends on his, and she has all the motives which can arise from self-love and love for her family, to interest herself in the affections of her husband, and employ all the influence in her power to restrain him from wrong doing; because his dishonor is her dishonor, and his adversity is her adversity. Such is the result of this identity of interest which the common law contemplates. But, destroy this identity—give to the wife a separate interest in law, and all those high motives to restrain the husband from wrong doing, will be, in a great degree, removed. Having no longer an identity of interest with her husband, the motive to use all her influence in restraining him from doing evil, will be very much weakened.

But, whether or not we make any change in the law upon this subject, the great mass of men and women are placed precisely in the condition which the common law recognizes, by the very nature of things. The great mass of fathers and mothers are compelled to unite their utmost exertions to feed, and educate, and protect their families; and these have no occasion for a separate interest. Circumstances force them to unite their interests. Such is the condition of all the middle and poorer classes of society. As it is, then, this change in the law would be necessary or convenient only for the rich. I believe that, in England, this law does virtually obtain amongst the nobility, but it is not necessary amongst the common people; because it is requisite that the interest of both branches of the family should be made common stock for the support and education of the children.

But in England, the nobility forms an essential feature of government. The nobles must maintain the integrity of their great estates, by some hereditary restraints on property. A nobility without some degree of wealth to maintain the expense incident to the position they occupy in their government, would soon fall into contempt. If what we read and hear in relation to marriages in the higher classes of English society, be true, we ought not to be anxious to transplant their customs into our republican families. Separations of husband and wife are represented as far more frequent than in our country. I mean actual, not legal separations.

Marriages thus founded on political considerations, or with reference to estates, and the law recognizing separate interests, separations, it might be foreseen, would be frequent, and we are told, that, amongst the English nobility, the husband and wife have separate houses, separate revenue, and, in fact, they are separate people.

Mr. President, I will now proceed to answer some of the arguments of the gentleman from Posey.

He read an extract of a letter from Chancellor Kent, in which that great jurist points to the superior dignity to which females have attained in those nations in which the Christian religion prevails. This is because of the recognition of that principle in the Christian religion, which the gentleman's proposition would subvert. For, even in those Christian nations where the civil law exists, the religious principle has, to a great extent, counteracted the bad influence of the law on the manners of the people.

He says that, under our present law, the wife has the right to receive the rents and profits of real estate; and asks whether any evil has resulted from it. I answer, none: because, when the wife receives her rent money, that moment it legally becomes the property of her husband; consequently the law is not much changed by this statute. It may be true that the creditor of the husband might not be able to reach the rental till after it comes into the possession of the husband, but the wife cannot sue the husband for such rent; she is not legally authorized so to do.

The gentleman asks whether our law of inheritance is wrong? I answer, it is not: it is not in contravention of the Christian law. The Christian commandment is, "A man shall forsake his father and his mother, and cleave unto his wife." I have no objection to such a change in the law of inheritance, as that the property of the husband shall descend to the wife, instead of other relatives. But it is not the gentleman's purpose to correct the law in this respect; but his object is, that the husband shall not have community of property with the wife.

But, sir, the gentleman says that the drunken husband will come home, and break open the wife's trunk and take away her hard earnings, and the law does not authorize the wife to prosecute the husband for larceny. This, also, is one of the gentleman's arguments. Now let me ask you, Mr. President, taking this one which the gentleman has supposed, if the wife of a drunken husband should go into court and prosecute him for larceny, do you think that they could afterwards live together as man and wife? I ask again, would it not be better for such a wife to seek a divorce then to live with such a husband after that, for, if she were a woman of true feeling, would she not disdain to live with a man after charging him with larceny, or after he was condemned and branded as a felon? Would she not disdain to become the associate of such a man.

The gentleman says woman is what she is, not in virtue of the statute law, but in spite of it. But now, sir, I say woman is what she is by a law of nature, and no statute law can make her any thing but woman. You may devise as many statute and constitutional laws as you choose, and woman is still by the law of nature, woman. She has not the physical strength, nor those strong and rough qualities which a man has, and I think it will not be assuming too much for me to say, that the duties of my profession have led me to know something of the character of woman, and that they would not surrender those qualities which enable them to exercise the authority which they do exercise over the minds of men, for all the harsh and rough means of influence which men are wont to employ. She would not exchange her power for money; nor could money invest her with her peculiar power and capacity to govern and control the sterner sex. Besides, you could not give to her the power which a man has, and which he exercises in the affairs of State and of trade, for if you could, she would then cease to be woman.

The gentleman says, again, that he wishes we would administer more justice and less flattery to the gentler sex. He would not have us flatter woman with reference to those qualities of beauty and tenderness by which she exercises dominion over us; but he would have us do justice by enabling her to enter in the political arena as a competitor for the honors of State, or engage in the scramble of trade, in pursuit of wealth. But, sir, I will venture to say that there is not a true woman in the State of Indiana, who would surrender the dominion which she now exercises for any dominion, authority, or independence, which money could impart to her. I will go further and say, that there is nothing that would induce her to take money at such a sacrifice.

The gentleman says, also, that if we give this right to woman, we must attach to it corresponding duties and responsibilities. That, sir, is very true; and the gentleman says, further, if the wife refuses to contribute her share in the support of the household, the law must authorize the husband to sue the wife. Now we should be truly a gallant tribe of Anglo-Saxons, Mr. President, to set about authorizing the husband to sue the wife, in order to compel her to help to support the children. Such a state of political and moral degradation of our race, I do most devoutly hope we shall never descend to. I hope we shall never descend so low in the scale of humanity as to allow either a husband to sue his wife, or a wife to sue her husband in order to compel each other to contribute their proportionate amount of means toward the support of their common children.

The gentleman says the same objection applies to this section which is always brought against every novelty; that because the thing is new we shrink and turn away from it, hold up our hands against it and will not look at it. And by this argument, I take it, he would have us refrain from opposing or scrutinizing the subject very closely, and looking into the true nature of it, because he brings it forward as a reformation—an important principle of jurisprudence which he desires to institute and apply, in this progressive age, to the advancement of the cause of humanity. But now I say this proposition is not a new idea, and that gentleman himself has told you that it was one of the institutes of the civil law, and that in most of the nations of continental Europe, in France, Spain, Germany, Italy, and in every other nation where the civil law obtains a separation of between the interests of husband and wife existed. But I would ask, in all seriousness, if there is anything superior in the condition of the females of those countries which ought to induce the wish the gentleman proposes here? Is there anything in the condition of the females there, which, upon a full understanding of the case, would induce the females of our country to ask for a change of circumstances?

But, I have said that this is not a new proposition. I will say now, that the idea is by no means confined to modern times. This same law existed long ago in the city of Rome, the place where the civil law originated, as will appear from the following slip of history:

In the year of Rome 579, and 173 years before the Christian era, there existed a Roman statute to the effect that females might take inheritances to an indefinite amount. And it was proposed to repeal or modify that law, as I will read:

"It was proposed to prohibit women from taking inheritances exceeding about forty thousand dollars. It was thought that, to the weaker sex, wealth might hold out dangerous temptations to luxurious indulgence, and that, fond, by nature, of dissipation, dress, and show, they might be induced to depart from the sanctity of manner and purity of conduct, which, of old, were deemed the brightest ornaments of the female character.

"The debate was violent. Cato put an end to it by advocating this law, which was carried."

This Cato, was Cato the Censor, crowned, I may say, with this appellation by the common people of Rome, who, overlooking his great military achievements and other great actions, gave him, by way of pre-eminence, the title of Censor, which office he had held, and during which he labored to restore the simple and virtuous customs of the earlier ages of the republic, and resisted to the utmost of his power the insidious advances of luxury and extravagance. He opposed with all his might those vices which, veiled under specious names of refinements and improvements of society, were silently sapping the institutions of the Roman people.

"Cato (it is said) declaimed with great vehemence against the extravagance and ostentation of the richer matrons, who, he said, retain to themselves large sums of money, which they do not entrust to the power of their husbands, but only lend to them; and when, upon any quarrel arising between them, they send their own slaves, who importunately demand repayment, and treat their husbands as if they were entire strangers happening to be their debtors."

Now, sir, this law existed and was proposed to be repealed 173 years before the Christian era. I have read this extract, Mr. President, merely to show the Convention that this is not a new proposition; but, that it existed in these early times amongst the ancient Romans, and the corruption of manners thus arising, even at that early period, foreshadowed the approaching decline and downfall of that people. They themselves saw, and endeavored to avert the evil influences which hurried them along toward destruction, by poisoning society at its very source. But they sought in vain: the strong current of luxuriousness and corruption swept away the power and the virtue of the city, and overthrew the empire itself.

Mr. President, this same Cato, on another occasion, made a speech against the matrons; and, with all that was good and great about him, we are compelled to admit that he was a harsh, austere, rough old man, but renowned for his wisdom, courage, and patriotism. And lest his remarks already quoted should weigh anything too much with the Convention, I will ask the Secretary to read the following extract from his speech upon the other question, in which the ladies were concerned:

The Oppian was passed during the Punic war, and in the year 195 before the Christian era, it was proposed to repeal it. The law was to this effect: "No woman should possess more than half an ounce of gold, or wear a garment of various colors, or ride in a carriage drawn by horses, in a city or in any town, or any place nearer thereto than one mile, except on occasions of some public religious solemnity."

Cato opposed the repeal of this law most strenuously. He said:

"If, Romans, every individual among us had made it a rule to maintain the prerogative and authority of a husband, we should have less trouble with the whole sex. He said, our ancestors thought it not proper that women should perform any, even private business, without a director; but that they should even be under the charge of parents, brothers, or husbands. We, it seems, now suffer them to interfere in the management of State affairs, and to thrust themselves into the Forum, into General Assemblies, and into Assemblies of Election. For, what are they doing at this moment in your streets? What but arguing, some in support of the motion of the Tribunes; others contending for the repeal of the law. Will you give the reins to their intractable nature, and then expect that themselves should set bounds to their licentiousness, and without your interference? This is the smallest of the injunctions laid on them by usages or the laws, all which women hear with impatience. They long for entire liberty; nay, to speak the truth, not for liberty, but for unbounded freedom in every particular. Recollect all the institutions respecting the sex, by which our forefathers restrained their profligacy, and subjected them to their husbands. And yet, even with the help of all these restrictions, they can scarcely be kept within bounds.

"If, then, you suffer them to throw off these one by one, to tear them all asunder, and at last to be set on an equal footing with yourselves, can you imagine that they will be any longer tolerable? Suffer them once to arrive at an equality with you, and from that moment they will become your superiors." [A general shout of merriment.]

Mr. C., resuming the floor, said: Mr. President, I have only to add, that these extracts will be found in Livy, in the State Library. I have read the former extract to show that this subject is by no means new; and I have caused the latter to be read in order that, by this exhibition of the austerity of the old Roman, his opinion upon this subject might not weigh too much with the Convention.

Mr. President, having now filled up the time which I proposed to myself, I will move that the Convention take a recess till two o'clock.

This motion prevailing, the Convention took a recess until two o'clock, P. M.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The PRESIDENT remarked that the pending question was upon the adoption of the second section of the report number four, of the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of this State.

Mr. RARIDEN. Will the Secretary read the proposition?

The section is as follows:

"Women hereafter married in this State, shall have the right to acquire and possess property to their sole use and disposal; and laws shall be passed securing to them, under equitable conditions, all property, real and personal, whether owned by them before marriage or acquired afterwards by purchase, gift, devise, descent, or in any other way, and also providing for the registration of the wife's separate property."

Mr. RARIDEN. Mr. PRESIDENT, I am glad of this early opportunity to express the views which I hold upon this subject, and feel obliged to gentlemen of the Convention for affording me the present occasion to discuss, in a brief manner, the question before us. I am glad of the opportunity, because urgent circumstances make it necessary for me to leave on the morning of to-morrow, and the debate upon this proposition might be concluded before my return.

It is not my purpose, Mr. President, to enter into a formal review of the able speech of the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) delivered this morning upon the proposition which has been read and which was introduced by himself, nor even to criticise it in any way, for so far as the sentiments expressed by him, so far as his betrayal of the wrongs which have been, and, to some extent, still are, inflicted upon woman, are concerned, I cordially agree with him. The whole speech, its sentiments and manner, commended the speaker to my regard and esteem. But his argument did not have the effect to convince my understanding of the propriety of adopting the Constitutional provision he proposes. I wish to say, however, that so far as the law of descent and the statute of distribution is concerned, I agree with him most heartily. The law of descent is not what it ought to be, and that it may be seen that I have long held this opinion, and earnestly urged a change of the law, I may be allowed to mention, that at an early period of my life, when I was the youngest member of the Legislature of this State, I made an effort so to change the law as to give to the widow the fee simple in her dower, and a greater proportion of the personal estate than she is allowed by the law. This, sir, was twenty-six years ago. For this early effort in the Legislature to change the law of distribution, I was ridiculed all over the State; but neither that ridicule, nor my failure to get the law changed, had the effect to convince me that I was wrong, though for the time being I abandoned the further prosecution of the matter as hopeless at that time. But I rejoice to believe that the time has now come when justice will be done in this matter, and the statute of descents will be made to recognize the rights of widows as embracing the rights of the husband at his death, at least in the homestead and personal property.

Whatever objection there may be to these statutes, however unjust I may be willing to admit them towards the widow, it is no argument that we should introduce into the fundamental law of the State the provision proposed by the gentleman from Posey, which has been read. And for this reason: I look upon the provision as one, the effect of which will be a direct attack upon the sacredness of the marriage contract. I believe it would rob the holy relation of husband and wife of that which alike constitutes its charm and its strength, that the twain are one. On the other hand, to give the widow her rights, to change the statute of descents, would not be an attack upon the peculiar sacredness of the conjugal relation; it would be a conventional arrangement of society in regard to a succession between husband and wife. That I may be clearly understood, I will explain my position. If you make it a part of the fundamental law that there may be a separate property between the husband and the wife, that the wife may acquire property which shall rest solely in her and beyond the control of her husband, the effect will be to take away from the marriage relation that identity and unity of interest which does and should characterize it. You destroy that which is sacred in it, and introduce a harsh feature that is sure, sooner or later, to be a cause of discord and alienation.

In my opinion, the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) in the discussion of this question, has entirely mistaken the basis and source of the power and influence of the female over the male. He has mistaken the source as well as the administration of that power. He assumes the ground that equality of position and equality of property would increase the influence of the female, and place her in the situation which he so much desires, of perfect social equality with the male. This, sir, is the radical and fundamental error in his argument. I know that it is his sympathy for woman and his kind feelings that have led him into this error. I frankly say, that I believe that his action springs from the purest and the best feelings, and that he is candid in maintaining his theory, and conscientiously believes that it would result in good to the human race.

His error is in his misconception of the true source of the influence of the female over the male.

There was a very forcible and pertinent remark made this morning, by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Clark,) apparently addressed to the ladies in the gallery, or perhaps to the females generally. He asked, "Would you part with the power you now exercise, no matter what its source, for the power with which it is proposed to invest you, by giving you equal rights of property with the husband? Would you exchange the possession of the fascinations by which you conquer and hold under your influence, for the rod given you over your husband in the proposition now before the Convention?" I believe that if the females of the country could be heard in response to these questions, they would answer, "We would not."

It is a mistake to suppose that the addition of the right of separate property would add to the influence of the female over the male, or that the happiness of both or either would be enhanced. I firmly believe that it would diminish, if it did not totally annihilate, the influence she now possesses and uses for her happiness. I tell you that the possession of property or of power of any kind is not the secret, the source of woman's influence over man—it is not even enhanced by the possession of these; what the source is I cannot attempt to describe—it is what Burke beautifully designates as "the unbought grace of life." But it is not to be explained or delineated. You may see its manifestations, you may feel conscious of its power everywhere. It is ten times more potent than princely revenues or the rod of legal authority. Its effects are as different from that of the influence which the possession of separate property gives, as the spirit with which a man labors when he is munificently rewarded for his efforts, and the spirit with which the convict sentenced to hard labor in the most ignominious condition, and without compensation, goes to his work. I repeat, sir, that the gentleman is mistaken in the source of the power which we see constantly exerted by females. It is the power of persuasion through blandness of manner, through a devotional and self sacrificing spirit, ready to offer up all her hopes upon the shrine of a husband's wishes, that you see characterizing the sex in all conditions of life.

The gentleman asks us if it can be possible that any gentleman considers it necessary to domestic happiness that the woman should be subject to the man, or more nearly to use his own words, "that a state of dependence on her part promotes connubial bliss?" Now, sir, I am willing to take direct issue with the gentleman on this point, and state it as my deliberate judgment that it is, in a great measure, that very dependence which promotes and cultivates in the female those endearing qualities which attaches her so strongly to the male, and gives her such unbounded influence over his sterner nature. It is the knowledge of that dependence on them for support and protection that enhances the desire of the man to yield it. Consider for a moment, the feelings and thoughts of the woman when she decides to separate herself from the protection and endearments of her home, to leave those that thus far in life have cherished and protected her, and who have been devoted purely and self-sacrificingly to her good—father, mother, brothers, and sisters—and going out from the paternal roof, throw herself trustingly upon the honor, the sense of justice, and the generosity of one who is a comparative stranger. Are not considerations like these the most powerful appeal that can be made in her behalf? Is not that implicit trust, that wonderful confidence, a secret of her power an influence over the youth to whom she trusts her present and her future? What is there in life that is humble, and weak, or friendless and suffering that does not enlist female sympathy and effort, and who can see them as they unconsciously develop these attributes of their being, without that kind of devotional veneration for the female character which characterizes all that are worthy to wear the name of man? This approximates to my idea of the parent or source of female influence, its philosophy I will not attempt to explain; it is the fact of its existence only that I know.

I am not discussing the abstract question of right and wrong between husband and wife, but am endeavoring to call attention to those mysterious influences that control human conduct, and especially in the endeared relation of husband and wife. Woman was given to man to make up for his deficiencies, to constitute the complement of his existence, to teach him to love everything around him, and to give to everything around him a comely aspect that he may love it. Has she not always fulfilled this mission, has she not modified the natural ferocity and roughness of man, has she not taught him to love herself, her children, his neighbor, and then the acquisition of property, not for himself, but that he may lay it at her and her children's feet. This again is another source of her power. Well, sir, we have got along for eighteen hundred years, for I will not go further back, with the endurance of conjugal felicity, based upon the power and exercise of these influences and shall we change now! If I was addressing a female audience I would put this question to them "would you exchange the power of this influence, so long exercised, so long enjoyed, demonstrated to be so potent, for the doubtful power of the control of the finances of your husbands?"

It is this very physical weakness and social dependence that strengthens the cords of affection, and enhances the delight in bestowing and receiving protection. See, and especially in this Western country, an unprotected female, who, in the presence of gentlemen, is treated in any wise ill, or even neglected, and you will see how instantly and instinctively every man will feel called upon to resent the injury, and offer protection. She need not be a relative, or even an acquaintance; it is enough for a man to know that she is a woman and stands in need of protection and assistance.

There is another consideration relative to the influence and power wielded by females. The absorbing passion of man for their applause, their plaudits, and approving smiles, are more with us than stars and garters; they call forth all man's energies, and these frowns and rebukes blast every hope and energy. We all know that you had as well take the musket and bayonet from soldiers as to take from them the incitement of female applause—take that away and they are dispirited and powerless; you will then hear no more of mighty deeds of daring and high achievement; and, without the applause of the ladies of the Union, you had never realized the pride and elation of heart, as an American, which you felt when the booming cannon announced an American victory achieved by our soldiers against double and treble their number of Mexicans. The approving smiles of beauty, of woman—for in that term is comprehended all of beauty and goodness, and superior excellence in creation—is our meed in the great tournament of life [applause]. Is this all that gives them power? Wherever there is suffering, wherever there is human woe, there is woman, in her natural and favorite sphere, to alleviate suffering, lift up the down-trodden, and to mingle her tears with the afflicted everywhere. Such are the sources, and the true sources, of female power, and such will they ever continue to be.

Gentlemen have instanced cases where females, by their needlework, or the products of the loom, may have earned money, of which they were deprived, by the husband, or to satisfy his debts. These cases, though I consider them as only exceptions to a general rule, are cases of hardship and mal-treatment, that are painful to contemplate, but to prove instances of brutality in men, not the inherent defects of a system.

The best institutions with which mankind were ever blessed, have been and always will be perverted by bad men. But would it be proper to meet such individual and rare cases of abuse and suffering, to adopt a proposition like the one in debate. Would it be proper to have the double luxury of love and litigation in the same household? Our fathers have, for many generations, maintained the principle of the common law in this regard, and, as I am bound to believe, for some good and weighty reasons.

But let us advert to some of the considerations urged in favor of a change as to the rights of property of married women. The idea of thereby bettering the social condition of woman-kind is one. It is thought that it will throw a stronger shield around the wife, to give her the separate and sole control of her property. Has she not now, from the very fact of her weakness and dependence, a stronger hold upon the sympathies, and a stronger claim for the protection of man, than the control of property would give her? Where is there a lady in anywise badly treated, that has not the sympathy of the surrounding community? A woman conscious of this, if she still loves her husband, has the greater power over him, and, if she can reclaim him from his debased condition, it will be an exhibition of real strength—a service inestimable to herself and her children—an act of the greatest value to society. She will acquire an influence over him, more potent than the withholding of money, over which the law might give her an exclusive control. From such exertions of influence would arise no actions at law, and there would result no scene of a family in court arrayed against itself. A public vindication of her rights is unpleasant, is unnatural, and repugnant to the feelings of women. You will always discover on their part, a desire to conceal any ill treatment they may be so unfortunate as to receive, and they will struggle to reclaim their husbands while there is a spark of manhood left in his breast. I tell you that all the property she could get the control of, would never be so effective, never worth so much as this influence.

The gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) will not go further than I will in efforts to change the statute of distribution. I believe it wrong, founded upon a wrong principle, and productive of injustice and evil. If the wife of a man having a competency dies, he has sufficient to support and rear his children, the property all remains in his hands subject to his disposal, as it should; but if the husband dies the property is divided among the children, the widow receiving one-third. This is clearly wrong. With a life of labor before her, with all the responsibility of raising, supporting, and educating a family, and with disposition and affections to sacrifice every hope of earth for her children, she should be put in the same position that the husband is, in case of the wife's death. I believe that the majority of women will support a family reputably, upon one-half of the amount that a man would require in the event of his being left a widower. My object in having the property all hers, in the event of the husband's death, would be to devote the children to her, to place them in the natural position, of dependence, to make them sue to her, not she to them.

So far, then, as the gentleman's opposition extends to the statute of distribution, I shall heartily co-operate with him. Another thought: I object to this proposition being made a provision in the fundamental law of the land, because its effect will be to make the marriage contract a conventional arrangement among friends, that arrangement to be binding so long as the parties think proper to continue it. Such marriages cannot be felicitous; it does not comport with the spirit of American gallantry. I desire the covenant to be between two young hearts, the mysterious sympathy that binds them and brings them together, proceeding from the Godhead itself. I want mutual attraction, not the desire for property on either side. I desire to see the union effected by such influences, and then to see the incipient affections fanned into a steady flame by the mutual performance of duty and of generous acts and kind offices pertaining to that close and holy relation. But if you surround them with, and fasten upon them, external circumstances, the tendency of which are to divert the mind from affection and the fulfilment of kind offices, to interest; if you make a covenant between the parties, looking as much to the amount of property secured as to the prospects of bliss, you attack and destroy all that is sacred in the conjugal relation. You then have nothing that could not be bought off as it was bought on. But where two young hearts come together, influenced by that mysterious feeling which I cannot describe, but of the strange power and fascination of which most men are aware, then you may see the basis of a union as enduring as that mysterious principle upon which it is founded. In the beautiful language of Burke, "Man yields a proud loyalty to her behests, and she a generous submission." I cannot consent to lay rude hands upon this natural marriage contract; I cannot enter its sacred sphere with a Constitutional provision to make the one twain by separating her pecuniary interests from his. Not that I am wedded to old affections, and love the thought that the twain are one. I love the ancient usages, not so much because they are old and ancient, but because I have witnessed the effects of this dependence on the part of the female. It is where love weaves the garland; and I have witnessed the effectiveness of the influence resulting from that dependence.

I cannot, with these views, support the proposition of the gentleman from Posey, because I cannot consent to make of marriage a mercenary affair. For that part of the section which abolishes the statute of distribution, I have already promised my support, not here, but in a statute or descents and distributions. But I cannot support any proposition which, in effect, will make of two young married people partners in trade, and rival partners too, it may be! For, carry out your principle, and the wife must have as broad a liberty in the use of her property as her lord. She must have the right to use it in traffic and trade, and it might, and more than likely, be to her interest to set up a rival business to that of her husband. Is it not obvious that by such means we destroy the identity of interest, the sacred relation that should exist between husband and wife?

The control of all the property in the world will not compensate for the loss of the influence that woman, in her dependent position, exercises in the spheres that properly belong to her. Man has his spheres of action and woman has hers, and they are supreme in their spheres. See how potent it is. Let a young man deport himself unbecomingly his manhood; let him offer an indignity or an insult to any of the sex, and let them decide to exclude him from their society, and see how speedily and how deeply he is degraded. There is nothing more fatal to the prospects of a young man; nothing more withering to his reputation, than thus to fall under the condemnation of female society. Could the influence arising from the control of property exercise such a potent sway?

It is in the nature of man to be generous to that which throws itself implicitly upon his generosity. He is proud to yield support and protection to woman, and derive a consolation from the fact that he is not compelled to by a law. I feel ennobled by the reflection that I have done it voluntarily, or, at least, only through the promptings of affection.

Gentlemen tell us that the ladies have been too much flattered and cajoled, to their tastes. I say they are not. In my opinion no flattery ever yet came up to the top of their deserts. [Applause.] And suppose they had been, is it not a graceful payment for their thousand kind offices? and do they not always receive it more graciously than any other kind of coin? Of course I am not alluding to that fulsome adulation coming from an unintelligent mind or a dishonest heart, to which no sensible woman will listen. I speak of eulogies prompted by the appreciation of her purity and grace, coming warm from the heart as a tribute to beauty and worth. The mental features and the moral attributes of woman were never yet overpraised or overestimated, nor are they half so greedy of praise or as liable to be misled by it as the male. I believe that if you were to offer to the women of Indiana the exercise of these legal rights, a majority of them would not accept it. To those who do, it will prove the most fatal present ever lodged in their hands; the fair fruit wherewith their sex will be, not for the first time, tempted, will prove to be apples of Sodom turning to ashes in the taste. They can vanquish men now by the fascination of their influence, but give them the rod and the control of the domestic exchequer and you kill all that delicate sentiment and refined feeling that forms the indissoluble cement of the marriage relation. You rouse up the animal in man, which regards neither age nor sex. Give her the power to separate her interests and herself from him at pleasure, and you divest her of all the real power she ever possessed, and she falls a victim to animal prowess.

There are but three classes of ladies who would wish to change the present relation of husband and wife to that of male and female partners in business, as is contemplated by the proposition of the gentleman from Posey. The first are such as feel a conscious superiority over their husbands and feel that these husbands are great drawbacks to them in the race for wealth or fame. Such desire the identity severed. Another class are such as feel the iron rod of rule in domestic economy, and therefore desire emancipation. The third class are—rare it is very certain—but are such as underrate their own charms, and apprehend a defective power resulting from them to maintain that dominion to which they feel themselves entitled, and therefore desire this provision made for them if they should not like the relation upon trial. All such, and perhaps others, you will find in favor of this proposition.

These, sir, are my views and feelings; while I sincerely respect the motives and the action of the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) I must oppose his proposition as a whole. I believe that he has entirely mistaken the basis of female influence and power, and that wherein he hopes to increase it, he will sap its foundations. If I have portrayed the spring and source of that influence correctly, and unless he can show that another power with a different source is more potent to exercise a beneficent influence in the conjugal relation, he must surrender the argument. Perhaps he will tell us that he would secure both influences, that which I have portrayed and admired, and that which he estimates will spring from the control of her property, but I tell him they cannot co-exist—they will not live together—the presence of the one is not consistent with the life of the other. This Anglo-Saxon man allows no equal, claiming and asserting to be an equal in that relation. He is proud of his wardship. He is proud that such a being as woman throws herself upon his magnanimity and trusts her happiness in the present, and all the wealth of her future hopes to his generosity. Believe me, he will redeem the tacit pledge. They have been living together for eighteen hundred years, and all the while female influence and power has been growing and strengthening, and so will it ever continue to grow and strengthen until it will become absolute in all things wherein God has graciously appointed her to walk and administer.

Mr. GIBSON said: Mr. PRESIDENT, One of the instructive lessons taught us by the history of the past, and which is written upon almost every page of its records, is that no great and radical reform of either social or political evil, was ever yet effected without a struggle. Abuses which have been sanctioned by time and rendered familiar by custom, are never abolished by the common and unanimous consent of the people among whom they exist, no matter how monstrous the shape they may have assumed.

Where now throughout all the States which compose this Confederacy, could be found a man who would condemn the act, by which the Continental Congress seceded from the British Crown? Not one; there is no difference of opinion among us now upon that question. Yet when the Declaration of Independence was first read from the window of the old State House at Philadelphia, thousands of honest men regarded the act as morally wrong, and a still greater number looked upon the issue as hopeless, and the struggle as inexpedient and impolitic. Had we, sir, have continued to live under the Colonial Government of Great Britain to the present hour, and were the question now, whether we should declare our independence, no one who judges of mankind by the light of experience would expect unanimity of opinion, as to the justice or expediency of the measure, either in this body, or among the people whom they represent.

If the Declaration of Independence were now proposed for the first time, it would meet here the same opposition that it encountered in 1776. To doubt this we must disregard all the teachings of experience, all the history of the past, or believe that human nature in the nineteenth century differs from human nature in any other age of the world.

But for this law of human action which seems to have been universal, I should have been led to hope, that the principles embodied in the section under consideration would have needed only to be presented to this Convention, to have received their unanimous assent. But, sir, I anticipated no such reception of the proposition, and I have not been disappointed. I knew, sir, that we should have to meet the old and stereotyped arguments, with which the Jews sought to confound the Messiah and his disciples—which met Luther and Melancthon, in the outset of their career—which, in short, have been urged against every reformer and every reform which the world has ever witnessed:—that we are seeking to overturn the foundations of society: that the old system under which our fathers and mothers lived and died, is good enough for their children; that vice and immorality and licentiousness will surely follow any further extension or recognition of human rights, especially if that recognition extends to woman. These, sir, are the arguments that meet us here; and they are the very same by which tyrants have in all ages sought to justify and defend their usurpations. The same that have always been urged whenever an equality of human rights has been sought to be established.

There are, sir, in the science of mathematics certain propositions called axioms, that are so plainly and manifestly true, that no demonstration can add anything to the conviction which the mind intuitively has of their truth. Such, for example, as that a strait line is the nearest distance between two points, or that the whole is greater than a part. So, sir, there are axioms in political and moral science, and when I lay down the proposition, that our existing laws governing the legal rights of married women in relation to property, are in themselves grossly unjust, and that they necessarily and inevitably are the cause of the grossest fraud, I only say that which is so plainly and indisputably true, that no argument however elaborate, no reasoning however lucid, can make it any plainer, or strengthen the conviction which the bare enunciation of the proposition carries with it.

When the law under which we live is once fairly stated, everything is said on that question, which needs to be said. Any argument to prove its injustice towards women, would be as useless as would a torch to light our path at noonday. The laws of Draco that were written upon tablets and hung so high that none could read them, required no argument to prove their injustice.

The gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Rariden,) who I regret to find arrayed against us upon this question, freely admits that the laws of descent so far as they affect widows are obviously unjust, and thinks that a repeal or change of them is all the reform needed. But, sir, the evil is wider and deeper than he is willing to concede; far too wide and deep for such a remedy to be of any avail. No change in the laws of descent can ever operate with even-handed justice, so long as the feudal dogma, that the legal existence of the wife is merged in the husband and her rights transferred to him, continues to govern like an organic law, all our enactments on the subject. That is the great and overshadowing evil that requires to be eradicated, and the balance may be safely left to legislation.

I have been told by gentlemen here that they would be willing to go almost any length to secure to the wife her real estate, but the personality they could not think of interfering with. Now, Sir, it is precisely in relation to her personal property that the law treats woman with the greatest injustice. Few among us, except those whose business it is to study the laws, are aware of the every day operation of our present system, and the enormous injustice that constantly and certainly results from it.

And here let me remark, to the honor of human nature, that I never yet pointed out the injustice resulting from these laws to any man, who did not denounce them as infamous.

As I before remarked, the whole structure of our jurisprudence governing the relations of marriage and property, rests upon a feudal maxim, that the very existence of the wife is merged in that of the husband; her person becomes his slave, that he may beat with rods, or bind with fetters, and her property becomes his. The practical operation of the system may perhaps be best illustrated by examples of supposed cases:

A man without a dollar in the world marries a woman, who has a hundred thousand dollars on deposit in some neighboring bank. He goes the next day and has the money transferred to his own name on the books of the bank, or in law language reduces it into possession. A week afterward he dies. What think you, sir, the law will do with that money. "Restore it to the widow, of course," is the natural response of every man who labors under the delusion that law and justice are necessarily connected. Not so, sir, not so. The law sets about to find an owner for that fortune. To the widow, who a short week before was undisputed master of it, and has forfeited it by no crime, unless to love be a crime, to her it gives one-third of the sum and the balance to relations of her deceased husband whom perhaps neither she, nor he, ever saw or heard of.

If he had children, they take it; if none, then the law traces back to the furthest and remotest of kin, but the wife gets it not. The law will first trace back in the line of his genealogy, to Adam, and then down to some descendant of our first progenitor. [Laughter.] Out of her princely fortune, which was all her own a brief month before, she is now allowed but the fraction, some thirty-three thousand dollars.

But again, suppose the woman was a widow, and the man a widower, both having children before their intermarriage. We will suppose the woman to be possessed of one hundred thousand dollars in personal property. In course of time the wife dies, without children by the second marriage, and perhaps a month later the husband sleeps beside her in the grave. What then becomes of the property? It goes to her children, of course, is the natural response. Not at all; they get not one cent. They may be left beggars, while his children are suddenly made wealthy with their father's wife's property! Does it need an argument to prove that such laws are unjust? Sir, I might multiply instances of the operation of our laws in this regard, each one grosser in its injustice than the last, but it is not necessary.

The laws regulating real estate are not quite so bad as those of personal property. When a man marries a woman possessing real estate he has a right to the possession and all the benefits and profits arising from its use during his lifetime; the fee is secured to her heirs after his death. It is not in the event of death alone, that the evils growing out of our laws relating to women, force themselves upon our consideration. If all the acts of villainy, all the outrages committed upon the rights of women under these laws, and the suffering and woe resulting from them, were written in a volume, the universal execration of mankind would blot those enactments from the Statute book.

I know of one instance, it did not come under my personal knowledge, but was related to me by a gentleman of standing, conversant with the facts, which I will briefly relate:

A woman lived in the city of Cincinnati, whose misfortune it was to have a drunken husband; she had lived with him until she could endure his abuse, and the suffering consequent upon his neglect, no longer; she had borne with poverty and ill treatment until to forbear ceased to be a virtue, and she took her three children and left him. To support herself and them, she took in sewing, and it so occurred that the work she first obtained was from the very scoundrel who supplied her husband with the liquor that had ruined him and his family. When she had finished the work, and the time came to receive her pay, she told her employer the amount of work, and the pittance of compensation to which she was entitled, and, sir, she was presented, by that employer, with her husband's grog bill! The law—the law which gentlemen eulogize here, came in to the aid of the liquor seller, and that suffering woman was compelled to receive that grog bill in payment for her toil! The law, the glorious common law, sanctified the deed, and said it was right!

We have been told here, of the power and influence of females. The gentleman (Mr. Rariden) portrayed to us their powers of persuasion, and the influence they exercised over man, and which he tells us is more potent to effect her happiness than the control of her property. That influence, however it may affect the heart of a generous man, cannot change the law; it will not save to her children the property of their mother; it will not secure her in the possession of her earning.

Sir, can the voice of persuasion, even from the lips of woman, reach the dull, cold ear of death? Can it affect the heart of the husband who has gone down to the tomb? Can it pierce the sealed coffin? Can it wrest from the clutch of the law, that of which it has robbed her? No, sir, no, sir: it is powerless then, and I am sorry to add too often powerless in life.

Mr. President, if we had lived up to this time under equitable laws, under a different system from that which has come down to us, if it were now for the first time proposed to establish such laws as are now in force with regard to women, where is the man who would dare stand up and advocate it? No man would be hardy enough, would be indifferent enough to every other man's sense of right and justice, to brave universal public sentiment by the advocacy of such a proposition. I ask attention to this view: think how impossible it would be to find an advocate for laws so revolting to every genuine sentiment of manhood. No man, where the civil law prevails, so much superior, more enlightened, and just than our own in this respect, has ever yet proposed to ingraft upon it the principle of the common law regulating the rights of women. On the other hand, in many of the States of this Union, the common law principle has been abolished, and the civil law established. None of these States have re-adopted the common law principle, and they never will, for no evils, no inconveniences, have resulted from the change, while the contrast is strongly in favor of the justice and right of the civil law. Is not this a strong argument in favor of the proposition before the Convention? It is only time and established usage that reconcile us to the operation of our laws in this particular.

But, sir, we are told that this proposition, though it may be right in itself, should be left to legislation. Mr. President, it has been left there for the past thirty-four years, and they have done nothing. Shall we trust them longer with the righting of this monstrous wrong? Shall we still commit such interests to hands so unfaithful? Merely amending the system, making partial changes here and there, will not effect the desired object. The system must be abolished. You might as well attempt to prune and trim into shape and comeliness the deadly Upas Tree—lay the axe at the root and cut it down, let it no longer cumber the ground and poison the atmosphere. Let us abolish the whole system of laws relative to the rights of property of married women, and free the Republic from the stain of their existence. Let us adopt laws based upon the eternal principles of equity.

The proposition before the Convention is not to fix a system in detail, but to declare a great fundamental principle, and leave the details of its application to the Legislature. The United States is the only country where the common law in this respect is in practical use. In England, from whence we borrowed it, the common law is not in use, for there all marriages are the subject of a marriage contract, and the rights of the female as to property are all provided for, and secured beyond the future control of the husband, so that nothing is left for the operation of the common law, which, in the land of its origin, is thus condemned. Thus we see, sir, that there is no other nation on God's footstool that so degrades woman, and deprives her of her just rights as this of whose progress in enlightened legislation we boast so much. The very Turk, who regards woman as the slave of his caprices and passions, is not mean enough to rob her. [Applause.] The Southern planter when he has purchased a slave, scorns to rob him of the pittance he may have brought with him. It is for us alone, to treat woman in a manner that should mantle every cheek with a blush. Shame, shame, on the manhood of the nation that tolerates so foul an outrage.

We heard read at the Secretary's desk, this morning, the speech of Cato, during a debate in the Roman Senate on the same question we are now debating, dug up from the buried and forgotten pages of Livy, in defense of the position of those who oppose the proposition under consideration. In regard to it, I have just this to say: it is a speech every way worthy of a Roman—every way befitting one of that people who had to steal their first wives, because they had not the manly traits to win them by gentler means. It is right that the historian, who records the rape of the Sabines, should embalm such a speech. [Applause.] Let those who can endorse his sentiments, adopt his conclusions. I will neither endorse the one nor the other.

We are told by the opponents of this proposition, that its effect will be to demoralize woman,—that the granting to her of these rights, will lower her in the scale of being, and bring her down from the proud position she now occupies. Will the possession of her property demoralize her? Why does it not produce that effect now?—they frequently possess large estates. It has been remarked that it is giving her the possession of "a rod." Do we seek to bestow upon females other or more rights than Eternal Justice requires for them? I cannot understand this objection, as to putting into woman's hands "a rod." We propose to give them no power, the exercise of which does not rightfully and naturally belong to them—and not to their husbands. We are told that the pecuniary interests of husband and wife should not be separated. Sir, it is not proposed to separate those interests. Now, woman is the virtual slave of her husband, and has no pecuniary interests whatever. We seek to give her back those interests of which she has been deprived—we seek to unite their interests, and bind them together by a tie stronger far than the power of money. She will feel that she has her rights, and that the property is hers as well as his—not all his, and she his slave, so far as legal rights are concerned. Let us look at this question in another light. Suppose the reform for which we are struggling to be adopted; where could the man be found who would go to his intended wife, the day, perhaps, before they were to be married, and say to her, to-morrow we are to be bound in the holy bans of matrimony; I have a little favor to ask before hand: I wish you to give me a check for the money you have in bank, to hand over to me your watch and jewels, and here is a deed for your real estate, which I wish you to execute. Think ye a man could be found in the whole land, with a soul small enough to do it? Or, if he did, what, think ye, would be the answer of the lady? I can see, in fancy, the heartless, soulless craven, skulking from her presence, with her parting words of scorn burned into his very soul.

And yet, what the meanest scoundrel of your land would blush to do, your law does for every man. No man can ask a woman to bestow upon him her heart and hand, without, in effect, asking at the same time, a donation of all her property.

Sir, why this distrust of woman, manifested by gentlemen on the other side—when, or where in all the past, has she proved herself unequal to the station to which fate may have assigned her? Was it in Elizabeth of England, when she swayed the sceptre of the mightiest nation of the earth? Was it in the hero girl of France, whose single arm struck down Murat, when a nation trembled at his nod? Was it in Madam Roland, the heart and soul and life of the noblest political party, whose life was ever trampled out under the iron heel of despotism? Was it in the women of our own Revolution, whose fair hands wrought the banners that waved over every field from Lexington to Yorktown, and who told their sons and husbands and brothers to go forth to the conflict, and return victorious or return no more? No, sir; no, sir. She has ever been equal to her destiny. In everything but brute strength, she is your equal—in all the higher and holier feelings of the heart, she is your superior—immeasurably your superior.

The reform contemplated by the section under consideration, is one that not merely addresses itself to our sense of justice, but appeals, with irresistible force, to the best and purest feelings of our nature. And, sir, it is one that is certain, sooner or later, to triumph. We may fail in the attempt now. Years may pass away, and the grass be growing green above our breasts; but the end is not the less certain.

Sir, there is a redeeming spirit in human nature; that, once aroused, will pause not, rest not, until this foul blot is forever wiped from our laws, and woman restored to that equality of rights to which every feeling of our hearts, every dictate of our judgment, tells us she is entitled.

Sir, the eyes of our countrywomen are upon us. They are watching, with silent solicitude, the result of our deliberations. From the stateliest mansion to the lowest cabin; everywhere, throughout the whole length and breadth of our State, they know that their rights are to be here the subject of discussion. They may seldom speak upon the subject, for it has ever been the nature of woman, rather to suffer injustice than to complain. But, he who, because her gentle nature rises not in rebellion against the law that wrongs her, would argue from her silence that she is a willing slave, has read to but little purpose that mystic volume, a woman's heart.

I would, sir, that my voice could reach the ears of my countrywomen everywhere, throughout the land. I would say to them, rouse up! awake from your lethargy; for once lay aside your woman's nature, and throw the weight of your influence in the scale where your rights hang trembling in the balance.

Let that voice be heard to which no one, in whose bosom beats the heart of a man, ever listened unmoved, and, my word for it, you will not speak in vain. [Applause.] Whatever may be the result of the struggle in this Hall; though old and time worn prejudices, though cold calculating heads and colder hearts, may repress the movement for the present; yet despair not; the cloud is breaking: not here alone in our own glorious West, but everywhere throughout our whole country—throughout the whole world.

Wherever civil and religious freedom has triumphed, man is beginning to blush for the heartless system of vassalage to which he has condemned you for ages. I say again, whatever may be the fate of the struggle here, despair not, for, as certain as that the wheels of time roll on, as certain as that God is just, man cannot always be unjust to woman.

It is for us, Mr. President, to determine whether it shall be recorded of this Convention, that they had the moral courage, despite the sneers of cynics; despite the croakings of political ravens, and in the face of all the prejudices which time, and custom, and interest have arrayed against this reform, that, rising above and disregarding all these obstacles, seeing clearly the right, they dared to be just.

Shall we, sir, do this, or shall we leave the task and the glory to others? For, be assured, sir, that, whatever may be our action, the cause itself cannot fail. It may be delayed—it cannot be crushed. Such a cause, the cause of justice; arrayed against maxims of interest, and of at best, doubtful expediency, has never yet ultimately failed in any free government—and, sir, this cannot, will not, fail.

I know not, sir, what may be the feelings of others, but for myself, I would ask no prouder epitaph to be written above my tomb, than that I was one of those who assisted in elevating woman to a position of legal equality with man.

I would rather that my name should sweep down the tide of time, as the author of such a reform, than that it should be graven on an hundred monuments, as the victor of an hundred fields.

If the book of destiny were opened before me now, and I given to choose, I would rather that my name and memory should live in the grateful remembrance of woman, than that it should be consecrated in history, as the deliverer of a nation. [Applause.]

Mr. NAVE. It has been well remarked that declamation proves nothing; nothing but reason, that which is the science of logic, convinces the mind. We have heard much said in reference to the question now before the Convention, about the injustice done to, and the disregard of the rights of, married women in this country. We have heard from the lips of gentlemen on this floor denunciations against the male portion of the community as being "heartless," and as being nothing more nor less than so many savages. We have had all this, and more, from gentlemen here; and had a stranger made his appearance in our midst and heard all this declamation, he would necessarily come to the conclusion that the male portion of this community were but little removed in moral character or refinement of feeling above the red man of the forest.

But, sir, let us examine this question calmly, let us consider it as its merits will justify us in considering this subject, and I think we will find that gentlemen are mistaken, that they have pursued a false issue, that they have been endeavoring to force conclusions upon us drawn from false premises, which will have a tendency to place this entire community in a ridiculous attitude. It is said by the mover of this project—the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen)—that the two sections now under consideration, are not inferior in importance to any subject which has hitherto been presented to this Convention, or indeed to any which may hereafter be submitted to our consideration. I admit that in some respects this is true; I admit that the subject now under discussion is one of great importance, that it is of vital importance, if you please, to the interests of this country in the future. For that reason it requires calmness and deliberation, and we should act upon it with coolness and gravity, not under feelings of excitement.

The gentleman from Posey speaks of having been the author of the law which was presented to the Legislature many years ago, and which, by great efforts, he secured in having passed, by which the rights of married women in this country were in some degree secured, and the interests of widows and orphans. I admired his efforts on that occasion; and I may perhaps be permitted to say here, that I admire the efforts of any gentleman who takes an interest in the rights of married women and widows and orphan children; but true enough, as he remarks, in the revision of the Statutes of Indiana in 1843 they laid a ruthless hand upon this provision, and it is now no more to be found on the pages of the Statutes of the State. I admit the conclusion to which he comes, of the great injustice that is frequently done, especially to widows. But in answer to the argument of the gentleman from Posey in reference to that point, I would observe that he is attempting to enforce a provision here, favorable to married woman and widows when it is already completely in the power of the Legislature, the immediate representatives of the people, to do all this; to make such provisions upon the subject whenever they may be deemed necessary, and whenever they are instructed so to do by those whose interests they represent. I am opposed to inserting any such provision in the Constitution of the State. And why? Because I hold that we should not take upon ourselves to legislate unless we possess that power. That is a duty which we ought to leave to the representatives of the people, and I think it more especially devolves upon them to make provision for the rights of widows and married women.

The gentleman from Posey said in his speech, that the law-maker should be a man of experience in reference to these all-important subjects. Now, sir, I perfectly agree with him in this assertion. And, let me ask, does the gentleman from Posey understand these high and noble feelings which animate the female heart. Has he ever been in adversity and received from the partner of his bosom, that cheering smile which would seem to say "oh mind it not, better days will come?" Has he ever been on a bed of sickness where that partner has watched the motion of every muscle, listened for every breath, and felt the beating of every pulse, standing by his side like a ministering angel to anticipate his every want? If I am rightly informed he knows and has felt all this, and therefore he is a proper individual from "experience" to suggest an organic law to remedy the evil complained of.

I will now, Mr. President, pass from this view of the subject to give a brief summary of the law which governs and controls the rights of females in this State, as I believe the law, as it is now in force in Indiana, has not been given by any gentleman who has thus far spoken on the subject; and when I have given that summary, I feel confident that no gentleman will controvert the position which I assume. I will in the first instance consider what is "marriage," because this necessarily enters into the discussion of the question. It is one of the component parts of the question before the Convention, and therefore it may be observed, generally, that the law considers marriage in the light of a contract.

The husband and wife become, by their marriage, one person in law. It is said in the Book of books, that "He which made them at the beginning made them male and female;" and said "for this cause shall a man leave father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife, and they twain shall be one flesh, wherefore they are no more twain but one flesh." That is the law. [Several voices—"Aye; that's it, that's it."] It therefore follows, as an abstract proposition, that a man and wife are one person, and upon the fact that they are one person, they, in law, are not permitted, in trials in court, to be witnesses for or against each other, with but one exception, and that is in the case of a criminal prosecution against the husband for violence done to the person of the wife.

The custody of the person of the wife belongs to the husband.

And as to the property of the wife, it is laid down in the law that all freehold estates of which the wife is seized at the time of the marriage, or afterwards, are vested in the husband and wife during the coverture, in right of the wife; and during their joint lives the husband is entitled to the profits, and has the sole control and management thereof, but cannot convey or charge the lands of the wife, for any longer time than his own interest continues.

The personal property of the wife, belonging to her at the time of the marriage, or accruing to her during coverture, becomes, in general, the absolute property of the husband, with one exception, that is her paraphernalia, and even that he may, under certain circumstances, dispose of. After the marriage the husband is liable to pay all the debts of the wife, contracted before as well as after the intermarriage.

Although the husband and wife cannot, at common law, contract with each other, or grant to each other directly, yet even direct gifts between husband and wife are often considered effectual in the courts of equity; and courts of equity will also take cognizance of any trust created in favor of the wife, whether made by the husband or a stranger, and in administering that jurisdiction will take views of the rights of a feme covert, different in some respects from those of the common law. And where a donation or grant is made to her, for her sole and separate use, she will be held in equity to take a separate estate, although the donor should have omitted to name any trustee.

And the wife may acquire property by what is called a marriage settlement, and if made prior to the marriage, it is in law deemed a valuable consideration; and if made after marriage, the same is voluntary, and therefore without any valuable consideration.

The gentleman from Posey, by his proposition now before this Convention, proposes to insert in the Bill of Rights a proposition, that, if adopted, will make an innovation upon the common law, by placing it in the power of femes covert, in the future, to acquire, hold, and own property separate and distinct from their husbands; or, in other words, he proposes to incorporate into the organic law of Indiana the Roman or civil law. This the Convention clearly have the right to do; but is it expedient for them to do so, with all the experience of ages before their eyes, pointing them to the many evils which have, in past ages, blighted the prosperity of nations, and caused infidelity, debauchery, and misery to fall upon them and destroy their peace and happiness, and has caused France, with the teachings of Voltaire and other infidels, to shut out the light of the benign influences of the gospel from her borders?

The proposition of the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) in my opinion, is clearly uncalled for. By a reference to the history of the past, we may learn what will be the probable effect upon the future under a like law to that which is proposed to be inserted into the organic law of this State. Therefore, it may not be considered out of place for me to consider, summarily, some of the many evils which the Roman civil law entailed upon the Romans themselves, and the effects produced thereby upon the marriage state. It has been well said by many able jurists and statesmen, that the civil law was attended with many inconveniences; that it increased debauchery; besides, it was no uncommon thing for women, when they become richer than their husbands, to become insulting to them, and to behave themselves in their families with great haughtiness. The immortal Jefferson, writing in reference to the then state of society in France, and the debauched condition thereof, attributes the whole to the effects of the civil law then in force in France, permitting the wife to hold, acquire, and own property separate and distinct from the husband; and if he, with all his experience and sagacity as a statesman, living in the city of Paris, and beholding daily the withering effects of such a law upon the happiness and prosperity of that nation, has given us his disapprobation of such an unholy law, and whose opinion is worth one hundred Kents and Storys, who could know nothing of the practical effects of such a law upon the people of France. Surely it becomes us to act with the utmost caution on a question involving such serious results. I would not, by any means, if in my power, attempt to detract from either of those distinguished jurists their well earned reputations as lawyers and jurists; but they were mere book men, while, on the other hand, Mr. Jefferson was a statesman of the first order of intellect, with great and extensive experience.

Such, Mr. President, is a brief summary of the law as it now exists, and is in force in the State of Indiana; and this is the law about which gentlemen have made so much complaint. The gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) I believe, is not a lawyer, and I think he has not fully understood the rights of the married women as they exist under the law.

MR. OWEN. Oh yes; I have understood every word of it.

MR. NAVE. The gentleman informs me that he has understood every word of the law in its force and effect. Well, sir, this is the law which the gentleman proposes to change; and he says that the change which he proposes, is a radical change in reference to the law of descent, and the rights of the female to acquire property separately and distinctly from her husband.

Now, let us examine this question for a moment; and, in doing so, let us bear in mind that man and wife are one—identically one—one in interest, one in feeling, one in hope, one in present enjoyment, one in future expectation, one in everything that pertains to happiness. They are created one by the contract entered into, and it is the interest and the desire of the one to make the other happy.

Mr. President, I would not wish to insinuate for a moment, that the gentleman from Posey had any improper design in introducing a proposition of the kind which he has introduced into this body. Far from it. But if he wishes to see feuds and discord and dissatisfaction reign where all should be calmness and harmony and peace, I cannot conceive any proposition more admirably suited to effect such an end, as that which he has presented here. If he wishes to illustrate that portion of Scripture which says, "a house divided against itself cannot stand," then let his proposition prevail.

He proposes to bring the wife into direct competition with the husband, and thus to overturn all that is sacred and holy in that best and brightest and happiest and holiest relation with which the Almighty has deigned to bless mankind. What does the gentleman propose? He proposes that the wife shall hold property separately and distinctly from her husband, over which he has no manner of control, and which is to be entirely at her own disposal, so that she could follow it to New Orleans, or England, or any other portion of the globe. Why, sir, such a proposition is directly in conflict with that unity of feeling and interest which should ever exist when man and wife are united together. As the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) said, it is not the property which elevates the wife; it is not the property which she may acquire that will make her happy. The love of wealth or the possession of property is a passion of which, as a wife, she knows nothing. It is the feeling that there is one on whom she can rely, one to whom she can look up, one to whom she can give her heart, her all, that alone controls the female portion of the community, and that attaches them to the harder sex.

Mr. President, I have briefly alluded to the effects of the Roman civil law upon that people, and also upon the people of France, where the same principle prevails. Sir, we have an illustration of the workings of the principle, in some measure, in our own country, in the State of Louisiana. It must be known to many gentlemen here, that it not unfrequently happens that persons taking property—say the surplus produce of their plantations—down the Mississippi river to New Orleans, come home without a single cent, having been swindled by the operations of just such a law. And how is this? The process is exceedingly simple. The planter, with his surplus produce, goes to market, and finding a buyer who offers a fair price, and who, to all appearance, is sufficiently responsible, he suffers his property to go upon a short credit. The time of payment comes, and he applies for his money; but, instead of receiving it, he is very coolly told that the sheriff has taken everything under a judgment, and that there is nothing left to pay with. And in whose favor, think you, was the judgment given? Why, in favor of his wife, given by confession. Execution is issued, the wife purchases in the property to satisfy her judgment, and the unfortunate man who has thus been swindled out of his property, returns to his family without a penny. This, sir, is the effect of the law in Louisiana—an effect the sad consequences of which have been experienced in many a melancholy instance by those who have been trading there from year to year.

Mr. President, I think, from this very illustration, it follows, as a matter of course, that the object of the gentleman, whatever it may be, can be much better accomplished by legislation than by the incorporation of any principle into the organic law of this State. The evils he complains of can be better remedied by legislative enactment—by the men who are sent directly from the people to make the laws under which all are to live.

Sir, in conclusion, I would remark that I am in favor of securing to married women all that should be secured to them. I would go this far: that when a woman who has property marries a man, that property, or any other that may accrue to her, shall not be liable for the debts or contracts of the husband; and I think all the hardships complained of, would be remedied by a proposition which I shall offer as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn. It is to add in the proper place the following:

"No law shall be passed whereby the property owned by a feme covert at the time of her intermarriage, or by her acquired subsequent thereto, either by inheritance, gift, grant, devise, or otherwise, shall ever be taken for the debts of the husband contracted before or after said marriage."

If this provision is incorporated into the organic law of the State of Indiana, I think it is all that any gentleman can wish for—all that the females could desire. It secures in the woman's hands all her own property, leaving it within the control of the husband, but perfectly secured from attachments in consequence of his debts or contracts either before or after marriage.

Mr. BASCOM. I have but a very few words to say upon this question, and the Convention need not, therefore, be under any apprehension that I am going to inflict upon them a long speech. The opinions of gentlemen seem to have run into extremes on this subject. One gentleman would make out that the ladies are the guardian angels of this world, and another would seem to insinuate that they are little better than fiends, who are always fighting and quarreling with their husbands. That speaks not well for the comforts of matrimonial life—at least so far as the argument of the gentleman from Hendricks goes. These arguments would go to make you believe that when a woman is possessed of property, because she holds it in her own name, it must necessarily create war between her and her husband. Now, I cannot go to the extreme to which the gentleman from Hendricks (Mr. Nave) would go; neither can I agree entirely with the gentleman from Clark (Mr. Gibson). However willing I may be that you should elevate the women and place them in their proper position, I cannot concede that they should take the position in which some gentlemen would place them. I look upon woman as being fitted for another sphere; I look upon her, not as being designed to mingle with us in the busy scenes of life, to participate in its toils, its struggles, and its cares, but to be placed within our homes, to be by our firesides after our daily toil is finished, to welcome us with her smiles, and receive us with that affectionate greeting which alone can make a happy home. This is the position—this the place for which she is adapted.

I am much mistaken in my notions of the ladies of this State, if they wish to enter into the great political arena, and distinguish themselves by their acts in the political world. I cannot believe that the women of the State of Indiana, have any such aspirations. I cannot but think that they know better the position for which they were designed, and that they value the influence which they possess in their own peculiar sphere much too highly to seek any distinction beyond it.

But, sir, this is said to be a question of right. Now, I am willing they should have all the rights to which they are justly entitled, and, this is not a question whether you are going to take away the rights of women, but whether you will give them the rights to which they are justly entitled. Sir, I believe that women should hold to themselves the property of which they were possessed before marriage—that it should be held sacred to their use; but I cannot conceive that it would be right, or that it would be placing man and woman in the right position after marriage, if they are still to keep up separate establishments, or carry on separate businesses. I agree with the gentleman from Hendricks, when he says that man and wife are one—one in feeling and in interest (and in all cases of happy marriage this is so). And in that case when their interests are the same, what necessity for making this distinction? Then I would say, let woman have her own property which she possessed prior to marriage in her own right after marriage, and whatever is acquired after that, let it be possessed in common; let it stand as the property of the family, and let each have an equal right in it.

Then, sir, I am willing to amend the law so far as this, that where there is no heir at hand, the law should not go over the country to find an owner to the property—in other words, that the widow should be entitled to the property of the husband, for I believe that she is the proper person to whom it should revert. But if you are going to the extent to which some gentlemen seem inclined to go, if you are going to give them the right to go into business independently of their husbands, to purchase goods, and to trade and traffic; if you are going to place them in competition with their husbands in worldly affairs; if you are going to place them side by side with their husbands, in a neck-and-neck race of competition in the affairs of the world, then I think you will place them out of, and beyond, their sphere; you will place them in a position which is not legitimately theirs; and I hold that they should remain in their own legitimate sphere. I would not rob them of what they have. None but a fiend would take from the wife the property which she brought with her. No person with proper feelings would desire to rob a woman of her just rights; but, at the same time, I think it is highly desirable that she should be allowed to remain in the position for which she was designed, and which it is her bounden duty to fulfil—the position in which every right thinking man would desire to see her placed. Then, sir, I think that with a very slight modification of the section as reported by the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) this matter might be accomplished. I hope that before the final action is taken on the section that it will be to some extent amended.

Pending the question on the amendment offered by Mr. Nave;

On motion of Mr. STEEL, the Convention adjourned.

SPEECH OF MR. TERRY OF DAVIESS,
On Mr. Pettit's resolution proposing to abolish the Grand Jury system, delivered Monday, November 4, 1850.

MR. TERRY. I fear, sir, as, in consequence of my ill health, I have been unable to give the thought and preparation to this subject which it appears to demand, that I shall not be able this morning to discuss its merits in the manner in which they should be presented.

But, Mr. President, no question or subject has been or can be presented for the decision of this body, in my estimation, that demands more imperatively the calm consideration and impartial judgment of the Convention than the proposition of the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) to abolish the Grand Jury system. This is an institution dating its origin back to a period of time long anterior to all human tradition relating to it; and it has been cherished and fostered as a shield to the weak—a curb to the strong—through ages of civilization and experience, and has been preserved by its innate force and intrinsic merit and excellence amid the shocks and convulsions of human ambition—the inventions and experiments of human caprice and fickleness—and the rise and fall of sects, systems, and dynasties; and now, sir, it is interwoven into the very texture of our social organization, and surrounds us in almost every relation of life with its potent and protecting influences.

But now a spurious and fictitious species of progress, stimulated by a morbid and ill-directed public opinion, demands, not its modification—not its reform—not the application of healing and sanative remedies for its defects, if any exist, (and that they exist no one will deny)—but its total extirpation from our judicial system. And why? Because, say gentlemen, this is emphatically an age of progress and reform; that institutions, commended by the wisdom and experience of the past as securities of human freedom, are now tottering with the imbecility and decay of hoary-headed senility; and these great and long cherished principles of Anglo-Saxon liberty, upon which the stately fabric of our Government is reared, have become obsolete; and they are to be supplanted, in public appreciation, by a sublimated species of political transcendentalism, crude, abstract, and impracticable. Reform and progress have become the watchword of political and social organizations, and both of the great political parties of the nation have entered upon a race of rivalry in governmental reforms, and, like the strong men of old, blind to the lights of the past, they would pull down the pillars of antiquity, and crush all beneath their ruins.

Mr. President, the attack upon the Grand Jury system, on this floor, has been a gallant and able one, such as may make its friends have fears for the strength and security of their positions and defenses. And while I express my admiration of the gallant bearing and well sustained assaults of our adversaries, I may be permitted to say, without intending the slightest disparagement, that they have enlisted the aid of auxiliaries not recognized as the legitimate weapons of debate. Gentlemen have sought, in the first onslaught, to obtain the vantage ground of attack, by assimilating this institution with institutions of another age and country, that have come down to us invested with all the odium that injustice and oppression of every species engenders in the human mind, backed by the powerful denunciatory declamation of the able gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit). But are we to treat and discuss questions of so important a character in this manner? I should hope not. Why, sir, a skillful surgeon, when called upon to examine a diseased system, finds out and carefully removes the diseased parts, leaving those that are sound remaining. But this is not the course proposed to be pursued with reference to the Grand Jury system. Because it has defects—but defects not affecting its vitality and efficiency—it is proposed to extirpate the system entirely, instead of removing those defects.

As I remarked before, sir, this is an institution which has been as a shield to the weak and a curb to the strong, and was originally instituted, as we are justified in supposing, by the government from which we derived many of our most valuable laws and institutions for the protection of human liberty, as well as for the efficient execution of the laws against oppression of an aggravated character; and is one of those principles of human rights and personal freedom, incorporated in the Magna Charta, and extorted by the sturdy barons of England from King John on the field of Runnymede.

Now, let gentlemen review English history, and they cannot find a single instance where Grand Juries of their own volition have become the instruments of oppression. But wherever we find instances of an arbitrary exercise of power over the subject by Grand Juries, we find it is the result of a corruption of the system, and not traceable to any organic principle or defect.

Nearly all the instances of oppression that have come down to us, of the subject by the crown, are traceable to a disregard of law in the institution of irregular and unconstitutional tribunals, called into existence by the exercise of kingly prerogatives or parliamentary violence, contrary to the common usages and customs of the realm, such as the Courts of the Star Chamber and High Commission.

But, says the gentleman from Porter, (Mr. Anthony,) there is no analogy between the English government and ours. In this particular I think he is mistaken. The dearest principles that we cherish, those principles of civil government that we all reverence, and for the vindication of which our fathers, single handed, entered into conflict with the gigantic power of Great Britain, were derived originally from England. The first civilized country on earth that adopted, as a means of government, the representative system, was Great Britain, and that principle has been incorporated in the Constitution of every State of the Union. The State Constitutions in their principles, and the Federal or National Government, in its form, are close copies of the English government. The English government, though called into existence by no written Constitution, and Parliament, are as much controlled by rules as ours is, and regulated by organic principles as accurately defined and understood as are the principles that control ours.

The gentleman says he sees no analogy. From whence, I ask, do we get our ideas? Why, sir, nearly all the principles of human freedom, of civil liberty, of personal guaranties, were derived from that country—where the science of human government was better understood, and the securities of personal liberty better observed and enforced than in any other country that ever existed. Our Revolution did nothing more than to sever our political connection with England, to abolish a hereditary executive and aristocracy, and establish a republican form of government—making no further changes than were necessary to substitute a republic for a monarchy—but retaining all else of the English system of government and laws consistent with our new condition and form of government.

The most prominent defects in our Grand Jury system are referable to the unskillful and injudicious attempts to reform it. In England it has none, or very few defects. What is its form, character, and operation there? The sheriff of the shire or county causes to be summoned twenty-three of the most respectable men in the shire, whose names for convenience may have been selected from the register that is always kept of the names of landholders in the shire, at least one of whom are selected from each hundred—a county sub-division similar to our township—after thus summoned they meet at the proper time and place—not as a prosecuting body, acting by their own volition, but merely as an inquiring body to investigate and to inquire into the probable truth of such accusations in the form of an indictment, as may be laid before them by the proper body—and the object of thus selecting the members of the body from all parts of the shire is to enable them to be more exactly informed of offenses that may be committed in their immediate neighborhood, if any. When the Grand Jury meets in court, the judge charges them specially and particularly in relation to their duties. After the charge is given, proclamation is made by the crier of the court for justices, coroners, and others, to deliver all recognizances and inquisitions taken by them. Proclamation is again made for recognizances of witnesses and others to prosecute and give evidence. These when produced are delivered to the crown officer or attorney prosecuting the pleas of the crown, that the bills may be drawn and prepared, these being always prepared before any examination by the Grand Jury is made. The indictment is then presented to the jury for their consideration. They then examine the witnesses and ascertain from the examination whether the charge preferred by the crown can be sustained or not—for by the express provision of the law and by the direction of the judge they are not to present any man unless they are convinced that the charge preferred against the supposed offender be true, and they are convinced of his guilt; and in England it is rarely necessary to send for witnesses during the session of the body, to appear to testify before them, they usually being under recognizance to appear. The Grand Jury does not sit in that country for the purpose of getting up prosecutions, but solely for the purpose of acting on cases that are brought before them for consideration. In this State every member of the Grand Jury, by some unwarranted construction of the law and a perverted sense of duty, considers himself bound to ferret out all offenses whether great or small. He looks upon his own position as a Grand Juror as if it were that of a prosecuting attorney, and therefore supposes that it is his duty in an individual capacity to ferret out and report all grades of misdemeanor. Now, sir, this is not strictly the duty of a juror or of a Grand Jury—and this it is that occasions so much prejudice against our present Grand Jury system, that they seek out and present the most trivial offenses, when in reality they have nothing to do with those minor misdemeanors unless specially brought before them. Now if a judge would charge a Grand Jury properly, he is bound to tell them that when there are any offenses of a higher grade it is their duty to ascertain and indict the criminals. It is their duty to use every possible means for bringing them to punishment. But with regard to trivial offenses, they need not incur the time and expense necessary to find out the petty violations of the law. Those cases more properly come before the justices of the peace.

Again: another cause of complaint against the action of Grand Juries in this State, arises from a niggardly and ill-judged system of economy. Instead of giving the officers prosecuting the criminal pleas of the State an adequate and compensative remuneration, that would induce men of ability and professional character to seek such offices, and thus give character and efficiency to this branch of the public service; the present mode of compensation, consisting exclusively of fees in cases of conviction, throws the office into the hands of men, in a large majority of cases, wholly incompetent and needy, and whose direct interest it is to foster and encourage prosecutions and to make the Grand Juries the means of increasing their compensation. I can, myself, cite an instance of a Grand Jury in one of the Southern counties having, under a control of this character, presented at one term of the court, some forty indictments for the offense of retailing liquors without licence, alone.

But this does not arise from any defect inherent in the system, but from the character of our prosecuting system.

An objection is made to another feature of the Grand Jury, and this feature is peculiar to Grand Juries both in this vicinity and in this county; and that is, that its deliberations are secret. This, so far from being an objection, should be considered one of its chief merits; without this the system would have no vitality, no efficiency, and all its other excellences would be marred and neutralized. Deprive the system of this, and you emasculate it. Secrecy is enjoined for wise purposes. One reason assigned for its observance is that it prevents the subordination of witnesses; by the party indicted being ignorant of the witnesses on whose testimony he is indicted. It also enables the timid to act boldly in bringing desperate wrong-doers to justice. It also induces the members of the Grand Jury to act independently, and to discharge their duties efficiently and without fear of consequences. Deprive it of this principle and you destroy the most deserving feature in its organization.

But to bring public odium to bear against this time-honored institution, it has been assimilated with those of the past, and of other countries, the history of which is associated with the reprobation that is always called forth by the perversion of power and human oppression and cruelty. In the strong and denunciatory language of gentlemen it has been denounced as approximating, in many of its features and characteristics, to the court of Star Chamber and the Spanish Inquisition, and to every other institution that the memory of gentlemen could present, that is odious in public estimation. Its only resemblance to the Star Chamber and Spanish Inquisition, is in its principle of secrecy. In no other feature is there the slightest analogy or parallel.

The Star Chamber was originally instituted for the suppression of maintenance; an offense which became very common after the civil war between the two Roses.

In the general license that then prevailed which the vigorous hand of the 7th Henry could barely repress, one mode of aggression of the strong upon the weak then prevalent, was to prefer unjust claims and urge them by the strong hand, or by corrupting courts and juries. Its jurisdiction was subsequently extended to all offenses, contempts, and disorders that lay out of the course and reach of the common law, for then it might fine, imprison, punish corporally by whipping, branding, slitting nostrils and ears. All prosecutions were instituted not by presentments or indictments through a Grand Jury, but were founded upon information filed by the attorney general and other officers of the crown, and determined, summarily, without the intervention of a petit jury. The members constituting the court were the sole judges of the law, the fact, and the penalty. This was a potent instrument in the hands of the crown for the extension of its prerogatives, for the perversion of justice; and so great was the oppression resulting from its arbitrary exercise of power, that, in compliance with the clamors of the nation, it was abolished in the reign of first Charles.

But, says the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) the system originated in a monarchical government, and was instituted as a "prop" of the crown, and to protect its prerogative. The gentleman has truly stated its origin, and if he means by the expression "a prop to the crown," that it may have been instituted by the crown, he may be correct, as in the infancy of the English government, especially under the Saxon dynasty, all laws are supposed to have originated in the monarch, aided by his nobles or thanes, and it is highly probable that the Grand Jury may have had such an origin, as a part of the system of criminal courts. But this rests wholly upon conjecture.

But that there is any thing in the organization of the Grand Jury system that makes it naturally an ally of the crown, for the oppression of the subject, I cannot believe; for its whole theory and use, as far back as tradition extends, is inconsistent with such an assumption. In its very nature it could not be a prop of the crown. The members of the body were, and are usually, selected from the great mass of the people, who were to sit in judgment on the conduct of their neighbors and fellow subjects, and as such, would not, naturally, be made instruments in the hands of power to oppress those with whom they held a community of interests and identity of feelings and sympathies. The "bloody assizes" have been alluded to by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, as one of the results of the operation of the system, of which the system is, to some extent, at least, responsible. By the "bloody assizes" are meant the severe and sanguinary executions that were inflicted under the color of legal proceedings in the reign of James II., under the bloody auspices of the ferocious Jeffries, upon the followers of the unfortunate Earl of Monmouth, after his defeat at Leamoor. But even in their executions the forms of law were observed; each was indicted by a Grand Jury for treason, tried by a court, and found guilty by a verdict of a petit jury; and as well might the force of gentlemen's denunciations be hurled against courts and petit juries as the Grand Juries, for if wrong was done in these executions, all were equally inefficient for the protection of innocence.

But it will be recollected that the unfortunate victims of these assizes were prosecuted and convicted for high treason, an offense then and now recognized by the laws of all countries. Those deeds were not attributable to the Grand Jury. Those bodies did but carry out the law as it was formed for their guidance. They were not responsible for the character of the laws under which they made their presentments. Those laws were under the exclusive control of the rulers of the land, and as they were laid down to the Grand Juries they had to administer them. We might as well charge the evils of bloody assizes upon the petit juries of that land as upon the Grand Juries. And, indeed, there is as much reason for the abolition of the system of petit juries as for the abolition of the system of Grand Juries.

The Grand Jury a prop of the crown ! Why then did Henry VII, the most avaricious monarch that ever sat upon the English throne and who left behind him a treasure greater than did any monarch who ever preceded or followed him, cause to be enacted by a servile parliament the statute to which the gentleman from Hendricks (Mr. Nave) has referred, authorizing prosecution of all offenses, not capital, to be by informations, before the justices without an indictment or presentment by Grand Jury, and trial by petit juries. If a prop to the crown and an instrument in its hands, why did the crown by frequent stretch of its prerogative create other tribunals by which it oppressed and despoiled the subject ? Would this have been done if Grand Juries had then been pliant and submissive tools ? They were not such tools, and from their very nature and organization they could be prostituted to no such purpose. We find that the crown in all its struggles for the extension of its power, resorted not to the aid of Grand Juries, but to prosecutions and proceedings founded upon informations.

Informations are a common law proceeding. They are of two kinds ; one kind was in behalf of the king for such enormous misdemeanors as peculiarly tended to distract or endanger his government or molest or hinder him in the regular discharge of his royal functions. This mode of prosecution was instituted on the ground of avoiding fatal delays. These are filed by his attorney general ; the other was filed, in the name of the king upon the relation of a private person or informant, who usually had an interest in the penalty, if pecuniary, by the king's coroner, or attorney in King's Bench, called master of the crown officer. These last were for notorious misdemeanors, such as riots, batteries, libels, &c. ; but when the jurisdiction of the Star Chamber was extended, and when the statute of Henry VII, referred to by the gentleman from Hendricks, (Mr. Nave,) had permitted informations to be filed, upon the relation of any common informer, upon any penal statute not extending to life, or member, at the assizes or before the justices of the peace, who were to hear and determine the same, at their discretion, without juries, either Grand or petit—the Court of King's Bench fell nearly into disuse, and this mode of proceeding was found a potent instrument for gratifying the tyrannical impulses and proclivities of the House of Tudor.

It was under this system of things that Hampden and Dudley, the minions of Henry VII, the active panderers to royal avarice, by hunting obsolete penalties constantly harassed the subject by informations, and enriched the crown. So great did this abuse become that it was enacted in the reign of William and Mary that the clerk of the crown should file no informations, upon the relation of an informer, without the express direction of the Court of King's Bench, the informer to execute bond to prosecute such information effectually, or to pay costs in case of failure.

But, says the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) the institution of the Grand Jury cannot be found in the ancient institutions of Greece, Rome, or Sparta, nor in any of the continental governments of Europe of the past or present age, but can be found nowhere but among the institutions of Great Britain. And I am glad the gentleman is correct in this. Where else should we look for the great principles and guaranties of human freedom and civil liberty, but in that land whence we trace our origin, and whence we derive all those institutions and laws which are the pride and boast of the Anglo-Saxon race. There it was that the rights of man were first recognized and accurately defined, and have been uniformly vindicated. At the time of our birth it was the most free and civilized nation on earth, and what more natural than that we should adopt her laws and institutions as a model for ours ?

If we would find whence we derived many of the dearest and most cherished dogmas of political faith, that are incorporated in our bill of rights, or if we would find the germ whence they sprung, we must look in the declaration of rights proclaimed by the British Parliament, and ratified and recognized by William and Mary in 1688. Would the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) have us to look to Rome, the plundering and aggressive mistress of the ancient world, that trod the nations of the earth under her iron heel, destroying every vestige of freedom ? Would he have us look to Sparta, which, though warlike, was a nation of petty thieves ! To France, where human liberty, in the great convulsions of 1792, that prostrated her government, was supposed to mean license, pillage, and slaughter, where passion and crime rioted in wild and hideous revelry ? We find nothing in them worthy of our imitation, and I hope it is no argument against our Grand Jury system that they had no such institution.

But what, sir, is the proposed substitute ? A public examination of the accused and the witnesses on both sides, before a species of court, to be organized in each county. This, I understand, is to be preliminary. If this tribunal determines that there is probable cause of guilt, the accused is to be recognized to a higher court for trial, upon the information to be filed by the prosecuting attorney.

The objections to this mode are obvious. The accused will have his case passed upon in this preliminary form by a tribunal, ignorant of the law, and subject to all the influences of inflamed public feeling. In the case of the Grand Jury, the court are its legal advisers, and by the secrecy of their proceedings, the members are beyond, and protected from, the influences of popular excitements. Let this plan be substituted and you put it in the power of every prosecuting attorney to become a common informer. His interests directly prompt him to such a course. As a matter of course the more prosecutions that are set on foot the more he is likely to gain.

It is extraordinary that gentlemen, who make a chief and prominent charge against the Grand Jury, that it resembles the court of the Star Chamber in but one particular—that of its secrecy, should be willing to substitute the very mode of proceeding peculiar to that court, in lieu of indictments—that of prosecuting by information—a mode of prosecution that has been almost entirely condemned in England, or, at least, placed under great restrictions there. And these informations are to be filed and set on foot by a class of officers, whose very compensation depends upon the number that can be got up. If in England this species of prosecution came into disfavor, when filed by an officer who had no interest in the result, to what approbrium will it not be subject to here, where it can be instituted by an officer whose very bread and sustenance depend upon his vigilance and activity.

I find, Mr. President, that almost every State of the Union has, in its organic law, provided that no man shall be put to trial to answer crime but upon presentment or indictment; that the Convention that framed our national Constitution had omitted to incorporate it in that instrument; that this principle was regarded so important that it was inserted afterwards as an amendment, in common with other important provisions for the security of personal rights and immunities; and this of itself, with me, would be strong and ample argument, though all others were wanting, for its retention in our organic law.

Mr. President, I had intended saying much more on this subject, but my ill health compels me to bring my remarks to a close. I have not physical ability to proceed further; but I hope the action of the Convention on this subject will be deliberate, cautious, and conservative; that this important institution will not be totally discarded; that we will come to a conclusion favorable to its retention, and that something more will be required for its successful overthrow and condemnation than denunciation and disparagement. With these remarks, I leave the subject in the hands of the Convention, not doubting its decision will be proper and right.

THURSDAY, Nov. 14th, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. CRESSY.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. COOKERLY moved that there be a call of the Convention.

The motion was not agreed to.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF THE DECEASE OF THE HON.
JAMES VANBENTHUYSEN.

Mr. RITCHEY. I rise, Mr. President, to perform a most melancholy duty; to announce to you, sir, and to this Convention, the death of the Hon. JAMES VANBENTHUYSEN of Shelby county, late a member of this Convention. Sir, in the absence of his colleague, I regret to say that I am not sufficiently informed of the life and character of the deceased to present that eulogy which I have no doubt his memory deserves. I have been slightly acquainted with the late Mr. Vanbenthuysen, however, for some three or four years; and, sir, from what I knew of him, and from what I have learned concerning him, I have reason to believe that he was a most honorable man, and one who was well worthy of the confidence reposed in him by the people of his county.

Sir, I shall not undertake, in consequence of my limited acquaintance with Mr. Vanbenthuysen, to pass any eulogy upon him. I hope that upon the arrival of the cars to-day, his colleague, Mr. Hendricks, from Shelby county, will be here; and as he has been familiarly acquainted with the deceased, he will be the proper person to make such remarks concerning his life and character as are appropriate to the occasion. I shall only at present, therefore, move that a committee be appointed to prepare resolutions on the subject of his death, and to make the necessary arrangements for the funeral; and then I would suggest that the Convention take a recess until such resolutions shall be prepared by the committee. I therefore move the adoption of the following:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to prepare appropriate resolutions upon the subject of the death of the Hon. James Vanbenthuysen, and to make the necessary arrangements for the funeral ceremonies.

Mr. PETTIT suggested an amendment to the resolution by adding the following:

“And as a testimony of respect to the deceased, that the Convention do now adjourn.”

Mr. RITCHEY. I accept the amendment as a modification of the resolution that I have offered.

The PRESIDENT. To what time is it proposed the Convention shall adjourn.

Mr. PETTIT. As to that, I will consult the wishes of the mover of the resolution.

Mr. READ of Clark. I would suggest the propriety of letting the committee be appointed, so that they may prepare the necessary resolutions and report them, and that the Convention then adjourn over until to-morrow. That, I believe, is the usual course of proceeding in such cases.

Mr. PETTIT. It strikes me that the resolutions will come in more appropriately when we meet again; and the colleague of the late delegate from Shelby county will then be here, and may formally announce the death. However, I shall acquiesce in any suggestion in reference to it, and in the meantime I will withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. LOCKHART suggested that it would be better to adjourn until three o'clock; by that time, the delegate from Shelby would have arrived.

Mr. SPANN remarked that the uniform custom had been to appoint a committee, and then to take a recess until the committee had time to prepare a report, so that the proceedings might be conducted in proper form.

Mr. RITCHEY remarked that he believed no intelligence had been received from the family as to their wishes in regard to the arrangements for the removal of the body.

Mr. READ of Clark said, he could see no impropriety in the Convention remaining in session until the committee made their report, and then adjourning over until to-morrow. In the meantime, until the committee were prepared to report, they could go on with business.

Mr. LOCKHART. It seems to me that it would be proper to await the arrival of the delegate from Shelby, and give him opportunity to prepare what he desires to say to the Convention on this occasion, and that we had better adjourn until three o'clock for that purpose.

Mr. EDMONSTON. In matters of this kind it has always been usual, as far as my experience goes, after the announcement of the death of any member, to appoint a committee and then take a recess, in order to give the committee sufficient time to prepare their report, during which time no business was transacted. He hoped the practice would not be changed in this instance, for it might appear as though that was a want of respect for the deceased.

Mr. PRATHER. It seems to me, sir, that the better course would be—

The PRESIDENT. Does the gentleman from Vanderburg withdraw his motion to adjourn?

Mr. LOCKHART. If the gentleman wishes to speak I will withdraw it.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio (Mr. PRATHER yielding the floor) said, he would merely add one word to what had already been said. It seems, said Mr. P., that, in some respects, this is a new case, and not like any that has preceded it. The gentleman from Johnson, who makes this motion to pay appropriate honors to the memory of our deceased friend, does not profess to be able to state, and will not be able for some little time to obtain intelligence as to the wishes of the friends of the deceased.

I understand him to say that he is desirous that the Convention shall await the arrival of the gentleman from Shelby before we take any action on the subject. It is not known to any one here, I believe, whether even the family and friends of the deceased have received notice of his demise, or whether they have arrived here.

I think, under the circumstances, that it would be well to adjourn until three o'clock before we take any further action.

Mr. KINDLEY. It is proper, perhaps, that I should take some part in this matter, inasmuch as I was acquainted with the deceased. He stated to me that he wished particularly to be taken home to be buried among his friends. I will add, that is desirable, as it is supposed that as the disease is contagious, that the corpse should be removed as soon as possible. And I would also state that all the arrangements can be made by twelve o'clock.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest that it is usual in such cases to take a recess for half an hour. This will give the committee an opportunity to make the necessary examination.

Mr. NAVE moved that the Convention take a recess until ten o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

The Chair appointed Messrs. Ritchie, Kindley, Zenor, Pettit, and Owen, the select committee, and

The Convention then took a recess until ten o'clock.

AFTER THE RECESS.

At ten o'clock the Convention resumed its sitting.

Mr. RITCHEY, from the select committee appointed to draft resolutions, &c., made the following report:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The committee appointed to draft resolutions relative to the death of the Hon. JAMES VANBENTHUYSEN, late a member of the Convention, and also to make the necessary arrangements for his funeral, beg leave to report—

That they have learned that it was the express desire of the deceased that his body should be removed for sepulture, to his own residence in Shelby county, and therefore they consider it unnecessary to make any arrangements regarding his funeral, other than those reported in one of the resolutions hereto attached.

They report and recommend the adoption of the following resolutions, and that Messrs. Spann, Bowers, and Bracken be appointed a committee to accompany the remains of the deceased to the place of his late residence:

Resolved, That this Convention has heard with deep regret the announcement of the death of the Hon. JAMES VANBENTHUYSEN, late a member of this Convention from Shelby county, who died this morning at three o'clock, at his boarding house in this city; and that the members will testify their respect for the memory of the deceased by wearing the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, That the Secretary of this Convention be directed to communicate a copy of these proceedings to the family of the deceased, in token of the sympathy of the Convention with them under this severe and sudden bereavement.

Resolved, That the President of this Convention certify the account of expenses attendant upon the removal of the corpse of the deceased to the residence of his family, and of his funeral.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect, this Convention do now adjourn.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio moved to amend the first resolution by inserting after the word "days" the words "and that this Convention will accompany the remains to the corporation limits."

Mr. RITCHEY. It may be proper for me to state, Mr. President, that the Convention contemplated embodying the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio in the resolutions, but on account of the contagious nature of the disease of which the gentleman from Shelby died, and the alarm which prevails in reference to the disease, they thought it best to say nothing upon the subject of attending his funeral, leaving it for the members to accompany the remains or not, as they thought proper.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. No general alarm on account of a contagious disease would influence me for one moment to refrain from paying the last tribute of respect to the remains of a deceased friend; and I cannot imagine that any such alarm should prevent the members of this Convention from paying that last tribute of respect due to the memory of one of its members.

I would remark here, Mr. President, that I am requested to state that our deceased friend was a member of the Masonic fraternity, and that that body in this case, will honor his memory by a procession to the corporation limits, whenever his body shall be removed from this place, though I am not advised at present when that will take place. I would also state to those members of this Convention who belong to the Masonic fraternity that their assistance and company at the funeral is requested.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I trust if the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Pepper) perceives any indications of dissent to the passage of his resolution that he will withdraw it.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. I concur entirely with the suggestion of the gentleman from Marion, and if the amendment I have offered meets with any opposition I will withdraw it.

The question being taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, it was unanimously concurred in.

The resolutions reported by the select committee were then adopted unanimously; and in accordance with the last of the series.

The Convention adjourned.

FRIDAY, Nov. 15, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. COOPER.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

STATE PRISON.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Convention a communication from the Warden of the State Prison, setting forth the names and number of prisoners confined in the State Prison since the year 1822.

The Secretary was proceeding to read the communication, when

Mr. GRAHAM of Warrick moved that the reading be dispensed with, and that the communication be laid upon the table.

The PRESIDENT remarked, that it contained some statistical information which, perhaps, it would be desirable to have printed.

Mr. GRAHAM of Warrick. Who was it, sir, that moved the inquiry? I think it will be as well to lay it upon the table, for the present.

The question on the motion to lay the communication on the table being put, it was decided in the affirmative.

So the communication was laid upon the table.

Mr. TAYLOR said, it seemed to him that the communication ought to be printed. He could see no good reason why the Convention should call for a document containing important information, and after having received it, lay it upon the table without printing. He was of the opinion that the people of the State would be gratified by being put in possession of a document of this character. The expense of printing was a very small consideration, when the importance of the information was considered.

Mr. GRAHAM of Warrick said, he had made the motion to lay the communication on the table for the present, with the expectation that it would go to some committee. If it were deemed necessary that it should be printed he had no objection; but he thought that the purpose of attaining the information would be answered by referring it to some appropriate committee—either the committee on the pardoning power of the Governor, or some other committee.

Mr. LOCKHART. I suppose this report is made to us in consequence of a resolution introduced by me. The object of asking for the information was to aid the appropriate committee in preparing some plan by which we can have an intermediate prison, such as a house of refuge—some place to which juvenile offenders may be sent—a house of correction. I therefore second the motion to print.

The PRESIDENT. There is no motion pending.

Mr. TAYLOR. I move that the communication be laid on the table and printed.

The PRESIDENT. It is already laid on the table.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then I move that three hundred copies be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark, at the suggestion of the Secretary, that perhaps strictly according to the rules of the Convention, the document ought to be entered upon the journal. Inasmuch as it is to be printed, the Secretary asks the Convention to excuse him from copying it upon the journal.

By unanimous consent it was directed to be omitted.

Committees being called for reports,

Mr. NEWMAN, from the committee on special and local legislation, reported back a resolution which had been referred to that committee, with a recommendation that it be laid upon the table, and asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

The report was concurred in.

Mr. HALL, from the committee on the State debt and public works, reported a section to be inserted in the new Constitution.

The section was read a first time and passed to a second reading to-morrow; it is as follows:

SEC. —. All the revenue derived from the sale of any of the public works belonging to the State, and from the net annual income thereof, and any surplus that may, at any time, remain in the treasury derived from taxation for general State purposes, after the payment of the ordinary expenses of the government and the interest on the bonds of the State, (other than Bank bonds,) shall be annually applied, under the direction of the General Assembly, to the principal of the Public Debt.

Mr. MAGUIRE said, he supposed it would be in order to receive from the committee some estimates corroboratory of the report.

Mr. HALL. I have the data upon which the report is predicated, and I can now lay them before the Convention, if it be desired; or they may be resumed at the time when the report will come up in its regular order. I believe it is not in order to submit them now unless by unanimous consent of the Convention.

The PRESIDENT said it was not in order, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. READ of Clark. I should like to hear the estimates read if the Convention will consent to receive them.

The question being put,

The Convention refused to receive the document.

Mr. KENT. I now move, in pursuance of notice given yesterday, the adoption of the resolution to which that notice referred.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the roll be called each morning, and the names of the absentees entered upon the journal.

The question being upon the adoption of the resolution,

The yeas and nays were demanded; and they were ordered.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson said, he had an amendment which he desired to offer, if it were in order to do so.

I suppose, said Mr. Dunn, it will frequently happen that, upon the call of the roll, some member may be accidentally absent, although not absent the entire day. In such case it would not be just or right that he should be recorded as an absentee. There will, consequently, be frequent applications from delegates for permission to record their names as being present. In order to avoid this inconvenience, I will move the following amendment:

"Provided, That any delegate may, upon application to the Secretary, after the calling of the roll, have his name stricken from the list of absentees."

Mr. KENT. I will accept the amendment, as a modification of my resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley.—

I suppose, sir, that the object of the gentleman from Floyd, in offering this proposition, is, to expedite the business of the Convention; to save time; to have a full attendance; but I doubt whether the gentleman has fully considered what its effect will be. It will take a long time every morning to call the roll, and to note the absentees, and to hear excuses; and the early part of the day will be pretty nearly consumed in these preliminary arrangements. And, I will say further to the gentleman, that it strikes me as being an entirely novel rule, a thing heretofore unheard of in any deliberative body. If there ever has been a similar one, it has escaped my notice altogether. Sir, it would be an iron rule in its operation; and I suggest to the gentleman, whether there is really any necessity for the adoption of a rule of this kind by the Convention: whether it is a matter of importance that every delegate should be in his seat. Does the gentleman suppose that, if even one-third of the members were absent, it would preclude the transaction of business, or retard it in the smallest degree? It would, in my opinion, rather facilitate business, and I suggest to my friend from Floyd, and the Convention, whether, if we adopt this rule and have the roll called every morning, and hear excuses made for those who happen to be absent, we shall not consume a great deal of time unnecessarily; and whether there is any propriety in our innovating and adopting a rule of this kind. And, whether we are not, by its adoption, saying that there are more absentees from this body than from any other, and that there is less business transacted: that there is more dissipation of time than ever has occurred in any deliberative body in the world. It is entirely a new thing. I do not know that it has ever been adopted anywhere; if it has, I should like to be informed of the instance.

Mr. KENT. In reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Ripley, I have only to say that the call of the roll will probably occupy from five to seven minutes. I trust the Convention will adopt the resolution. It certainly will save a great deal of time in the prosecution of our business here.

Mr. WATTS. If it is in order, I will propose an amendment, which will, perhaps, remove the difficulty anticipated by the gentleman from Ripley. It appears to me, sir, that men who are elected as delegates to this Convention, should have no objection to having their names appear on the journal when they are here, and that they should have no objection to let their constituents know when they are absent. In case of the absence of a delegate, I can see no impropriety in having the fact stated on the journal. If a man is necessarily absent, it is perfectly excusable, and his constituents will excuse him; and if he is unnecessarily absent, his constituents ought to know it. I therefore move the following amendment:

"And hereafter the Convention will meet at half-past eight o'clock, until the close of the session."

The question being upon the adoption of the amendment,

Mr. TAYLOR. I cannot see the propriety of, or the necessity for, passing this resolution. Sir, I regret that my honorable friend has offered it. It seems to be intended as a kind of whipper-up or spur to stimulate lagging delegates in their attendance. Now, I take it that the people have elected men to this Convention who are not in need of overseers to keep them attentive to their duties. I am inclined to think that members of this Convention have attended about as regularly, and been as assiduous in the discharge of their duties, as the members of any deliberative body that I have ever seen. It is presumed that when a delegate is in good health, he will be in his place in the Convention. If he be not in his place when a vote is taken, his name is of course omitted; and it will then be seen that he was absent. That, it appears to me, is quite sufficient. I have no idea that members will absent themselves when there are important questions to be considered and voted upon. Shall we proclaim to the world, by the adoption of such a rule as this, that we cannot get members of this Convention to give their attention to the public business which they have sworn to do?

I cannot perceive any necessity for the adoption of such a resolution, and I hope it will not pass. I will move that the resolution and pending amendment be laid upon the table.

The yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered.

Mr. HALL asked for a division of the question.

And the question being first on laying on the table the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn, (Mr. Watts,) the yeas and nays were taken with the following result—yeas 47, nays 60:

Those voting in the affirmative were,

Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Chapman, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Foster, Frisbie, Gibson, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Hall, Hawkins, Hovey, Howe, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Warren, Kilgore, Lockhart, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Shoup, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Taylor, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Wunderlich, and Mr. President—47.

Those voting in the negative were,

Messrs. Badger, Balingall, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Carr, Carter, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dobson, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Garvin, Gordon, Haddon, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Logan, Maguire, March, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Morgan, Nave, Nofsinger, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Watts, and Zenor—60.

So the amendment was not laid on the table.

The question recurred upon laying the original resolution upon the table, and the yeas and nays being taken were—yeas 40, nays 62—as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative were,

Messrs. Anthony, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Biddle, Bourne, Carr, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dunn of Perry, Foley, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Hardin, Jones, Kendall of Warren, Kilgore, Miller of Gibson, Newman, Niles, Pepper of Ohio, Prather, Read of Clark, Shoup, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Taylor, Wheeler, Wiley, Wunderlich, Zenor, and Mr. President—40.

Those who voted in the negative were,

Messrs. Alexander, Badger, Balingall, Blythe, Carter, Coats, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hall, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of

Washington, Nave, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Stevenson, Tague, Watts, and Wolfe—62.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT. The question is now upon the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Watts) to meet at half-past eight o'clock until the close of the Convention.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford moved to amend the amendment by adding the following:

"And it shall further be the duty of the Secretary upon each motion to adjourn, to enter upon the journal the mover's name, and the precise hour of the day."

The amendment of the gentleman from Crawford was concurred in.

The question then recurring upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Watts)—

Mr. RITCHEY said: I hope, Mr. President, that the Convention will pause a little before they act upon this question. For one, I must say, that I can see no necessity for its adoption. There appears to be a feeling at present pervading this body, in favor of calling the yeas and nays merely for the consumption of time; and I regret deeply to see the exhibition of any such feeling. If this resolution is adopted, it will not deter any man from being absent from any cause which he may deem satisfactory. I expect to answer to my constituents for my presence in this Hall during the consideration of important questions that may come before us; and I apprehend that the action of other members will be similarly influenced.

The amendment of the gentleman from Crawford (Mr. Pepper) I consider a very good one, still I see no necessity for its adoption at this time.

With regard to the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn, (Mr. Watts,) to meet here at half-past eight o'clock in the morning, I have only to say, that I believe if we are here at nine o'clock and attend to the transaction of our necessary business until twelve o'clock, that then it will be proper and necessary to adjourn for the morning. We will not expedite business by protracting the morning session. I do not think that we will be in the slightest degree restrained by this resolution if it is adopted. I suppose that in this matter of being absent from this Hall, every member feels that for it he is responsible to his constituents and to his constituents alone, as he is for all his actions here, and is prepared to abide their decision in regard to it.

What is the necessity for this resolution? We are calling the yeas and nays every day upon important questions, and those lists will show whether members are here or not and attending to their duty. And why not call the names of the members here in the afternoon when we meet? There is just as much necessity for finding out absentees then as at the commencement of the morning session. I consider that the resolution will lead to an unnecessary consumption of time, and be productive of no good; I trust, therefore, it will not prevail.

The PRESIDENT. I would state to the Convention that the Chair is of the opinion that the motion of the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Watts) is out of order. The gentleman from Floyd (Mr. Kent) gave notice on yesterday that he would propose an amendment to a standing rule. The gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Watts) proposes an amendment which does not properly appertain to the amendment of the gentleman from Floyd. The amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn is connected with an entirely different rule, for an amendment to which he must give one day's notice, as in the case of the gentleman from Dearborn.

Mr. WATTS. I stated, when I submitted my proposition, that I had doubts as to whether it was in order. The motion, however, was received. There has been several votes taken upon the proposition, and I would rather withdraw the motion, if it is not in order, than travel back and re-consider what has been done. My object in offering the amendment was to expedite the business of the Convention, not to delay it. I withdraw the motion.

The motion of the gentleman from Dearborn was accordingly withdrawn.

The question then being upon the adoption of the resolution of the gentleman from Floyd, (Mr. Kent,) as amended by the gentleman from Crawford, (Mr. Pepper,) the yeas and nays were demanded, and being ordered, were taken with the following result—yeas 70, nays 35:

AYES.—Messrs. Alexander, Badger, Balingall, Beard, Blythe, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Coats, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hall, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Lockhart, Logan, March, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Nave, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Stevenson, Tague, Watts, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, and Mr. President—70.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Biddle, Bourne, Clark of Tippecanoe, Crumbacker, Davis of Vermillion, Dunn of Perry, &c., Foley, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Hardin, Hawkins, Kendall of Warren, Kilgore, Kinley, Maguire, Miller of Gibson, Newman, Niles, Pepper of Ohio, Prather, Read of Clark, Ritchey, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Taylor, Wheeler, Wiley and Zenor—35.

So the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

RIGHTS OF MARRIED WOMEN.

Mr. OWEN. I move that the sections in regard to the rights of married women be made the special order until otherwise disposed of by the Convention. I will state, that in making this motion, I have no intention whatever, as far as I am concerned, of pressing this matter to a vote at this time, desiring that it may be thoroughly discussed, as was the Grand Jury question, so that we may have public opinion coming back to us in regard to the question before our final action upon it.

The motion was adopted by consent.

The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of the sections relating to the rights of married women, the question pending at the time of adjournment being the amendment of the gentleman from Hendricks (Mr. Nave) to the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Holman).

Mr. STEELE. I always experience a feeling of diffidence, sir, in addressing the Convention, and that feeling is greatly increased on the present occasion, in having to follow the eloquent addresses that have been made on the propositions now under consideration.

The highest encomium, sir, that can be passed upon women, is to portray in their true colors the extraordinary care and love that mothers have for children.

In this respect woman's labor never ceases; and I would here say to this Convention, that the highest tribute of gratitude I can offer to the matron that raised me, is to shield and protect her. I believe that on her teachings of virtue and wisdom my welfare and stability is mainly dependent. When a boy, from the lips of a mother I first heard the doctrines of righteousness and sobriety. She it was who instilled in my mind the necessity of seeking first that wisdom that is first pure, then peaceable and easy to be entreated of, that cometh down from above, from the Father of light in whom is no variableness or shadow of turning. It is not only in the particular labor of care and love for her offspring, but also in the domestic labors of life that she knows no day of rest. On the first day of the week, the day called the Sabbath, that is set apart for rest and on which we males can rest, still the watchful eye and the quick-moving hand of our companions find necessary and useful employment. How arduous are her duties in the care of her offspring and how much more fatiguing are her household labors! And yet, will gentlemen pretend that she is not to receive an equal protection in regard to her rights in property to that afforded to the male, her companion? I find there are some here who are disposed to deny the female her rights of property. The fact of her industry and economy in the household, thereby augmenting the means of the husband, seems to be entirely overlooked by gentlemen, and in view of all the duties she so faithfully discharges in the capacity of wife and mother it is gravely proposed to allow her on the decease of her husband only one-third of the rents and profits of his real estate—this, too, of the very property she has so assiduously aided in accumulating. I have never yet learned, sir, how this principle or law came into existence. I know that it is argued by commentators that the divine law has much to do with common law, much to do with statutory law, but I am as equally satisfied that this one-third distribution of property to the female never, never had its origin in divine law—never. For when we examine this law, when we make reference to that which is divine, we find no distinction of this kind made therein. There can be no distinction, sir, in the great country to which we are going, and for which our friend from Shelby (Mr. Vanbenthuyssen) left yesterday. Our brother will find there the true equality—that male and female stand strictly on the same footing. He with all the blood-washed throng are even now tuning their golden harps, in praises to the One who has taught them the law of the equality of all men. That, sir, is the position every human creature occupies in that kingdom; and how this law apportioning to the hard-working and industrious wife but one-third portion of the rents and profits of her husband's estate originated and where it came into existence is more than I am able to say.

In regard to the section presented by the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) I have heard sundry insinuations as to the motives which influenced the gentleman in presenting them; one of these motives which inferentially were ascribed to him was, that the effect of them would be to create discord and contention between the husband and wife. Now, sir, I am fully satisfied that no such motive actuated the gentleman from Posey in bringing forward these sections. On the contrary, I am satisfied that he presented them with a view mainly of bettering the condition of the wife after the death of her husband. I know that the conjugal bond should be one of principle; that each of the partners to the bond should enter into it from principle. I know also that affection and not property should be the incentive as well as the cement of that union; and that in a union thus formed from principle and based upon affection, what is the property of one will be the property of the other. And gentlemen I trust will remember that there is one class of married people that live in common upon all they possess—the gentleman's pocket-book being the lady's pocket-book, and the lady's pocket-book being the gentleman's pocket-book, and thousands of dollars are thus mutually exchanged and applied for the benefit of both, and for the benefit of their offspring. To this class of the community the proposition of the gentleman is not intended to apply, if I understand it correctly. He knows that with them all is well. But allow me to remark, sir, that there is an old and a good maxim, that laws are not introduced for the good—they are competent to govern themselves and do so. They are introduced for the bad—for those that do wrong. And this is the case with the gentleman from Posey; he introduced these sections for the express purpose of protecting the weak against the strong.

There can be no doubt, sir, that there are thousands of instances where these wrongs upon women have been deliberately practiced. Instances, hundreds of them present themselves to my mind where overtures have been made to obtain a wife, when money alone was the object. And, sir, not only has the sole object of the overtures made been the money, but the person himself making the overtures was a profligate, a gambler, a spendthrift, or an intemperate man, whose sole object was to obtain wealth that he might give free scope to his passions. Now if I understand the proposition contained in these sections offered by the gentleman from Posey, it is to guard against this robber—this swindler. It is to protect the female in her rights and the rights of her children, from these wonton despoilers, who would trifle with, and blast, the affections of tender-hearted women, for the purpose of obtaining means for the gratification of their unholy and sensual propensities. This, sir, is the object of the proposition of the gentleman from Posey, and if he is to bear reproach in this matter, I, for one, sir, will willingly bear it with him within and without the camp.

Let us recollect, gentlemen, that females appreciate liberty of conscience and action as much as we do, and more particularly in regard to this point. Gentlemen will remember of reading how when the father of our country, the great and noble Washington, was traveling through a certain town, that the ladies residing there, came out and built an archway of flowers over a bridge that he had to pass over, and strewed flowers in the pathway before him. They, sir, evidenced by their conduct, that they appreciated the liberty which he had been mainly instrumental in procuring for this country, and that they desired to give him some public testimony of the esteem in which they held him. Recollect, too, the conduct of the ladies during the siege of New Orleans. And gentlemen go too far, also, when they pretend to think and say that in point of mental development and strength of mind the female is vastly inferior to man. To prove the injustice of this assertion allow me for a moment to refer to the history of the past. I need go no further than to exhibit to you the enterprise of Queen Isabella in assisting Columbus in his dangerous expedition to the New World. Where would this country have been if it had not been for the enterprise of that lady? Would we have been sitting in deliberate bodies now—would we have been sitting in Congress and in Legislatures? This country would perhaps have been yet lying among the worlds unknown, and overrun with the wild men of the woods—the aborigines of America. While speaking of this lady allow me for a moment in her case, to consider the argument which is advanced that the proposition of the gentleman from Posey, will create discord between husband and wife. I think that upon referring to the history of their reign that, Ferdinand and Isabella held different estates. It bears upon my mind that at the time of Isabella's marriage to Ferdinand, that she owned the estate of Castile. They held different estates, yet they were used for the interest and advantage of both. Another item which presents itself in connection with the history of Queen Isabella, is the great influence the Queen exerted herself. At the siege of Grenada, at the time when King Ferdinand was at war with the Moors, and after he had been driven back with great loss to his army, the Queen joined him and when she was seen at the head of the army with her husband, the Capitol of the Moors fell without any difficulty.

My attention was drawn, sir, to some remarks in relation to ducking scolding women. In accordance with this recipe, I suppose we will have to take the ladies to the White River, or to the Walsh, to prevent them from expressing their sentiments in regard to other restrictions we have placed upon their rights [applause]. Well, sir, the ladies know their rights and I trust will stand up for them; and it is our duty to give them their rights, and for one I would go on extending their privileges. By the proposition now before us, we shall give them the right of holding their own personal property, which is, perhaps, more necessary to a woman on her second marriage than during her first. I believe this will be one of the results of this measure—that it will shield and protect the female from wrong at the time of her second marriage. I have noticed in those sections, that provision is made to the effect that the property accruing to the wife from the death of her first husband, upon her second marriage, goes directly to the first husband's offspring; thus the widow, upon entering into a second marriage, cannot hazard the estate procured by her labors, and those of her first husband. This is a very good provision indeed. The gentleman from Posey, by these sections, asks no more than the principle of equity and common sense proclaim to the world should be given to the woman. He asks no more for the woman than her natural rights. When we speak of married life, we speak of it as a partnership, and some gentleman remarked that a married couple were twain and one flesh. This is all very well in theory; but I would ask if they are one in the politics of the country?

Are they one here to-day in this Convention? Have we any ladies sitting in the seats here? Are they one at the ballot-box? Are they one in purse? No, sir, take gentlemen in the common run, and you will find that they have their purses in their pockets, and they distribute their money as their caprice may dictate to them, while at the same time the lady may be asking and even begging for a solitary dollar, wherewith to purchase some necessary article for the household. To-morrow, says the gentleman, I will accommodate you. I am short to-day. I have to buy some land or some goods, and the cry is repeated "to-morrow, to-morrow I will give you some"—and she never gets any [great laughter and applause].

Gentlemen, I would be truly glad did my lungs permit me further to address you on this occasion. What I say to you to-day has been impressed upon my mind by the experience of the past. It will be recollected that I have already offered a resolution asking for one right to be granted to the females of this country, that of petition equally with males to every department of our government. And then, if at any future time they desire to have the right of suffrage extended to them, they can, through the medium of petitions, bring out the action of the people's representatives on the subject. Too long, Mr. President, have the interests of women been neglected. Too long have their political and social rights been trampled under foot. The first in every good work—in the cause of temperance, patient, yet arduous laborers—in the work of moral reform, always engaged—why not give to woman those privileges that will prove in their exercise of as much benefit to the male as to the female. With these remarks, Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. TAGUE. I had no intention, Mr. President, of speaking upon this subject until some few minutes since, when at the request of several of the members, I consented to present some views of the question which the experience of a somewhat lengthened life, has impressed upon my mind. I feel it a privilege, sir, to state that I am willing to go as far as the farthest in adopting measures for ameliorating and improving the condition of the female sex; and the experience of the past is a safe guide to us in adopting such measures. The gentleman from Wabash, who just addressed the Convention, is somewhat older than I am, and I have no doubt that he has learned much in consequence. I myself have lived long, and I trust have learned something in that life, and, though I may not express the views that experience and observation has impressed upon my mind in as clear and satisfactory manner as other members can, yet if I can have the attention of the Convention I will make some few remarks [cries of "consent," "consent"].

It is from woman that man in his infancy is taught the lessons of wisdom and virtue that guide and influence the course of his whole future life. It is from woman that man in his prime receives the consolation, and sympathy, and love that nerves him to the faithful performance of the part he has to play in the great theater of life. It is from woman that man in declining life, when old age and its infirmities creep on apace, when he is tossed upon the couch of pain, receives the care and attention that assuages the hours of suffering, and smooths his pathway to the grave. How cheering to the husband or father when returning from his daily toil to meet the kind greetings of his beloved partner and prattling children. I have raised a family, sir, and from blissful experience can testify to the truth of what I have stated, for I have been a recipient of those smiles, a partaker of woman's joys. I have been too, sir, in families where the sweet smile and the kind word were not seen or heard; where the husband was met with cross looks and short words, and moved through his house with forbidding or melancholy mein, a stranger to the felicities of the happy conjugal relation.

I have to say, sir, with relation to this subject, that the views of my friend from Wabash, (Mr. Steele,) and my friend from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) do not run in the same channel with my own. I do not favor, sir, the proposition which, in an indirect way, they appear to countenance, of giving to women the right of suffrage, as one means of improving her condition. I have traveled a great deal, sir, in the various States of the Union, and I think the females of this State are about as happy and contented with their present position in relation to this right as it is necessary they should be. I have heard of no complaints from them in regard to it. This subject was a topic of considerable discussion in my own county during the canvass, and I took occasion while electioneering to converse with many old ladies in regard to it. I sometimes had the pleasure of meeting with some ten or a dozen of them, and the old ladies, without any exception, told me as far as they were concerned, to leave the right of suffrage just as it now was. It is true some of the young ladies, however, seemed a little anxious to go up to the court house and vote. [Great laughter and applause.] I tried to inform myself as to the opinions of my constituents on the subject because I supposed there was every probability of there being some action had upon it here, and from inquiry and observation I feel that to carry out the wishes of my constituents, both male and female, I must vote against engrafting any thing in the Constitution relative to the subject.

With regard to the propositions reported from the committee on rights and privileges relative to the rights of married women to property, I have only to say that an article has been engrafted into the Constitution of Louisiana similar in character to the present one, and from a practical acquaintance with the condition of the females of that State—having traveled through the larger portion of it, and become familiar with its institutions, to a certain degree—I consider that the condition of the females of this State, living under the provisions of the old Constitution, is far superior to the condition of the ladies of Louisiana under the newly created provisions of the Constitution of that State, in regard to the rights and privileges of married women. In intelligence, in beauty, and in their lasting friendship, also, I consider our ladies are their superiors. [Great applause.] From the little observation I have made, sir, I think the people of Louisiana have run wild in error in adopting an article like the present one; though I would remark, it is a new thing, and time may prove the propriety and necessity of its adoption.

At present, sir, I cannot but think that should this article be inserted in the Constitution, you will find in less than five years there will be ten applications for bills of divorcement to where is one now. I have had the honor of a seat, sir, upon the bench as associate judge, and in that capacity have received numerous applications for bills of divorcement, and I have always been opposed to granting those bills except in particular cases, which I will not mention. [Great laughter.] Experience has taught me, sir, that the more we can unite the male and the female, the better it will be for both [great merriment], and the happier will be the female. [Boisterous laughter and applause.]

I trust gentlemen will hold themselves in a little. [The Hall here resounded with the laughter and applause of the members.]

THE PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Hancock cannot be heard if members do not desist from making so much noise. [Cries of "order," "order," and "consent," "consent."]

MR. TAGUE. As I was about remarking, sir, when somewhat unceremoniously interrupted by some of my fellow-members, I think that this Convention had better leave this subject as it is now under the present Constitution. It appears to me that the provisions of that instrument on the subject are as near right as they can well be made, and that the people are fully satisfied with them. As I before stated, I am opposed to granting bills of divorcement except in extreme cases. I think the tendency of our laws should be to unite the interests of the husband and wife in one common bond. It will be recollected that the Scriptures inform us that upon a certain occasion our Saviour was asked his opinion in regard to this matter of bills of divorcement, and that he appeared to be opposed to it, and expressed Himself to the effect that although Moses, under the old dispensation, had granted them, and God had suffered these things to take place in that age, yet, under the new dispensation, and at that more enlightened day, He could not countenance them.

It is my opinion, Mr. President, that, if we give to married women the right of a separate interest, as proposed in this article, many of them would refuse to avail themselves of it. There might be some few who would avail themselves of this right—who would assume the control of their property, but, I think there would not be many but that would be willing, for their own safety and happiness, to trust all their property, real and personal, in the hands of the husband: and I think, of course, that they would be safe in doing so: at least, I am prepared to say, that a woman should not consent to marry a man, with whom she would not be willing to trust her all. I am aware, Mr. President, that there may be isolated cases pointed out, where it would be occasionally necessary for the woman to have the control; but I think there are very few such cases. On the other hand, as the law now stands, females have right to property; that is, they have a joint right with their husbands.

I know that there are some men, who, when they get hold of a little property by marriage, convert it entirely to their own use, and take the sole control and management of it, without asking leave of the lady. This, in my judgment, is wrong; but I am of opinion that this matter can be regulated very well by the statute law, without placing any such provision, as we are now contemplating, in the organic law of the State.

I think, probably, it would be advisable and proper, where a man acquires property by marriage, always to take special care to call such property "our property," instead of saying "my property"—as though he would exclude the right of the woman entirely.—And here, Mr. President, comes in a little anecdote, which, although I am not in the habit of telling anecdotes, I will take the liberty to rehearse.

A gentleman was once married to a lady of considerable property, who was himself poor. Immediately after the marriage, he fixed his house up in fine order, selecting expensive furniture, and paying for it with the lady's money. Afterwards, upon a certain day, they had many visitors to call on them, and the husband was showing the furniture of the house, and everything that was splendid and valuable, in the equipage, with which he was furnished, and calling it all his own.—My fine side-board, my splendid carpet, &c.: and, no doubt, he did very wrong to talk in this way. Well, after the visitors had left, the lady took occasion to tell the husband that he should have said, "these are our things;" and not that "they are my things:" and there was certainly some justice and right in this appeal. But finally, they got into a quarrel, and then they got to fighting about the matter; and the lady happening to have more physical strength than the gentleman; she actually flogged him like all natur—[a laugh]—she got the advantage of him so far that she absolutely kicked him out of doors, and shut the door in his face. The gentleman, finding himself badly whipped, gathered himself up and sat upon a stump near by—(that is the way they tell the story). There he studied about the matter, and finally determined to leave the lady who had taken it upon herself to treat him so harshly. But how was he to proceed? He was kicked out of doors, and his hat was still in the house. He could not leave without his hat; so he marched up, cautiously, and slipped open the door, just far enough to speak to his conqueror, and, looking in timidly upon his wife, he ventured to say to her, "My dear, will you please to hand me our hat?" [Merriment.] Well, the manner of this salutation of her husband, rather pleased the lady. She was pleased with the idea of his coming over to her views, so far as to say "our;" and it put a smile upon her face; and, seeing a smile upon the face of his wife, the gentleman at once gave over his resolution to leave. And, from that day to this, (as the story concludes,) when speaking of anything pertaining to the common house-hold interest, he has never forgotten to say "our." [Renewed merriment.]

This, Mr. President, is the course for a man to pursue. He should not assume too much importance to himself. The ladies have their rights, and will enjoy them without putting anything at all in the Constitution. Men should naturally, and, if they estimate woman as they ought to, they will, always grant them all their rights.

The other day a gentleman on my right—[A voice—"name him!" Another voice—"Gibson!"]—I believe I cannot call his name, but he made a very fine speech entirely in favor of the article as originally reported to the Convention; and in that speech he alluded to the case of a widow marrying a widower—both parties having children, and the woman being possessed of property; he affirmed that in such a case, the moment these parties were married, every dollar of the property of the woman, according to the law, as it now stands, belonged to the man and to his children. But I take leave to differ with the gentleman here, although I know he is a lawyer, and a good one. I think there is no man who hears me but will admit that if this woman possesses any real estate, in such a case, it must eventually go to her first husband's children, and if she brings in any more personal property than what belongs to her, under the law, that excess, also, must go to the children of her first husband.

Mr. President, I am not in the habit of detaining the Convention long upon any question, and I do not intend to do so now. I will merely add, that there seems to be a tendency in the minds of gentlemen to go to extremes upon this subject. Extremes should always be avoided, especially upon a question of such importance as this. This is a matter which ought to be very carefully considered; and for my own part, if I can be satisfied, by the arguments of gentlemen, that the condition of the ladies can be bettered in any shape, by any action which can be taken here, I should be in favor of doing something in the case; otherwise I shall be compelled to vote against the section. I will now yield the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN next obtained the floor; but yielded immediately to

Mr. TAGUE, who desired to offer an amendment. He said: I also intended to propose an amendment. I offer the following as an amendment to the amendment.

The proposition was read by the Secretary, and it is as follows:

Strike out all after the word "State" in the first line of the second section, and insert, in lieu thereof, "thereby surrender themselves and all property, both real and personal, by them owned at the time of marriage, to those whom they wrong."

The PRESIDENT (Mr. Clark of Tippecanoe in the Chair). The Chair would inform the gentleman from Hancock that his amendment is out of order. There are already two amendments pending.

Mr. HOLMAN. At the instance of several gentlemen near me, I move that the Convention take a recess.

At the request of the gentleman from St. Joseph, (Mr. Colfax,) the motion was withdrawn.

Mr. COLFAX, rising to a privileged question, said, there is a member lately elected to the Convention, who is present. I would suggest the call of his county, and that he be now sworn in.

Mr. PETTIT. That is a privileged question, and it has precedence of all others.

By the direction of the Chair, the Secretary then called the county of Union.

BENJAMIN F. BROOKBANK, the delegate lately returned for said county, came forward to the Clerk's table, presented his credentials, received the oath at the hand of the delegate from Cass, (Judge Biddle,) and resumed his seat in the Convention, amidst cheering from the lobbies.

Mr. HOLMAN again moved that the Convention take a recess, which motion was agreed to.

The Convention took a recess till two o'clock P. M.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

The consideration of the special order was resumed, being the sections reported by the committee on rights and privileges, in relation to the rights of married women.

Mr. HOLMAN being entitled to the floor, addressed the Convention as follows:

MR. PRESIDENT: The just object of all government is to secure the happiness of the governed. The compact of society necessarily implies that every true interest of the individual citizen shall be secured; and the same compact only imposes upon the individual citizen the relinquishment of those natural rights, the exercise of which would be inconsistent with the rights of others. By a fundamental principle of a government like ours, "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" are declared to be the "inalienable and inherent" rights of the citizen; and the less those rights are limited and circumscribed by artificial rules of legislation, the more republican will be the form of government, as no principle is better established than that that government is the best which governs the least. The public relations of life, the acquisition of wealth, the struggle for place, reputation, and preferment, are not the relations, are not the pursuits, in which man's dearest interests are involved; and the right to pursue happiness in those relations, however valuable, is infinitely inferior to the just enjoyment of those rights that cluster around the cheerful fireside and sanctify the relations of home.

The public and rugged careers which are open to man may gratify his ambition or satiate his thirst for wealth, but they do not increase his capacity for happiness or impart to him the social virtues; it is only home and its sacred influences that soften down the asperities of his character, and render him at once a moral, social, and intellectual being. So far as relates to the public relations of man, all the varied features of government may be changed, the foundations of government may be overthrown and new elements of government substituted in their stead, and still the social system may remain unchanged; but once change these social relations, change those elements that enter into and compose the domestic relations of men, and sooner or later the whole fabric of society feels the effect. The changes may be gradual, yet sooner or later the whole fabric of society will feel the effects of those changes in elementary principles. The rock is not more certainly worn away by the constant dripping of the water, than that government itself, in all its relations, changes as you change the elementary principles of that government.

Sir, the social and domestic relations of life grow out of the nature and fitness of things; they are not so much the result of positive law as the natural blending together of the elements of the human character, and they change and mould themselves to the natural condition of man in his progress from one state of civilization to another. Human laws, as they operate on the general interests of mankind, may facilitate these changes as the necessary incidents, and yet the changes will be found to be more in form than in principle, and it may be doubted whether human legislation, by the adoption of artificial rules for the government of the social relations, can ever advance the true interests of life; for the social system, to be adapted to its object, must be natural and not artificial.

Laws are imperfect unless they conform to the natural fitness of things. Government, to be just, must protect the weak against the strong; yet, if, by a paramount law of nature, that result is produced, the human law in aid thereof may weaken, but cannot give it strength.

The social system under which we live is, to some extent, peculiar to the Anglo-Saxon race, and has existed in all its main features for centuries; and while that race has passed through all the grades of human existence—from the dark ages to the light of Christian civilization—from the reign of the elective king to that of the military despot—from the limited monarchy to the full recognition of human rights in a republican government—the relations of social and domestic life have remained the same, or at least only modified by the advancing state of civilization. In that social system, and in fact in all society where the Christian religion has shed its beneficent influence, woman is and always has been its chief ornament. While on the one hand, society has resulted from the peculiar position nature designed her to occupy, on the other, she is not only the chief ornament, but all of its features and peculiar characteristics result from, and are in consonance with the elements of her own character.

Around the home created by common law influences, all the endearments of life are gathered; even the felon flees to it as a city of refuge, and with a price upon his head, he lays it in safety on the bosom of his wife.

It has been asserted by gentlemen who have argued both sides of this question, that by the common law woman occupies an inferior position in society. With all due deference to the superior wisdom and sagacity of those gentlemen, I must be allowed to call that position in question. She does not occupy an inferior position, nor has she ever occupied that position under the common law since society has been enlightened by the influences of Christianity. Sir, place her on man's theatre of action, where masculine force of mind and physical vigor are necessary to success, and I admit her gentle nature sinks inferior to the struggle; place man, with his restless mind and brawny arm, in her sphere of action, and he sinks into a sickly effeminacy, unadorned by a single grace that clusters around her brow. In her peculiar sphere—which, in all the purer and holier attributes of the human mind, rises infinitely above the rougher theatre of man's achievements—she is not only his equal, but by the influences and appliances of her nature, she rises infinitely his superior. The position of the sex in society must be considered with reference to their respective characteristic attributes—the rough asperity and restless energies of the one, is met by the mild benevolence and gentle graces of the other. In her true sphere she is not inferior. The gnarled oak that stands upon the hill-top and bids defiance to the tempest, is not more perfect and not half so sweet, as the gentle flower that nestles on the verdant hill-side, and diffuses its sweetness to every passing breeze.

I have already remarked, Mr. President, that laws, to be just, and to accomplish the objects for which they were intended, must conform to the natural fitness of things, and that the rules of society, at least, mould themselves into a natural consonance with those by whom that society is formed. Nature designed the sexes to spheres naturally adapted to their respective characters: to man she has assigned the task of battling with the rougher elements—to throng the marts of trade, to venture on the perils of the deep in search of wealth, to witness scenes of carnage and tread the field of battle, to struggle in the path of statesmanship, and by years of honest labor, to win for himself and partner of his life, the comforts of declining age. Nature has so formed him, and he follows the law of his organization. The refined and nicer feelings of the woman shrink from the open struggle; she seeks the retirement of the social hearth, and cultivates the arts of peace; the natural tenderness of her nature prompts to deeds of charity and the kindly offices of life; home is the heaven of her affections, and she gathers around it the love, and harmony, and repose which form her very existence, and by her affection and the meekness of her love imparts to man whatever is lovely in his character, smoothes down the asperities of his restless mind, and almost stirs the divinity that sleeps within him. Such has nature formed her. He strives to attain his ends by the force of mind and physical effort; she, by the gentleness of her nature; he, like the meridian sun, by the blaze of his genius may enlighten—but may blight and wither; she, by the kindly charities of life, harmonizing and purifying the moral world around her; like the dews of heaven, that, falling unseen and unfelt, clothe the earth with verdure, she gives to life its charms, and when pure, like religion, and as its hand-maid sanctifies every condition, “ Restores once more fair Eden's faded bloom,

And flings hope's golden halo o'er the waste of life.”

Such, sir, are the characteristics of the sexes; such has nature formed them; such their natural harmony; and civilization and enlightened social life are the necessary results.

Is it wise, sir, in the statesman to destroy this fair proportion, or introduce a new element into the social system which even by possibility may destroy its perfect harmony?

For centuries, as I have already remarked, we and our ancestors have lived under the common law, modified and changed as the experience of time has suggested proper. In every State of this Union, in which the Anglo-Saxon race have laid the foundations of government, the rule of the common law, as it regards the relation of husband and wife, has been recognized, and has been from time immemorial, and still is, the law of that country from which, as a nation, we have sprung.

I call that a law by which the domestic relations of life have been governed. It is a law without the force of human legislation; for it adapts itself to the very fitness of things, and is necessarily adapted to the relation which the husband and wife hold to each other. Sir, what is that law? So far as it affects the subject under consideration, that law is, that marriage is a sacramental ordinance, and not a mere matter of contract. Its design is—and such are its effects—that every interest of the husband and wife, and even their legal existence, is blended together in one harmonious union; no discordant interest is left to disturb the concord of the domestic circle; the husband becomes the head of the family—the peculiar guardian of all its interests; the domestic circle, the household cares, and the varied offices of home, are presided over by the wife; he, in his department, rules by the law of nature that adapts him to the station; and she in hers, by the same law, and by a law higher than all human laws—the law of human affection—she controls and directs the whole. I would remark, that, for the purposes of the subject now under consideration, it matters not what are the effects of marriage as to the disposition of property. The real question is, not what interest the wife shall take in the property of the husband in the event of a dissolution of the marriage contract—that is a matter of mere legislation, and does not affect the principle—but the question is, shall the sanctity of the marriage relation remain as it is!—shall the domestic harmony continue!—or shall new elements be cast into the social system, which may by possibility produce strife and disunion in all the dearest and best relations of society? The elements which enter into and compose the harmony of the domestic circle are a unity of affection and a unity of interest. Not only is it necessary for the happiness of that relation that the natural affections of the two parties should be blended together, but it is also necessary that their interests should be one and the same. If you separate the interest in property, you at least sever one of the links in that union. Individual happiness and prosperity constitute the happiness and prosperity of a nation. The State is, to a certain degree, interested in every marriage that may occur within her borders; and she is equally interested that every marriage relation that may exist should remain permanent, if for no other reason than that the dissolution of the marriage contract, otherwise than by the decease of one or the other of the parties, cannot tend to promote morality, foster patient industry, or in any way to advance the true interests of society.

It would be well for gentlemen who are advocating the proposition now before the Convention for the creation of separate interests in the husband and wife, to consider how far the weakening of the relation between husband and wife, by destroying that unity of interest, may tend to render divorces necessary for the protection of the separate interests in property. [Cries of "hear! hear!"] The gentleman from Clark, (Mr. Gibson,) on yesterday, in his very able and brilliant effort in defence of women's rights—and I take occasion to say here, that I do not believe there is a gentleman on this floor who would seek for a moment to diminish, even to the tithe of a hair, any of her just rights—I say the gentleman from Clark, in his very brilliant speech, spoke of the common law as an "infamous system," so far as regards the marriage relation. Let me ask that gentleman, does he propose to destroy the common law as it affects the relation of marriage? Does he propose to destroy the entire system of common law under which we and our forefathers have lived and prospered, or only to a limited extent to change the relations by which society is governed? I have already remarked that the laws which govern the private relations of life necessarily result from the character of those by whom that society is formed; and I think that if the common law is entirely adapted to the natural state of society, the change of that law may tend to destroy that perfect harmony and peace which should reign in the domestic circle. It is a principle of the common law, that not only are the interests of the husband and wife identical—not only is his wealth her wealth—his happiness her happiness—his property her property—but so sacred is that relation regarded, so intimately does the common law blend their interests together, that the husband cannot be a witness for the wife, nor the wife for the husband nor against him, except on a charge of personal violence committed by him upon herself. That same law, in carrying out the idea of the sanctity of the marriage contract, has provided that a man's home shall be his castle, and that no foot shall intrude within its walls without his consent. And, let me ask, does the gentleman from Clark propose to do away with that feature of the common law? Are these sacred principles to be abrogated—repealed—destroyed—for the mere purpose of making laws to regulate property? [Hear! hear!]

Sir, you cannot protect property without law, and without also adopting some rule of human evidence by which those rights of property can be protected and enforced. [Applause.] Does the gentleman propose to secure for the wife a separate property, and at the same time for the purpose of protecting that property does he propose to destroy that feature of the common law which provides that the one cannot testify for or against the other?

Sir, let us consider the object of all three of these principles I have mentioned. First, that the interests of the husband and the wife are identical; secondly, being identical, no element should exist which might by possibility destroy that identity; and thirdly, protecting the sacredness of home, that every man's house is sacred to himself and family against the whole world, without his consent.

Now to allow the wife to become a witness against the husband, might not only by possibility destroy that entire confidence which should exist in that relation, but in all human probability it would do so. At all events it would have a tendency to create distrust, and would undoubtedly produce coldness of feeling, the first step towards a final alienation of affection. [Cries of "hear," "hear," "hear" and "true."] So would it be if you permitted the husband to testify against the wife. The rule would work with equal fatal results in both cases. For the purpose therefore of retaining that perfect identity of interest and that entire harmony that should exist between the parties, the common law has provided, although those three rules may in some cases operate injuriously to every other interest of society, and although a citizen's rights may be seriously affected by not allowing the wife to testify against the husband—yet in spite of all the inconveniences which might result from it, the common law has provided, that never shall the sanctity of the domestic relation be disturbed or weakened, that the lesser good of the public convenience shall yield to the greater good of domestic harmony; and as I remarked a few moments ago, I presume that the creation of separate interests in property would, by a parity of reasoning, require that those other peculiar rules of the common law should be abandoned, and this might result in weakening every tie of social life.

The peculiar adaptedness of the common law to the domestic relations of society grows out of the peculiar position in which nature has placed the two sexes, and the peculiar relative duties and positions for which nature has designed them. It cannot be contended for a moment, that in the natural fitness of things the husband and the wife are adapted to the same pursuits, or that their relative positions in life could be changed without manifest disregard to the law of human organization. Sir, should the wife throw off those restraints which delicacy impose upon her? Should she enter into the open struggles of life independently of her husband? Should she enter into the marts of trade and the pursuits of wealth? Should she direct the intricate and selfish pursuits of commerce? Should she sit as an adviser in the cabinet, or stand unblanched upon the field of battle? Should she feel the malice, heart-burning and jealousies of political aspirations? No, sir; every man's—every true woman's heart would revolt at the very idea of subjecting the purity of her character to such contaminating influences. Sir, if woman did enter into these pursuits, could it be hoped for a moment that, contrary to the influences which operate upon man, she would come out of the struggle as pure, as affectionate, as devoted to those domestic duties which are so essentially hers, as she would by continuing in the position which she now fills, and for which by nature she is designed? would the purity of her character continue to shine like the drifted snow, untinged by the debasements of her pursuits? Far, far from it. He is dead to manly feelings who would wish to see woman, with all her refined sensibilities, with the untold treasures that cluster around her virtuous pathway through life, subjected to the severe ordeal which, in spite of the allurements of her virtues, and the more unpliant elements of his character, even man escapes not without pollution. No, sir; if the wife leaves her home and the duties and social relations which cluster around it, let it still be as now, to feed the hungry, console the afflicted and pour the balm of consolation into the wounded spirit; let her still return to that home, as the dove to the ark, bearing with her the olive branch of hope; let her draw around that home the charmed circle within which the vicious and depraved passions of life cannot enter; let her illuminate it with her smiles and sanctify it by the purity of her affections.

It has been very justly remarked, both by the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) and the gentleman from Clarke, (Mr. Gibson,) that woman is infinitely better—that she is infinitely purer than man—that in all the elements of purity and holiness and goodness, she is infinitely his superior. Now, will gentlemen stop for a moment to consider what it is that produces this result, and how it occurs in the fitness of things that she is not only purer in herself, but that she remains so? Can gentlemen imagine for a moment, that if you change her position, if you subject her to the temptation that surround the male sex, that the nicer feelings of her nature would be less easily subdued by the corrupting influences of life, than those of man? Sir, his nature is more unbending than hers, and if either the one or the other of them would be subject to those corrupting influences which are apt to encircle the pathway of human life, her gentle, unsuspecting nature would be much more likely to yield to them than his. There is not, I am sure, a man in the country, no man who has been reared under the beneficial influences of the Christian religion, who would be willing to see women subjected to those temptations which even man's stern nature cannot always resist. You would not wish to see her transformed into a Shylock, by the selfish pursuits of life, exacting the pound of flesh, but rather you would delight to see her in her true character, like the gentle Portia, pleading for mercy and the alleviation of human suffering.

But it is said by the gentleman from Posey, that he does not purpose to go so far with this reform, but simply to change the law as it regards the relations of property. This, I contend, is only restricting the principle to certain limits, which, if extended to the limits I have named, must inevitably produce the most disastrous results.

The gentleman from Posey has remarked that the question under consideration is one of momentous import. Sir, every question which even remotely affects the well-being of society in its more general features, is a matter of importance; but how infinitely more important, sir, is every measure which, by human possibility, may disturb the very elements on which society itself and the happiness of mankind rests for existence? Sir, as I have already remarked, the happiness and prosperity of individuals constitute the happiness and prosperity of the State; and, sir, if you would wish to have a State happy and prosperous, and possessed of all those influences which elevate and ennoble the human character, you must first of all do whatever can be done to create prosperous and happy homes. [Applause.]

Mr. President, there are two systems of laws which have prevailed in the different portions of the civilized world, on which the light of Christianity has shed its benign influence. These two systems are the common and the civil law. It has been justly remarked that the common law prevails only in the United States and in England. The civil law originated in Rome in an early period of her history, and has prevailed in Italy, Spain, France, Portugal, and Holland for centuries past. It is at this time the law of Mexico and of the South American States. The civil law doctrine in reference to marriage also prevails in the States of Louisiana and Texas and California, as elementary principles of government, and features of this kind have been incorporated with their respective Constitutions. It may be remarked, however, that in California and in Texas this doctrine prevailed when these two States were still a portion of the territory of Mexico. In Louisiana, the civil law was introduced by the early French inhabitants from their native land.

I have stated, sir, the common law relation of marriage. Its principle is, to secure the happiness and prosperity of home, by blending together all of its interests, all of its hopes, all of its affection, all of its elements in one harmonious union; marriage itself a sacramental ordinance, and the public interests of society yielding to its sanctity. By the civil law, marriage is a matter of contract, a partnership, interests in property separate, and the public convenience yielding nothing to the harmony of the domestic union.

It is said, sir, on Divine authority, in judging of the characters of men, "by their fruits ye shall know them." The same Divine rule will equally apply to the judgment of principles. By their fruits, by their effects, by their results, ye shall know them.

Sir, what have been the fruits of these two systems of laws in the different countries in which they have prevailed? Will any man compare the condition of men in France, Spain, Italy, Portugal, Holland, or the South American States and Mexico, with the condition of society in England or the United States of America? Sir, will any man compare the elevated social condition of women in these countries, to their condition in those countries in which the common law system prevails, as the rule by which the marriage relations are to be governed? I presume not. And, sir, what is the reason that in the different countries of continental Europe, and those portions of the American continent where the civil law prevails, that there is not that degree of moral, intellectual, and social enjoyment which we find in the United States and in England? Why is there less enjoyment, less happiness, and less prosperity in these countries than in those where the common law prevails? By their fruits ye shall know principles; it is an intrinsic defect in the system. Sir, I have remarked that if you would have a happy and prosperous country, you must have happy and prosperous homes. There are no homes in Italy; none in France, or Spain, or Portugal. Such a divine relation is not known in any of the South American States. In Mexico it has never had an existence.

Sir, would you compare the purity and sanctity of a home in our beloved State, to the licentious and venal partnership created by the civil law in Mexico or France? It is only, sir, in the United States and the British Isle you find homes with their endearments and varied ties, which produce those happy fruits we witness in our own and our mother land. The gentleman from Clark (Mr. Gibson) has said, that in the higher, wealthier circles of England, the common law, as it affects the relations of marriage, scarcely has an existence, and that, in fact, it only prevails in all of its effects in the United States. I am willing to concede the correctness of the position, for the gentleman tells us that anti-nuptial contracts almost always precede marriage among the wealthier classes in England, superseding to a very great extent the simple rules of the common law governing the domestic relations. It will be remembered, that the wealthier classes in England compose but a handful, in comparison with the great body of her population; and I venture the assertion, that it is not in those wealthier classes of society where interests in property are protected by artificial and complicated rules, by trust estates, marriage contracts, and all the intricate regulations of aristocratic society, that the greatest degree of social or moral happiness is enjoyed. No: it is in the unpretending homes, blessed with a unity of hearts and interests, that real happiness is found. Then, sir, meeting the question fairly, the civil law as it relates to marriage, and the artificial rules adopted in the more aristocratic society in England for the regulation of marriage relations, are the same. They spring from the same causes, and produce the same results; for the civil law is well adapted to the luxurious tastes, pampered appetites, and wealth-protecting interests of an aristocratic government. But how illy, sir, is it adapted to the simple republicanism of our own institutions.

The refined niceties of the civil law, as it affects the conjugal relations, only became perfect in Rome, as the general elements of that law ripened into that perfection that first produced the Imperial crown, and afterwards the utter dissolution of her Empire. While the plain republicanism of the Romans continued, a few simple rules, drawn from the laws of the twelve tables, were sufficient. The peculiar features of that law affecting marital rights, as it now exists, did not then exist. But when the refinements and luxuries of life crept in, and those influences which ultimately resulted in the overthrow of that nation were brought to bear upon their institutions, then the refinements of the civil law in reference to their domestic relations began to assume their form and character. That law may do well enough for the protection of wealth, but not for the promotion of happiness.

And, sir, it is well for the statesman to consider the ultimate tendency of principles, and more especially those that affect the immediate interests of society; the instability and final overthrow of nations may be traced oftener to the effects produced by apparently unimportant elementary principles, than to the force of external influences. Greece had fallen before Philip of Macedon invaded her territory; the liberties of Rome were gone before Cæsar crossed the Rubicon; the vital energies of Venice and Genoa were weakened by internal causes ere an external force produced their destruction. Sir, the history of the past teaches us to look wisely to the tendency of elementary principles; adopt one, others follow in natural succession.

Our country is different from any of the continental States of Europe. It is different from England. We are not so much interested in protecting the rich as we are in the advancement of the interests of the poor—because, in one sense of the word, in our country we are all poor, and our equality in wealth is the great source of our security as a nation. The rich, as was very properly observed by a gentleman upon this floor when another subject was under discussion, are able to protect themselves so far as property is concerned, and they may do it, if they please, at the expense of their social and domestic happiness. The gentleman then tells us that the policy adopted in England, of creating marriage settlements, carries out in effect, the same policy that is laid down by the civil law. Then, sir, we understand the effects of the two systems. Where property is to be protected by marriage contracts—that is contracts entered into previous to marriage—and where property is secured to the wife as a separate interest under the civil law—the same object is sought for, and the same end is obtained; and I will venture to say that in England, following the natural current of things in the higher circles of society, there is the same disorganization, the same want of peace, and the same absence of domestic joys and virtues that is found in countries where the civil law prevails. I ask gentlemen, therefore, to stop and consider for one moment, whether it is the interest and the policy of a plain republican government like ours, that wealth should be secured in the hands of a few, that a system corresponding with the system to which the gentleman refers, should be adopted?

I hold in my hand Justinian's Institutes, the elements of the civil law, and I find in the volume a note upon this very subject.

The note claims for its author Cooper, who is the author of the translation. I will read it:

"I am well aware," says the translator, in speaking of marriage, "that different states of civilization require different principles of legislation on this, as well as on every other subject; that the considerations arising from the institutions of hereditary rank, the privileges of primogeniture, and the importance attached to accumulated property, may require the admission of marriage settlements, jointures, trust-estates, and most of the many other complicated regulations which crowd the law books of England; but I know of no state of society in which the laws ought to weaken the public sentiment of the indissolubility of the marriage contract, unless upon urgent necessity grounded on facts judicially established. But to sanction the foresight of adultery, cruelty, or desertion, upon the very face of the marriage contract, is to sanction the crimes themselves."

Now, sir, let me ask, is the system to prevail that the parties are to sit down and provide beforehand as if in distrust of the harmony of the union, how money or property shall be disposed of in the event of a dissatisfaction with the marriage relation? Are such to be the public tendencies? Why, sir, this is doing the very same thing which the civil law does in all instances where contracts of marriage are formed. Our author tells us that it is guarding against the effects of crime, cruelty, and desertion, by an early distrust of the harmony of the union, and that guard is, in my humble opinion, a primary step if not to encourage it, at least to sanction it. There is an argument in favor of the present common law doctrine founded on the nature of our institutions. A republican government requires different laws from those required under the complicated machinery of a monarchy, or under a government under which property is accumulated in the hands of a few instead of being, as it ought to be, distributed in the hands of many. In Great Britain it is necessary that many laws should exist for the protection of the mere rights of primogeniture, which are not required in the United States, for the purpose simply of regulating the law of descent. It has been well said that that government, is the best which governs the least, and where every right is protected by plain, simple, and direct legislation. The institution of marriage by the common law is a plain simple matter, unattended by any of the complicated machinery that surrounds the civil law. Upon this subject I wish to read an extract from Kent's Commentaries:

"As evidence of the immense importance which, in every age, has been attached to this subject, we may refer to the Roman law where this title occupies two entire books in the Pandects, and the better part of the fifth book of the code. Among the modern civilians, Dr. Taylor devotes upwards of one-sixth part of his whole work on the Elements of the Civil Law to the article of marriage," and "Pothier, who has examined, in thirty-one volumes, the whole immense subject of the municipal law of France, which has its foundation principally laid upon the civil law, devotes six entire volumes to the law of the matrimonial state. Our law concerning marriage settlements appears, to us at least, to be quite simple when compared with the complicated regulations of the community or partnership system, between husband and wife, which prevails in many parts of Europe, as France, Spain, and Holland, and as also in the State of Louisiana."

Such is the opinion of Chancellor Kent as to the republican simplicity of the marriage relation by common law in comparison with the complicated and aristocratic refinements of the civil law.

Sir, it is proposed to destroy this simple system of the common law as it applies to marriage relations, and to substitute a principle which will have what effect? Why it will become necessary to pass innumerable laws to protect the wife's property. It will be requisite to make important innovations upon our present system; and instead of the plain and simple principles by which the marriage relation is governed, we shall have the complicated system which has prevailed in Rome, and in other countries of Europe.

I am, therefore, opposed to the proposition as it is embraced in the two sections which are now under discussion, upon two grounds—mainly upon two grounds: First, because I think it must in the very nature of things tend to weaken the unity of the domestic relation of husband and wife; and secondly, that it will tend to build up, and foster, and cherish, a complicated and refined system of society amongst us. I hold in my hand the code of Napoleon, containing some four or five hundred pages. If the gentleman wishes to see how far that doctrine will lead, let him examine that code. It is said to be more complete than the civil law upon which it is founded, and yet, perhaps, one entire third of that volume is devoted to securing and protecting the various rights which are the necessary result of the position in which the proposition now before the Convention would place the husband and wife. A plain and simple form of government is best adapted to the genius of our people, and, as I believe, best calculated to produce the happiness of society. The more natural the rules by which society is regulated the more simple they are, and the more beneficial in their effects. The amendment which I have offered as a substitute for the two sections, proposes to secure to the wife the use and the profits of her real estate. I cannot see how, by possibility, the possession of that interest could disturb the harmony of the domestic circle to any extent. The effect of the proposition would be, not to give her the control of the property, but to secure it for her benefit. If the marriage contract should be dissolved, either by the death of the husband or by divorce, the wife will then have the patrimony which she received from her father, or any real estate she may have acquired from any other source. She has that at once as a home for herself and her children.

But the gentleman from Posey tells us that the object of the sections which he proposes, is to protect the wife against a bad husband. But let us consider for a moment whether the change may not produce more evil than good. No man can doubt that by possibility, this weakening of the domestic relations, by creating separate estates, may, in the course of time, produce very bad results. It may not produce them now. Society does not change at once. Fifty years or a century may roll on before the true bearings of this law could be fully ascertained under a government like ours—the stubborn influences of the common law may remain for years. But once change an elementary principle of society, and although it may be slow in its effects, those effects will most assuredly come. The gentleman tells us that the object of his proposition is to protect the wife against a bad husband; but he does not propose that the wife shall have the whole control of her property, and the right to manage it in every respect, but he proposes that the husband shall administer the affairs of the wife in the character of a trustee.

As a matter of course, the husband acquires possession of the wife's property—for when two hearts are first blended together in the marriage relation, the wife would undoubtedly yield all into the husband's hands. Well, as I have said, the husband acquires possession of her property as trustee. She does not go to the bank to see whether her money is there; she has confidence in her husband. She does not go into the fields for the purpose of looking after the stock, nor does she take journeys from home for the purpose of examining into the products of her estates. They all come under the control of the husband; and if he is dishonest, where is the difficulty of appropriating that property to his own use, and as he may think proper? But look at the result of it. He is not really the owner of that property, but he has the control and management of it. The wife is conscious of the fact that that property is hers, and that although the husband is her trustee, he has no right to use her property for any purpose: he knowing this, and knowing that that feeling may exist in her breast, the feelings of love that once existed, are in a measure weakened by, perhaps, mutual distrust. If the wife, as matters now stand, feels that she surrenders all into the hands of her husband, and that in the event of the dissolution of the marriage contract by death, or otherwise, she has a little home which she has inherited from her father or her mother, she can be secure in her happiness, so far as being above the fear of want can make her so, and still each tie of affection remain unbroken. While, then, she surrenders all into the hands of her husband, she looks to him for support and consolation, she looks to his industry and perseverance and love of home, for all her happiness. His love of his fireside, his wife, and his children, are all his earthly enjoyment. Then the husband manages the domestic interests, justly influenced by no feeling save the feelings of a manly heart. The evils which the gentleman would seek to remedy, will, as now, seldom exist.

Now, I would ask any lawyer, or any thinking man in this body, to consider what would be the result of the adoption of this principle so far as the necessary incidental legislation is concerned? We are proposing to simplify legislation, we are proposing to abandon many of the old doctrines of the common law, and substitute therefor some other simpler rules for the administration of justice. Say that we accomplish it; here is a new field opened for legislation, and in less than fifty years, perhaps in less than twenty years, a hundred pages will not contain the elementary principles alone, which will have to be laid down for the purpose of protecting the interest involved in the propositions.

Then, I take it that if the husband is to be the administrator—and that he is to be, I think is very evident from the gentleman's position—he will have the control of the wife's personal estate, and may dispose of it to his own use.

If he is a dishonest man he will do so, and that, too, much sooner than if he regarded the property as his own. When once you place restraints upon men, they are very apt to break through them and do acts which they would never contemplate if those restraints did not exist. Find me the man who is inclined to disregard the moral promptings of honesty, and let him feel that he has the control and management of property which is not his own, and there is a strong temptation raised to appropriate it to his own purposes, which would not exist if he felt that it was his, and that it was to the best interests of his wife and children, that it should be appropriated to the best ends.

Sir, if there is a single kindly impulse in the husband's heart, it is brought into active force, when he remembers that the partner of his bosom has surrendered all into his hands; her hopes, her happiness, every interest of her life; that his joys are her joys; his griefs her griefs; his prosperity her prosperity: that she leans alone upon his bosom for comfort and consolation. Sir, if there is a spark of the divinity within him, it will kindle into the true impulses of manhood; yes, in the language of Indiana's gifted poetess, if

"Thoughts of her, the loved, who ever Made the sunlight of his home," stir not the better impulses of his heart, human laws will in vain strive for their object.

The gentleman from Clark (Mr. Gibson) undertakes to say, that, under the common law, women are the merest slaves of men. When the gentleman made this remark, I looked around, and, seeing the sparkling and gay countenances which surrounded him, I was surprised that the gentleman did not seem to understand that these ladies were laughing to think that the boastful lords of creation had not long since discovered that they themselves were the slaves to the fair beings who preside over our destiny—and that he had not discovered that those flashing eyes grew brighter at the ridiculous idea of the lords of creation talking of their superiority, when, even then, as ever, they were fiddling while their fair slaves danced.

Slaves, indeed! Why, sir, I have no doubt that every heart fluttered at the announcement of the strange idea, that society could progress without the controlling influence of the ladies. At all events, if they were really the suffering party, they looked as though they were not conscious of their own misery. [Laughter.] I thought, indeed, while I gazed on the fair forms, laughing eyes, and dimpling cheeks, around us, that they were not only unconscious of their misery, but were taking a private laugh at the figures we were cutting in still further fastening on ourselves the shackles of slavery.

I agree with the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Rariden,) that there is a law higher than any human law, which controls and directs, not only the original elements of society, but society in its more varied and public relations; a law purer and holier than temporal power can even form—the law of human affection; and by that law alone woman can wield an influence, the wealth of earth could never give.

The gentleman from Clark told us of instances of individual suffering, resulting from the common law relation of husband and wife. I presume, sir, that there is no man, who can listen to a recital of female grief, without feeling a glow of indignation against the degraded wretch who would betray the sanctity of a wife's affections. But, sir, the gentleman should remember that isolated cases cannot establish general principles; and he should remember, also, that no general principle of law can be established, under which injustice may not be done. It is the general effects of the rule, and not the exceptions, that should be considered.

The gentleman from Clark (Mr. Gibson) speaks of the common law as it affects marriage, as an "infamous system." Sir, is there no benevolence in the law?—no mercy in this infamous system of common law, of which gentlemen speak? Is there nothing redeeming in that system of laws upon which is laid the broad foundation of our glorious Republic? If the wife incurs a debt, she is not liable to imprisonment; but the husband is alone liable. And if the wife commits a tort, slanders a neighbor, or incurs a debt, the husband alone must suffer for it. The husband is justly bound for the support of the wife. As the head of the family, he alone is liable to the results incident to his position, and, inasmuch as the law places him at the head of the family, and as the representative of its interests, it at the same time justly imposes on him all the burdens of that position.

This leads me to correct an impression with reference to one point of the law which was made the other day, by the gentleman from Clark (Mr. Gibson). If I understood him aright, he made the declaration, that a widow, upon the dissolution of the marriage, takes no interest, except a right of dower, even when there are no children. If I understood the gentleman correctly he is mistaken. For, by the law of this State, the widow, in such a case, is entitled to one-half of the real and personal estate, in fee simple; if there are children, their rights should surely be protected. How, then, can the gentleman denounce the law with reference to the rights of the widow? If a man dies in Indiana, without lineal descendants, the wife takes one-half; but if the wife dies, the husband does not take the title of a heir from her real estate.

A MEMBER. She ought to have all.

Mr. H., continuing. The father or mother may have rights. I only refer to this to show that the law is not unmerciful, and further to illustrate this fact, I will read one extract more from the rules of the common law:

"The husband is liable for the wife's debts, contracted before coverture." "The husband is liable for the torts and frauds of the wife, committed during coverture; where the remedy for the tort is only damages by suit or a fine, the husband is liable with the wife; but, if the remedy be sought by imprisonment or execution, the husband is alone liable to imprisonment. The wife, during coverture, cannot be taken on a ca. sa., for her debt dum sola, or a tort dum sola, without her husband, and, if he escape or is not taken, the court will not let her lie in prison alone." And, by our law, if the husband dies insolvent, independent of the dower, she takes one hundred and fifty dollars, in one instance, and two hundred dollars in another; even though not a dime be left to pay the creditor; and this is right; but is it an evidence of the "infernal iniquity" of the common law?

It was remarked by the gentleman from Posey, that he feared women did not receive the same consideration which they would receive if they were allowed to exercise the right of suffrage; he feared that the same justice is not meted out to them, that would be if they exercised the rights of the politician. I have no doubt, sir, that in such an event, our whining politicians would be everlastingly weeping over the wrongs done to the rights of the fair voters, as they are now, upon every occasion, mourning over the wrongs which their fellow citizens are suffering, with very commendable patience however, but I doubt, sir, whether the sparkling eyes of our fair friends would grow any brighter, or that their rosy lips would wear any sweeter smiles if they were besieged by politicians asking humbly for their votes.

Again the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) with whom this subject has for years been of absorbing interest, tells us that we should distrust our sense of justice in approaching this subject, and that it should be approached with a candor commensurate with its importance. Sir, I admit the power of prejudice, I admit that the statesman may be blinded by devotion to his partizan creed, the bigot by his religious faith, that, in fact, in all our public relations the selfishness of our natures and pursuits may control and direct our actions. But, sir, if there is a subject this side of eternity, which we will all approach in the spirit of honest candor, it is one involving the rights and happiness of women, for it involves every interest and affection, for the possession of which life is worth possessing; every step in our pathway through life is linked in fond remembrance of some gentle being, who still cheers us in our course, or whose memory is embalmed in the deepest recesses of the heart, the first recollections of childhood are blended with the smiles of a devoted mother, and the last object on which the fading vision will linger will be the tearful eye of a wife or daughter, bending in speechless agony over the couch of death.

Independent of the high character of the gentleman, (Mr. Owen,) whose cultivated mind dwells with so much interest on this subject, I am assured by the manner in which he has discussed these propositions, that he is actuated by none other than feelings of enlarged benevolence. I am satisfied that he deems this change demanded by the true interests of society. But, sir, because we differ as to the propriety of this innovation, it is no evidence that any of us will allow ourselves to be so misguided by prejudice as not to be able to approach the subject in the spirit of candor. But, sir, I am in earnest in my opposition to these sections. I believe that not a single link of our social relations should be broken. I believe that the sanctity of our homes should be preserved—the same sanctity of home which our fathers brought with them from their native land. I desire that the same social happiness which reigned in the rude cottages, built by the pilgrim fathers on the coast of the Atlantic, in which a race of heroes were reared—that the same social system which has produced our happy homes, should be handed down, undefaced by innovation, to all coming time.

Sir, if it is necessary to work this change, the necessity should be made apparent upon general principles, and not by reference to particular cases—not by selecting exceptions to the general rule, not by quoting particular instances in which, under the existing laws, injustice has been done.

The gentleman from Posey with all his experience, (and he is a gentleman of large experience,) may be able to show many instances in which injustice has been inflicted upon the wife under the sanction of law; but until he can show that the general workings of the common law, with reference to this domestic relation, is to produce injustice, he certainly cannot expect gentlemen to be prepared for any material change. He cannot but expect the law to remain as it is, unless it can be demonstrated that the general workings of the rule is unjust, and that the proposed innovation will produce better fruits.

Sir, individual cases cannot be taken to establish a general rule. But, let me ask, what has been the prosperity of those countries where the gentleman's civil law rule has prevailed? Have they happier homes than we here in Indiana? Have they more cheerful firesides or happier wives than ours, or are the women of our State, or any other State where the common law prevails, in any degree less amiable, or less beloved? Or are they in any degree less pure and holy in the influences which they dispense, than are the women in those counties where they have the right to control their own property independently of the husband? We should examine this question upon this general principle, and if it should appear, upon such an examination, that the general workings of the common law produces not the most desirable results, we ought to abandon it. If it does, as we love our wives, our homes, our firesides, let us retain it.

I hope, then, that this question will be discussed calmly and fairly, and that the Convention will not make any change in the law regulating this most important relation, without due consideration. I do hope and trust that the change proposed by the gentleman from Posey will not be adopted unless gentlemen are confident of better results. I hope, however, that legislation may be authorized so that the real estate which the wife may inherit, shall be held sacred, so that, upon the dissolution of the marriage, she shall have it as her own, and so that her husband shall never be able to create any incumbrance upon it. I hope the spirit of benevolent, I may say just, reform upon this subject which has been growing up for the last thirteen years, and in which the gentleman from Posey has been an able abettor, may at least receive a new impulse from the deliberations of this body, and that laws justly calculated to secure to the wife a fair interest in the estate of the husband on the dissolution of the marriage relation may be enacted. I do not defend the present laws; in several instances they operate most unjustly against the widow, and, as a citizen, I will go as far as any man to reform them; but, sir, while I would rejoice to see a just, an enlightened policy adopted, securing to the wife her home, in the event of the dissolution of the conjugal relation, and every other just interest in the husband's estate or otherwise, consistent with the indissoluble character of the domestic ties, I should consider myself recreant to a sacred trust, if I hesitated for a moment in resisting the adoption of a principle which may even tend to weaken the ties of the domestic union.

MR. BADGER said—

MR. PRESIDENT: It is, perhaps, well, sir, for this Convention, and for the community, that we do not all see alike. I desire to say a few words on this novel proposition in justification of the course I shall pursue in voting on the original section, as reported by the committee on rights and privileges, as also on the pending amendments. I have been no less amused than interested at the course pursued by honorable gentlemen on this floor. At times during this discussion, they would be seen on fancy's wing, portraying the beauties, depicting the attraction, and dwelling with ecstasy on the loveliness of woman. I have seen them apparently lost in imagination, and forgetting that they were still on earth, they would, for a moment, seem to be "wrapped in the phantasmagoria of their own sublime perfectibility." Sir, I have yearned in gentlemen's be half for a banquet over the destruction of this "love-of-painting-spirit," especially when it came as a free-will offering in support of measures which our constituents have neither expected nor desired at our hands.

We seem to have lost sight of our land-marks. As I observed one day last week, we have not been sent up here to legislate; and I now appeal to gentlemen, whether it is requisite and proper for us here to discuss the merits of any special law? For myself, having no legal attainments, I am constrained to take a mere external view of this question, and make my examinations in the light of common sense.

Now, sir, what are the facts upon this subject? Is it true that the widow and the orphan are not sufficiently protected by the statutes of the State? Is it a fact that married women are not sufficiently protected by the laws of the land? And is it possible, Mr. President, that our country has grown rich, happy, prosperous, and powerful, under the existing laws, and yet the condition of our women—our mothers, our wives, and our sisters—remains so degraded—so oppressed, as gentlemen will have it. Sir, I believe it is an admitted fact, that it is the duty of the law-making power, to approximate as nearly to divine law as possible in forming a civil code; that is so far as justice and equity are concerned. Now, sir, with all due deference, not only to the intelligence, but to the better judgment of the advocates of this radical change, I desire to say, that it is contrary to the genius and spirit of the Christian Scriptures. And if any delegate is disposed to assume the negative of this proposition, he will find me, if not "prepared," at least ready and willing, to defend it in the best manner I can.

Sir, I am opposed to this report, not merely for the causes hinted at already, but from other considerations. It is, to say the least of it, an experiment that might not, in this country, meet the expectations even of its friends; and consequently ought by no means to form a part of the organic law. Honorable gentlemen should reflect, that it is certainly unsafe to engraft matters purely legislative into the Constitution.

It would seem, Mr. President, from the almost unlimited amount of matter proposed to be put into the amended Constitution, that delegates have concluded that, with the adjournment of this body, all the legislative talent of the State was to be annihilated. Now, sir, while I am not only willing to admit, but ready to assume, that in this Convention is an embodiment of all the desired amendments to the Constitution, I cannot allow myself to think for a moment, that we have also an embodiment of all the political talent in the State, housed up in this Hall. I am ashamed of the thought. Why then, sir, will we undertake thus to legislate in the arrangement and establishment of the organic law, instead of contenting ourselves with the prompt discharge of our appropriate duties?

I confess, sir, that, when I see the attempts made here (and probably too from the best motives) to put every thing into the Constitution, whether it be tried or untried; and when I reflect that we have spent well nigh six weeks and done nothing; and when I see practical common sense members becoming afraid to speak in favor of husbanding time, because of the rebukes with which they are met on every side—I say, sir, when I see all this, I confess I have some misgivings as to the result of our labors here.

Sir, we are taking the wrong course, in my opinion, to gain for ourselves imperishable laurels. It has been said of Christians, that “they ought to look to the rock from whence they were hewn.” And would it not be well for us to look to the people from whom we come, and of whom we are? Would it not be well for us to look back to the events of last July and last August, and consider the questions which were propounded by our constituents when we were upon the stump? Would it not be well for us to remember the pledges we then made to our fellow-citizens, and which they expect us to perform? I envy not the laurels which gentlemen may expect to wear, if they are to be acquired by those means, to which it has seemed to be their pleasure generally to resort.

But, sir, to the point again. Admit that these proposed sections are not contrary to the divine law, governing the heads of families; admit that the principle may have been followed with the desired results in older and richer States; and admit the truth of those few extreme isolated cases, cited by the gentleman from Posey, as his closing argument that we needed such a law; admitting all this, does it follow, as a matter of course, that the people really want such a law? that they must have such a law? and have it, too, as a Constitutional provision?

From these remarks, Mr. President, the Convention will see where I stand upon this question. My position is now defined, although I am disposed at all times to advance my opinions with due deference to the riper intelligence and better judgment of others. I have only to add, that I am not here to do anything more than to perform my duty, with a strict reference to those matters which the people expect of this body, and with reference to which I stand pledged.

Mr. SHERROD. Mr. PRESIDENT: I have been an attentive listener for some days past to the discussion of the legal bearings of this subject. We have had the law in the case, and I think the gentleman from Putnam (Mr. Badger) has just given us its gospel bearings. I hope the Convention has been gratified by the lecture.

I shall not, at this time, attempt to enter into an elaborate discussion of the proposition in debate, the ground, for the most part, having been traveled over. I shall, therefore, in endeavoring to call attention to those points of the question which have not been brought out in debate, seek to be as brief as possible.

I always receive the opinions and suggestions of my seniors with great deference, and the more especially when their locks are whitened with the frosts of many winters; when their opinions come to us ripe with age, shewn to us through the clear light of experience and divested of the coloring of interest or of passion. But, sir, on this question I feel compelled to dissent from the opinions of many of my fellow members. I had intended to give a silent vote upon the final question, and let the journal of the Convention alone indicate the sentiments I held; but, sir, when I see the deep interest that is manifested by the friends of the proposition, not only within this Hall but out of it, and as I have observed from day to day those for the benefit of whom this proposition was submitted, crowding the lobbies of this chamber, with their lit faces and bright eyes, attentively watching the progress of this debate, I felt it to be my duty to add my humble voice to the expression in favor of the section, as reported from the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of this State. But I beg leave to differ with the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Holman) in his estimate of the opinions of the women of this Hall upon the question before us. I almost imagined that I could hear them say, “We have no voice upon your floor; we have no vote in your body; but we believe there are magnanimous spirits there who will see that our rights are upheld and vindicated.” Sir, I should be unworthy the name I bear, I should be less than an American, if I could approach such a subject with indifference.

The proposition reported by the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) upon which is the pending question, and which I shall cordially support, is that: Women hereafter married in this State, shall have the right to acquire and possess property to their sole use and disposal; and laws shall be passed securing to them, under equitable provisions, all property, real or personal, whether owned by them before marriage or acquired afterwards by purchase, gift, devise, descent, or in any other way, and also providing for the registration of the wife's separate property.

Subjects of controversy, or questions of State and National interest, like every thing else which occurs within the experience of man, are continually changing. Each successive age that the hand of time fashions and sends abroad to become, in its turn, the subject of history and remark, strides along upon the stage of action, teeming with some important thought, some useful theory, some practical principle which former ages had failed to discover. And no matter how trivial or insignificant, compared with others, the era may be, it bears upon it the impress of originality and equal rights. Not that men's ideas change often with regard to the fundamental principles by which society or government is constituted and sustained. No; but improvement consists most generally in an application of these principles to new subjects. In a comparison with these principles to some of the practical workings of our government, we can ascertain whether they be harmonious and consistent.

Whatsoever, therefore, be the point of time at which an individual finds himself an inheritor of life, occupying the high and responsible position of a representative of a free and enlightened people, he may know that there is a weighty responsibility resting upon him for his portion of effort for the future progress of the race.

Though a man may be conversant with the world's history, and familiar with all the learning of former ages—though he may have climbed up the steep ascent of the hill of science, and drank deep from the spring of knowledge, and sounded the depths of classic lore, yet of what avail is all this unless he can successfully apply his knowledge of the past to the necessities of the present. Unless the light of experience enables us to tread the rugged paths of life with a surer step, to avoid the errors committed by those who have gone before us, unless it shows us the way to improvement and a higher civilization, it is useless for all practical purposes. The age we live in has been denounced by those who cling to the cobwebs of the past, as utilitarian in all its manifestations. Be this as it may, the age is certainly eminently practical in all its tendencies. Is a new discovery announced? The instant question put by the busy public is, "To what useful purpose can it be applied?" All learning and all invention is valued only as it contributes to the general prosperity and happiness of the people.

We occupy the last moment of time that is known. No one man has any more knowledge of the great future than another, and it is in each one's power, by the exercise of his energies, to give a direction to coming events.

Although, when compared with other ages whose light has kindled, shone, and faded, and are now visible only by the pale reflection of history, the present age may have less of the ideal and more of the practical, it will be found the most enlightened, most progressive, and most prolific in great enterprises of reform and amelioration of the social and moral condition of the race. Every portion of the civilized world is lighted by the beacon fires of thought and free discussion. Every assemblage of men, whether in mass or as representatives of the masses, every publication that a teeming press throws off, to find its way to every part of the civilized earth, is rife with debate upon the fundamental principles of government and the organization of society. The rights of the State, the rights of the governed, the rights of man, and in this day, the neglected rights of women, are being freely discussed, and the period for a radical change of many features of government and of the laws has now arrived.

He who who would now keep pace with the progress of public events, and has the moral courage to lay his shoulder to the car wheel of reform, and act a part in the great movements of the day, has much to do—stern and prompt efforts to make—or the time that is allotted to him to live will have passed before reaching even the threshold of the busy theatre of life.

Among the many interesting questions of reform that are now being discussed by the press, in the pulpit, in popular conventions, and in legislative halls, we find this question of the legal rights of married women standing prominently forth. It has arrested the attention of the wisest and the best men in our country; it is now brought before the delegates of the people of Indiana in Constitutional Convention assembled for their discussion and decision. But, like all other reforms that were ever urged in the world, it has its determined opponents, as well as its warm advocates. And though I had expected opposition from those who regard that which is old—that which comes down to us from past generations—I must confess that I did not expect that this proposition would meet with the strenuous opposition which it has on this floor, backed by so little philosophy. I do not make any great pretensions to chivalrous feeling, nor I have never aspired to occupy the position of a philanthropist, nor yet do I profess to rise here as the champion of the gentler sex; I am here simply to ask that justice, and justice alone, may be granted to the women of Indiana; and I intend to speak and act my convictions under a sense of the importance of the subject and the responsibilities of the position. This is a subject that well might command the attention of every statesman, patriot, and philanthropist.

In supporting this proposition reported by the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) I would not advance any very novel or strange opinions. Gentlemen who are ambitious to bedeck themselves in the trappings of a field officer, and parade the review ground in all the pride of military consequence, need have no fear that we propose to claim for woman the right to appear as his rival in that theatre. We do not propose to enlist and equip an army of female Amazons to vie with the sterner sex in feats of daring before an enemy's lines. We advocate no proposition that would draw woman from her appropriate sphere of the domestic relation. Neither need gentlemen fear that we shall claim for them the right to exercise the elective franchise, or that we shall send to congressional halls a bevy of eloquent young ladies to take their places in the arena of political strife, and instead of occupying their seats in the galleries, to convert the committee rooms into bou-doirs and drawing rooms. Neither need the lawyers and the M. D.'s that are "turned out" at every session of a court and every commencement day of a college with such marvellous rapidity, fear that ladies will disturb the dust upon "Coke and Lyttleton," or become rival physicians and surgeons. We propose nothing looking to such objects; but we propose simply that woman should be secured in the possession of her obviously just rights; that she should have the possession and control of that property which she owned before marriage, or afterwards acquired by descent, gift, or in any other manner. Is there anything very novel or strange in this?

I have been very much amused to witness the nervousness of some gentlemen when this subject was broached. Some seem inclined to have slight convulsions when a proposition to secure the rights of married women is defended and urged. It was only last evening I was met by a gentleman, whose name I shall not mention here, who accosted me with—"Well, Sherrod, how are you going to vote upon this proposition of Owen to change the laws relative to the legal rights of married women?" When I replied that I should certainly support the proposition, he declared his astonishment that I could seriously entertain such ultra notions; he warned me, that, if we went on in this way, the women would soon get the reins of government in their own hands; he appeared to have a dread of the danger of their ascendancy. But let the advocates of the old system not be needlessly alarmed. We claim for women no such position as demanded by Madame DeStael, Mary Wolstencroft, or George Sand. No new theories as to her social position are advanced; we simply claim that she and her children shall be secure in the enjoyment of the property which was her own before marriage, or acquired by gift, descent, or otherwise, after marriage. We desire to see her protected and secured in the possession of her own home and fireside, around which her children may play and receive that protection and education which the competence she may possess in her own right may afford her the power of giving them, without the constant apprehension of being driven forth by a sheriff's sale, to satisfy the creditors of an improvident or unfortunate husband and father. We boast of our superior intelligence and civilization—of the beneficent institutions of our government, which secures to all equal rights and exact justice—and I admit that we are in the enjoyment of life in an almost fairy land—certainly in the El Dorado imagined by the discoverers of the New World. Intelligence and the refinements of life reach every grade, and pervade every circle of society.

But with all this improvement and progress, there are yet glaring defects in our laws. So far as it regards any law to protect a mother and her helpless offspring in the possession of their own home, we are no further advanced in civilization than the early Romans before the light of Christianity dawned upon the world. Their historians say of the condition of woman at that time, that she acquired and inherited property for the sole use and benefit of her lord. Is not this her condition in America after the lapse of two thousand years? After the Romans became a more enlightened and polished people we see that they adopted laws relative to the sex which were less rigorous and more consonant with the principles of justice. At the termination of the Punic wars, a Roman matron claimed and received protection in the possession and control of property which was hers before marriage; and as the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Holman) remarked, the institutes of Justinian confirmed those rights. Gibbon tells us that by the Justinian code, the estates of the wife could neither be alienated or mortgaged for the debts of a prodigal or unfortunate husband; even the voluntary transfer of property, in many cases was prohibited by the jealousy of the laws.

Thirteen hundred years have elapsed and we of the nineteenth century, with all our vaunted superiority in civilization and equal rights have not yet attained an equality in this respect with the people of that early age. Our law makers, as yet, have refused to accord that just legislation to the sex, that protection of the means of living, which was conceded by the Pagan Romans and confirmed by a Byzantine Emperor in the sixth century.

The worshipers of Jupiter protected helpless woman and children, and secured them in the protection of that home without which life is oftentimes a curse instead of a blessing. And yet we sympathize with their semi-barbarous condition; we pity them as Pagans unblest by the teachings of that Christian religion which enjoins the especial protection of the widow and the fatherless; but, sir, we enlightened Christians can see the mother and her offspring turned from home and thrown dependent on the cold charities of a heartless world to satisfy it may be, a debt contracted at the gaming table or race course by a profligate and drunken husband. And like the self-righteous Pharisee, thank God that we are not as men of former ages.

The laws relative to married women are not only unjust and productive of much suffering and destitution, but the public sentiment in regard to woman is unsound and its practical effects most cruel. If by profligacy and dissipation the husband deprives the wife of a home and she is compelled to go out into the world alone, she receives but little of that charity and sympathy which the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) tells us is her shield and protection in the absence of that property which is justly hers, but which our laws vest in the husband. And if in her dire extremity, when the offspring that are dearer to her than her own life, if in her extreme destitution, when she can no longer obtain work even at the mean pittance afforded for female labor, she should in a single instance violate the rules of propriety, or for a moment forget the stern rules of morality, she is no more the wife or the woman entitled even to sympathy; she is the condemned outcast, her claims to regard and respect forfeited, and her restoration to society forever denied. The Pharisaical finger of society is pointed at her to withdraw attention from its deeper wound, though more artfully and successfully concealed from discovery. Not so with the husband. The magnanimous man makes haste to complete the ruin of weak and defenseless woman, whose errors are generally the offspring of their virtues, of their child-like trust and implicit confidence in him. The husband may steep himself in the wine cup and waste his energies and his substance in the retreats of dissipation and debauchery, can spend his days and nights at the gaming table, with the abandoned and the wanton, his passions fed, it may be by means of the property or the earnings of his heart-broken wife, yet society sets no Cain-mark upon him, he comes in and goes out as usual and may remain a respectable, oftentimes an honored member of society. The law gives him the authority, and the wife must obey. How cruel and unfeeling is man! It seems to be not enough that women should be deprived of an equal share of their property—equal opportunities for education, and confined to the menial drudgery of an exclusively domestic life, but ties, that to her are stronger than life, must be riven.

Sir, I am not speaking of barren attractions, but of practical realities. It is not fiction but sober truth. I contend that for the wife there is no law, but that of injustice. When neglected or ill-treated, her only defense is her imploring look, her flowing tears, and her heart-broken sigh. And, sir, I admit they would be sufficient to protect her from wrong and neglect, at the hands of a man who possessed a soul and a heart to feel. But, sir, can they reach the ear or heart of those who are sleeping the cold sleep of death? or the brute in man's guise, who marries the money, and not the woman; and who estimates domestic happiness and female worth and virtue, by the amount of property secured through the transaction? Sir, it is to guard against cases of this kind that the proposition now under consideration was submitted, and not to build up separate interests between man and wife, as has been so falsely and unjustly charged upon this floor, by the opposite side of the house. The man who dare not entertain the same respect, the same affection and interest, for the partner of his bosom, without property, as he would with it, is unworthy the name he bears, and should never be entitled to the name of a husband.

And yet, it would seem that this sentiment, true as it is to the thought and feeling of every true man, is not practically regarded by those who oppose a change in the laws relative to the property of married women. The tendency of all their arguments is to the conclusion that property is the basis of the marriage contract; that, without it, the union of two young hearts is without the true cement that will make the tie indissoluble. I confess that I have looked forward to the time when I might be so fortunate as to secure the attachment of one of that sex, for the vindication of whose rights I would always volunteer my humble efforts, as the happiest period of my life. But, sir, if the doctrine preached by the advocates of the common law doctrine in this regard, be true, if it is property that constitutes the strength of matrimonial bonds, if that is the only cement and the great incentive; if property is literally the principal in this matter, and if its amount constitutes the motive by which parties are actuated, I trust that I may be delivered from what would literally be the chains of wedlock—golden chains though they might be, they would wear none the less galling. If, in contracting the marriage relation, the parties are actuated by no higher or holier aspirations than these, I pray, from the inmost recesses of my soul, that God, in his mercy, would avert from me the calamity.

But, let us examine this point a little further; this position that conjugal happiness is inconsistent with the securing to the wife the possession and control of her own property. Gentlemen have not yet told us what evil consequences are to be expected from the operation of laws securing to the married woman the property she possessed before marriage, or that she acquires afterwards, by gift, descent, or otherwise. Is it feared that the holding of property in her own name may lessen or destroy that dependence which it is thought a woman should feel towards her husband? Is it feared that, if this feeling of dependence is taken away, discord and unhappiness will follow, and, perhaps, a disruption of the relation? Or is it feared that frauds might be occasioned by the facilities offered to the husband to obtain credit on the strength of property belonging to his wife, which would not be liable for his debts? Now, when these objections are viewed in a practical light, they do not possess weight or the shadow of a foundation.

As to the first objection, that any diversity of interest, or any discord would arise between a man and his wife about property, that could only descend to their own children, I do not believe. Nor do I believe, between persons suitably matched, that the circumstances of the woman being possessed of property that could not be alienated, would produce superciliousness on her part, where the man had qualities to command respect. There are women who would, probably, from natural bad temper, and deficiency in proper training in early life, be vixens under any circumstances; whether the property came by the one side or the other, or neither. And there are men, that are such ninnies, as to command no respect from their own children, who have passed the period of infancy, and, of course, do not meet with an average share of attention and respect from their companions. But, these are exceptions that neither the laws of God or man will reach. And, from the opportunities I have had of judging of these matters, from observation, I have arrived at the very distinct conclusion, that there is very little danger of difficulties arising between man and wife, about the property of either, when true affection was the attraction to marriage. A man of refined and magnanimous feelings would willingly see himself prohibited, by legal enactments, from the control of his wife's property, for the sake of the vast general benefit arising to females from such laws. We must remember, in framing a Constitution, that it is for the general good that we must frame provisions—not particular cases. All will admit that, where love exists between husband and wife, if the woman have property which it is right and proper and necessary for her husband to have the use of, there will be legitimate means by which she can confer upon him the right to use it; and where there is not this love, "this mysterious sympathy," as the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) beautifully expressed the feeling, all will agree that no laws can be too strong to protect the wife.

As to the second objection, that this provision, giving to married women the possession and control of their own property, would open the door for frauds, by enabling the husband to obtain credit on the strength of his wife's property, but which property cannot be attached on account of any debts of his, it might have some weight, if the public were not well apprised of the real ownership of the property. It will be seen by a reference to the section in debate, that it is distinctly provided that "laws shall be passed, providing for the separate registration of the wife's property." This makes it clear and open, and secures society from the wrongs and frauds anticipated.

Matters of this sort, for various reasons, are apt to receive a thorough investigation, and to be well understood during a woman's maidenhood, and particularly if the amount of goods, chattels, lands, and tenements, approach at all to that amount called a competence, inasmuch as there are usually quite a number of good looking young men, of moderate merits, who have no particular objections to appropriating the person and property of the fair one to "their own proper use, benefits, and behalf," in the quaint old language of the law.

Nor have many instances occurred, where the relatives of the lady would put themselves to unnecessary pains to conceal or under estimate the value of the property in question—generally the reverse.

After marriage, the tax books of the county would exhibit the ownership. Hence, there could be no chance for fraud.

Mr. President, I am unwilling to take up any more of the time of this body upon this question. I have, in as brief a manner as possible, expressed the views I hold in reference to this matter, and which influence me to vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen). I know there is a strong opposition to a change in this regard, but I believe that most of the objections that are honestly entertained to the provision, will be dissipated by argument and contact with the clear statement of the nature and practical operation of such a provision. The contrast between the principle of the common law which now regulates the matter of the possession and disposal of the property of the married woman, and the principles of this proposition must, to every reflective mind, result favorably to the latter.

But let the proposition meet with what opposition it may, it will ultimately triumph, because truth is stronger than error. Though it may fall here, I should cling to its principles, and still advocate them to the extent of my ability. I would rather fall fighting over principle, than to triumph with sentiments against the injustice of which my conscience was arrayed. But whatever the result may be here, public attention is waking up to the subject, and discussion is all that is needed to secure in its favor the suffrage of the people of the State.

I would not be strenuous whether this proposition was adopted as a Constitutional provision or as a Legislative enactment, so that the laws in regard to the property of married women are made to conform to justice and correct principles. But I confess that my preference is to see this proposition adopted as a part of the organic law of the State, for it would then stand as permanent as the eternal principles upon which it is founded.

A MEMBER moved that the Convention adjourn.

A division being called for, the Convention refused to adjourn.

After a pause of several minutes—

Mr. PETTIT remarked, that as there appeared to be no one desirous to take the floor, he would again move that the Convention adjourn.

No one seconding the motion—

Mr. MAY rose and said: Mr. President, I do not take the floor for the purpose of making a speech on the very important question of woman and woman's rights, that is now before the House. Not by any sort or manner of means, sir. In the first place, Mr. President, I am not one of the speech-makers of this Convention. Perhaps all present can testify to the truth of this statement. And, sir, even if I were one of that indefatigable band, I realize too sensibly the embarrassment of my unfor-fortunate condition, to willingly enlarge on so profound and ticklish a question as the one now before us. No, indeed, sir; I rise for a very different purpose from that. In fact, Mr. President, I am up simply to ask that I may be excused from voting at all on this, which is to me, I confess, a very embarrassing and ticklish question. [Here Mr. M. paused for several moments.]

I was in hopes, Mr. President, that I should have heard at once and from all corners of the Hall a unanimous cry of "consent, consent," in response to so reasonable a request. But if no one does cry "consent," and inasmuch, too, sir, as no one appears willing to take the floor until the adjournment, I will occupy a few minutes in giving my reasons for making this request; and, sir, my reasons being known, I flatter myself that my request will then be granted without a dissenting voice.

When I look around me in this Convention, I find that out of one hundred and fifty members, there is less than a baker's dozen of unmarried men, a class to which I confess, sir, I unfortunately belong. Yes, Mr. President, like the gentleman who preceded me, (Mr. Sherrod,) I am still one of that melancholy band. We are sometimes designated as "old bachelors," and men even seek to stigmatize us by that term of reproach. But, sir, we accept the appellation. If the Chinese were to speak of us with an eye to our unfortunate condition, I suppose they would describe us as a set of "outside barbarians," who had never yet been beatified by taking possession of "the celestial flowery land" of matrimony. [Laughter and applause.] But we are not thus styled here in our own land. "Old bachelors" is the term here applied to us. As I said before, we accept the term. Old bachelors we certainly are, and some of us really cannot very well help ourselves. [Laughter.] But while we accept the term, we shall object to its receiving a "literal construction." Old, in the literal sense of the term, most assuredly all of us are not. Indeed, looking over, but a few minutes ago, that political chart which gives in brief the history of the individual members of this Convention, I see that we have at least one of our number setting himself down at twenty-six, or perhaps twenty-seven years of age. Of course, sir, I am much older than that. I can hardly be said to have grown gray in the iniquity of celibacy; but, sir, you can see, any man with half an eye open can see, that I am a little bald! [Much laughter.] That, however, is certainly not the case with all of us. We are mostly young men; some of us in the very prime of life, as we fancy. And, sir, allow me to say, though perhaps I should not, we consider ourselves a highly respectable portion of this highly respectable body. [Laughter.] Whatever others may think of us, we are determined to think well of ourselves. We wish to be understood, then, as being a whole-souled, able-bodied, generous-hearted set of fellows, suitable matches for any body. [Laughter.] But, Mr. President, there is no use in denying it, we are but a small minority in this Convention. Less than a dozen of us in all, as I said before—there is, of course, something like one hundred and forty against us. And how, Mr. President, in the name of common sense, can we expect to contend successfully against such an array? Sir, the thing is impossible—evidently impossible—and, for my own part, when I am certain of defeat, I give up—when I know that I am certain to be shot, I am always willing to "come down." [Laughter.]

Let me mention another reason why I desire to be excused from voting on this question. The fact of it is, Mr. President, this Convention is getting into altogether too deep water for me. In this matter of woman and woman's rights, this Convention is fast taking me where, I frankly confess, I cannot touch bottom. Now, sir, I believe that gentlemen will bear me out when I say that I have nerve enough to follow on wherever I can, and that I have been reasonably diligent at all times, thus far, as a member of this Convention? [Several voices—"Consent"—"that's true."] Generally, in my seat, I have kept along, listening and voting as well as I could. For many successive days I followed in the wake of a highly distinguished gentleman, while, with many meanderings, he led the Convention on after him as he pursued that will-o'-the-wisp of his, that ignis fatuus, the abolition of the Grand Jury system. Though sometimes tired, still, sir, I was always present, and assisted with my vote when we took a general tilt all around against those "soulless corporations" which infest the land; and I believe you, Mr. President, will also grant that I followed on after the rest, though with sadly unequal steps, I acknowledge, when we had under discussion the subject of universal suffrage. But, now, sir, as I have already said, we have come to the consideration of a subject to which I confess myself unequal—such knowledge is too wonderful for me. I cannot attain unto it; and I think that I prefer no unreasonable request, when I ask to be excused from voting either on the main question or on any of its amendments. [A voice—"No consent"—"go ahead."]

I have said, Mr. President, that the unmarried men are in a distressing minority in this body. It follows, of course, that the married men of the Convention are in an overwhelming majority. Now, sir, if we were in some places I should more freely express my surprise at the very peculiar position occupied by these gray-headed gentlemen—"old coons" as we should call them on the stump—in discussing this question of the rights of women hereafter to be married. Why, sir, each one of them has already monopolized some one woman with all her rights.

And yet they come here, and in the coolest manner imaginable, enter upon the discussion of the rights of women hereafter to be married in this State! Into their own power they have long since absorbed all the rights that woman has, and yet they have now for several days been gravely debating the pending question! This certainly is a little the coolest performance ever enacted by honorable gentlemen! Why, sir, they have secured the game—they have carried off the prize—they have monopolized to themselves all of a woman's rights, and now, they are working for what purpose? Why, sir, (would you believe it!) to secure the rights of women henceforth to be married! [Great merriment.] It really seems to me, that, of the two, the unmarried men of this Convention are the proper tribunal before which such a question should be argued. It certainly cannot be denied that we take, to the full, as lively an interest in all which pertains to "women hereafter to be married," as gentlemen in the majority upon this floor.

Concerning this subject of woman, Mr. President, I am neither able nor disposed to say very much. I can ponder upon the matter, but have very little to say. I confess that, in this respect, I am a little like the Irishman's owl. A certain Frenchman once had a parrot of which he was wonderfully proud. He had taught his parrot to talk a little—to scream out "fire!" "fire!" and some other phrases, not perhaps proper for this refined audience to listen to, all which, you may be sure, made the Frenchman vain enough of his parrot. He was perpetually exhibiting it, and boasting of its wonderful qualities. In his little crowd of listeners, one day, was an Irishman, who interrupted the Frenchman's eulogies by remarking to the "jintleman" that he had a bird at home which could "bate" any man's "b-i-r-r-d" any day. "Was it a parrot?" the Frenchman asked. "My bird is an owl," said the Irishman, and then went on to tell how that his owl would ruffle up his feathers, and prick up his ears, and look as wise and consequential as a judge or an ex-Congressman. "But," asked the Frenchman, "can your owl talk like my parrot, sir?" "No," says the Irishman, "my bird cannot talk very much; but he keeps up a devil of a thinking!" [Much laughter.]

And, sir, it is somewhat so with me. I cannot talk, I confess, so fluently on this subject of "Woman, and woman's rights" as some gentlemen who have preceded me, yet I have listened with open ears to all their speeches, and while they, like the Frenchman's parrot, have now this long time been talking, they may be sure that I, like the Irishman's owl, have been "keeping up a devil of a thinking." [Great laughter.] More than this, sir, I have now been keeping up this thinking on woman and on woman's rights these ten years, and I hope I may be allowed to say, that during all that time such an absorbing interest has it possessed for me, that, from earliest dawn to latest eve, it has literally engrossed my thoughts. And allow me to say further, that I have had a "devil of a time of it." [Continued laughter.] But, sir, "while there's life there's hope," it is said, and some guardian angels may yet bring relief to the gentlemen who are my companions in misfortune, and, possibly, even to myself. If so, to that unknown one, whether within the hearing of my voice or not, I would, in the expressive language of Scripture, say "whatever thou doest, that do thou quickly." [Laughter and applause.]

I have said, Mr. President, that my ideas respecting "woman" are somewhat vague and indistinct. I confess that it is but too true. Respecting woman's rights, however, I have fewer doubts. I am vain enough to believe I know all about that matter. I have my theory, however, on both these mystical questions.

Respecting "woman," sir, it is unbecoming in me to say much. My theory, however, is this: I believe woman to be essentially the same with man. Whether we regard her moral, her physical, or her intellectual nature, we find her the same with man, yet different. And, sir, as I think, in that difference consists woman's excellency.

I suppose that, perhaps, every gentleman on this floor has read an anecdote which appeared a short time since, and which, perhaps, illustrates my ideas better than I can directly express them. Now, sir, in telling a story I always blunder worse than any Irishman, yet I believe I shall venture to relate this one. [Cries of "consent," "go on."] It seems to me, at any rate, quite apropos—to the point—and if I blunder in the telling of it, I dare say that almost any gentleman on this floor can help me out.

A certain Methodist divine was once holding forth upon human nature in general. He first spoke of man—of his moral, his intellectual, and his physical nature. Thence, speaking of woman, of her condition, and of her nature, he exclaimed, "Brethren, let us not exult in our fancied superiority over woman, for God has made woman even as he has made us, with but little variation. And," continued the pious worthy, clasping his hands in the enthusiasm of his ecstasy, and shouting as he spoke, "I say, brethren, thank God for that variation!" [Prolonged laughter.]

And so, Mr. President, say I. In that very variation which God has made between man and woman, whether we regard their moral, intellectual, or physical natures, consists the excellence of each. Man arrogates to himself intellectual pre-eminence. Would woman, I ask, willingly lower man to her present attainments? As high as the heavens are above the earth, so high, all concede, is woman's moral nature in excellence above man's. Would any man to his own level bring woman down? Man, too, has, we know, superior physical strength, before which, if attacked, woman must surely fall. But, sir, unto woman is given that beauty which disarms the strong man even to prostration. And even where beauty fails, woman's very weakness becomes her very strength. Who then, will gainsay, I ask, my theory, that the excellence of the one sex consists in its very variation from the other! I repeat, sir, that there is a difference between man and woman, as well moral and mental as physical, and, sir, I believe that it is that very difference between the one and the other that should cause us to be thankful.

I am not, sir, at this late hour, and unprepared as I am, disposed to descant very largely upon the vexed question of woman's rights. My theory is simply this, I can give it in a single remark: In my treatment of women I would always act upon this general principle, to grant unto woman whatever rights and privileges she demanded at the hands of man. I speak, sir, not now in jest, but the words of sober earnestness. I say then, in all my legislation for women I would be guided by the one principle to grant unto her whatever, on the whole, she might think necessary for her good—I do not mean what some individual one might ask, not what the young girl might heedlessly wish, or the old woman might peevishly crave, but what women in the aggregate, women collectively, might ask for—just whatever, after meeting together, considering their true station, their sphere, and having taken a full and comprehensive view of their relations to man and to society, they might then desire. And, sir, for one, I very frankly say that if after such a mutual consultation and such a deliberate consideration, women should then ask to share the rights and privileges of man, I would be the last person to withhold from them a single one. But, sir, I would also ask woman to recollect that from the exercise of man's rights and privileges would result certain duties, from the performance of which she must not seek to shrink.

It is evident to all that I might amplify and enlarge upon this idea—this theory as I call it—of mine. But I shall not occupy your time in so doing. I rose, Mr. President, not to make a speech. I confess, sir, that I rose for a very different purpose; what I commenced to say was prompted more by my remembrance of the old saying that—

"A little nonsense now and then,
Is relished by the wisest men," than any better motive. I know, sir, this to be confessed by an assembly of the wisest men of our State, and it occurred to me that a few confessedly nonsensical remarks might be acceptable, if for no other reason, as an agreeable relief and contrast to the profound speeches which preceded me. [Laughter.]

Upon the whole, Mr. President, I think I will withdraw my request to be excused from voting on this question, with which I commenced my remarks. I believe, sir, I have fairly argued myself into the conviction that I know all about a subject, of which when I rose I really thought I knew nothing. Perhaps, sir, this is not the first time that a member has argued himself into a conviction that he fully understands a subject concerning which others can see that he really knows nothing at all [great laughter]. I believe, sir, I shall vote on this question and on all its amendments; and, sir, I shall vote entirely on a general principle. I shall vote, sir, as I should wish woman to vote, were I to put the question to her, as man sometimes puts the question. I shall vote, "aye," every time. [Renewed merriment.]

But before taking my seat, I will prefer another request, Mr. President. It is that the Convention will excuse our Stenographer from making any report of my remarks. [Cries of "no consent," "no indeed."] Very well, sir, it is no great matter anyhow. I care little about it; my only fear is of my worthy constituents. They know, sir, that on this matter of women, I am by nature a little excitable—a little "cracked," some call it—but when they come to see in print, what I tremble to think I have said, inasmuch as the fascinations of this city are beyond their conceptions, I fear, sir, they will think me as the Scotchmen say, "gane clean daft," the English of which, I believe, is "stark staring mad" [laughter]. Surely my request is a reasonable one.

Thanking gentlemen for their patient indulgence, I will occupy their time no longer.

On motion, the Convention adjourned until nine o'clock to-morrow morning.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER, 16, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. —

In conformity with the resolution adopted yesterday, the list of the delegates was called over, and the names of those who were absent, not having obtained leave of absence, were noted upon the Journal.

RIGHTS OF MARRIED WOMEN.

The Convention proceeded to the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, being the section reported by Mr. OWEN, in relation to the rights of married women to hold property, and the amendments thereto.

The pending question being upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from —

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. The subject which has been under consideration for two or three days past, is the section which reads as follows:

"Women hereafter married in this State, shall have the right to acquire and possess property to their sole use and disposal; and a law shall be passed, &c."

Now, sir, I have been an attentive listener to what has been said upon this important subject; and certainly I must say that, in my poor judgment, no subject of equal importance has been under consideration before this body, that has created, or that in the progress of discussion upon it, has exhibited greater digression in debate from the subject under consideration, than has occurred in the discussion of this subject, and particularly so far as the arguments which have been adduced by gentlemen who have opposed this proposition or this section are concerned.

It has, by almost every man who has thought proper to oppose it, been regarded—at least one would suppose so from the character of the arguments employed—as a proposition to take from the husband a part of his rights, and surrender them to his wife.

Now, sir, it seems to me that we should approach this subject as we should approach every subject that comes before this Convention for our grave consideration and action. We should look at the proposition and see if it contains any thing that is just and proper to be done in behalf of the party for whose benefit the provision is intended.

Women hereafter married in this State shall have the right to acquire and possess property to their sole use and disposal. I have not been able, Mr. President, to discover in this proposition anything that does not meet my entire approbation, except it be that the property which it provides shall be possessed by the wife or married woman, should be also at her disposal without the consent of her husband. Perhaps there may be a manifest propriety that the disposal of the property which she owns in her own name, and which she ought to have a right to use agreeably to her own wishes, should be under her exclusive control; at the same time, I say, it may be manifestly proper that she should not be able to dispose of it without the consent of her husband. For I view this matter as intended solely and entirely to provide for the protection of the rights of married women against the wrongful acts of an improvident or dissolute husband. And if the section should be adopted, and if a law should be passed to carry out this provision, I have no idea, and I think no one can have any just apprehension that any difference in the social relations that now exist, will take place hereafter in consequence of the adoption of such provision. Husbands and wives who are now in the habit of conducting their business and social relations harmoniously, will continue to do so notwithstanding the introduction of this provision into the Constitution. It is therefore, as I have remarked, only intended to provide against contingencies that may happen, and that frequently do happen; as we all know, where a dissolute and improvident husband becomes embarrassed, either by mismanagement of his affairs or dissipation or otherwise, that the wife may then have it in her power to restrain him from taking away and squandering the property that belongs to her, and which she brought with her into the marriage contract, or rather into the marriage connection.

Then, sir, it is important that we should look at this subject, and examine whether it be just and proper to grant what is asked for. What is it that is demanded? Why, sir, it is that the woman shall be entitled to possess, use, and enjoy that which is her own; at least that she shall be so entitled, in the event of a necessity arising, for restraining the husband from a wasteful use of the property.

This subject, sir, has been treated as if it were intended, or as if it contained a proposition that would lead to a direct interference with the relation of marriage. I see nothing in it of this kind. The simple question is whether the married woman shall be entitled to use and enjoy her own property in the event that her husband shall not, in her opinion, be capable of managing the property agreeable to her wishes.

We have been told, Mr. President, that the marriage relation is a sacred one. No one disputes that. We are told that the husband and wife shall be one flesh, that they shall dwell together in unity and harmony. So far as that can be practically carried out, they should be one and undivided, and they will always be undivided, so long as the parties act with propriety towards each other, and so long as this marriage contract shall be regarded, as being, indeed, a sacred engagement.

But what is the fact in relation to the primitive state of this contract or relation of marriage? The twain were to be one flesh. How long after its original introduction did those, among whom it was adopted as a rule of action, adhere to it? It was not very long until its character was changed; and if the marriage engagement did constitute a bond of union between individuals, it comprehended a great many individuals; and when this became the rule of action in those primitive times, it was not long until this institution was regarded as being a very weak tie indeed; for we have, in the same divine history, an account that a man, if he wished to put away his wife, might give her a bill of divorcement and put her away.

Now, sir, it seems to me, that, in the progress of light and knowledge, and in the progress of Christianity, we have become wiser and better able to judge of our own rights and of the rights of others, and particularly of the rights of the other sex.

But, Mr. President, it is not my purpose to address myself to this subject, nor to the various views which have been expressed before this Convention; but rather to address myself to the justice of the proposition, and so far as I can, by observation and experience, fortify my mind with reasons to satisfy me whether the proposition is a just one, or not. If there be no injustice in a party in possession using that which is his own, that is one argument, I think, in favor of this proposition; if there be no reason shown, by argument offered, that the enjoyment of the right—the privilege—of thus using that which is his own, does not interfere materially with the rights and privileges of others, surely that is another argument in its favor. I cannot, therefore, see, that, in this proposition, there is anything to be apprehended. I know that the imaginations of some gentlemen seem to have been tortured by bringing to their minds, and to the minds of this Convention, images calculated to produce the persuasion of a great change that is to be produced in society at large, and of apprehension that such a provision of law will work great mischief. I can see nothing of the kind in it. It seems to me to be a very plain question. At present, except to a very limited extent, a married woman has not the power—the legal right—to make a contract in relation to property, though she may purchase property and pay for it with her own means. She has not the right to rent property, or to receive the rents and profits arising from property that she may own, and dispose of them at her own will, and to her own use. That is a matter which has heretofore been entirely under the control of the husband. Now, it seems to me, that, what we have to guard against—and I look at things as they present themselves to me—what we have to guard against is, the improvident use and disposition of property which comes with the wife into the marriage engagement, when the husband shall prove to be unworthy of the trust and incapable of managing it in such a manner as to preserve it for the support of the wife and offspring.

Mr. President, it seems to me that I can address myself to the sympathies, and to the lofty bearing, if you please, the high-toned feeling of both old and young in this Convention in respect to this matter.

We have, sir, in our country—as there are in all circles, perhaps—a class of beings, in the shape of human beings, yet possessing none of the elements or qualities of those beings who came pure from the hand of the Creator, and who were created in the image of the great Creator of the universe. I refer, sir, to a class of beings, to be found in almost every section of this country, who come to our homes—to our domestic firesides—who insinuate themselves into farmer's houses throughout the country, with their fine clothes, their soap locks, and their imperial; they approach the plain and unsophisticated daughters of the farmer, make themselves extremely agreeable and acceptable to them, and create an idea in their minds that they, to be sure, are calculated to make any lady happy. Well, sir, they are heartless beings. Thousands of them seek not the woman, but the money which she has, or which her parents may give her. They indeed present themselves to our imagination in no other view than simply that of offering themselves to engage in the marriage contract with the daughter of the plain farmer, asking him, indirectly, to be sure—for this is really the truth of the matter—asking him how much he will give to have his daughter married to a gentleman with soap locks.

Well, sir, if our daughters are to be thus imposed on, at least, let us do the best we can to provide a security that they may, after they shall have been led into this deception, and into an engagement of marriage, and after it shall have been consummated—when it is too late for securing many other important rights—let us provide that they shall at least have some protection for their property; let them at least be protected in the use of whatsoever property they may have, be it either personal or real.

I have heard a great deal said, sir, about the danger of producing schism and discord and division of feeling between husband and wife if this proposition should be carried into effect.

Mr. President, I can speak both from observation and experience to some extent in respect to this matter. For more than a dozen years just such a state of things as has been held up to awaken the dread and apprehension of this Convention has existed in my own family, and I have found it no cause of discord. On the contrary I feel well assured that in consequence of the management of property which my wife has in her own name, and which she has well managed for the last twelve years, from the attention she has given to that subject she is infinitely better qualified now, should I be called away, to manage the affairs of the family than she would have been if she had not taken charge of that property at my request.

Mr. OWEN. I have risen, sir, at this stage of the debate, chiefly for the purpose of endeavoring to render it somewhat more brief, by preventing, if that be possible, the introduction of extraneous matter, which, in my view of it, has nothing to do with the present debate.

In the first place, I ask, that the sections and amendments now under consideration may be read by the Secretary.

The sections, amendment, and amendment to the amendment were read, as follows:

"Women hereafter married in this State shall have the right to acquire and possess property to their sole use and disposal; and laws shall be passed, securing to them under equitable conditions, all property, real and personal, whether owned by them before marriage or acquired afterwards, by purchase, gift, devise, descent, or in any other way; and also providing for the registration of the wife's separate property."

The amendment proposed by Mr. Holman is as follows:

"Every married woman shall have the right to the exclusive use and benefit of all real estate and every interest therein of which she may be seized or possessed at the time of the marriage, or of which she may become seized or possessed at any time, during coverture, by devise or descent, or in any manner other than by gift from her husband or in fraud of third persons; and laws shall be passed securing to the wife, on equitable principles, the use, issues, and profits of her separate property, and a just interest in her husband's estate, in the event of the dissolution of the marriage contract by death of the husband or otherwise."

And the amendment to the amendment, by Mr. Nave, is as follows:

"No law shall be passed whereby the property owned by a feme covert at the time of her intermarriage, or by her acquired subsequent thereto, either by inheritance, gift, grant, devise, or otherwise, shall ever be taken for the debts of the husband, contracted before or after said marriage."

Now, Sir, who would have supposed—who that had listened to the debate on yesterday, more especially, could have imagined—that the question before the Convention was the substitution of one or other of these amendments for the section reported by the committee? No one surely.

Mr. President, it is not for me, it is not for any delegate of this Convention, to dictate to his fellow delegates what course they shall pursue in debate; yet I may be allowed to express the opinion, that instead of wandering off in aimless flights of fancy, we should have done well to treat this subject, as it deserves to be treated, in a plain, earnest, straight-forward, business-like manner. We have surely, sir, heard enough by this time about bright eyes and winning smiles and mysterious influences and mystical unions and this Anglo-Saxon man, who figures so largely sometimes in our discussions, and I know not how many other irrelevancies.

The question legitimately before us is a plain and simple, and, I may add, comparatively a restricted one. It is a question, however, in which is involved one of the most sacred rights of the citizen, the right of property. It is a question concerning the rights of one-half of the citizens—not the inhabitants—the white citizens—of this State.

The question resolves itself into two inquiries; first, as to the justice, and secondly, as to the policy, of granting the right referred to.

I shall say a few words in the first place in reference to the former branch of the inquiry and in reply to the remarks made yesterday by the gentleman from Dearborn, who has spoken well, and generally in a proper tone and spirit. He has said, that he does not agree in the opinion I have expressed, that women, if they had (as I do not propose that they shall have) the right to vote and to select those who legislate for them, would find their rights as to property better attended to than now they are. The gentleman said, (for I took down his words at the time,) "We may be selfish in all the other relations of life, as politicians, in our commercial dealings; but in regard to women we can never, never neglect them." Our apparent neglect to confer upon married women rights of property is, in his view of it, no real neglect. We withhold these—such is his argument—because if we attempt to introduce any new rule on this subject and make wives independent owners of property, we shall "risk the destruction of the fair harmony which now exists," and shall "invade the sanctity of the marriage contract." A word or two about this invasion of the marriage contract by-and-by; but for the present, let us pursue the inquiry whether the neglect in question is real or apparent.

I desire to ask the gentleman from Dearborn a question, and I should be glad if he would answer it now. In the first place, I remind him, that, in the case of the death of a husband, there cannot be, as to the widow left behind, any question in regard to conjugal relations; and, therefore, if property be withheld from her, it cannot be from the apprehension spoken of by the gentleman, that we may introduce discord into families.

This being so, I ask the gentleman from Dearborn whether he thinks we have dealt fairly by women as widows? whether he thinks the law of descent, in the case of a husband dying intestate and childless, a just one? I ask him, whether it imposes such checks only as are salutary and proper; and whether, if women had had a chance to select and instruct our law-makers, it is not likely that a fairer measure of justice would have been meted out in their case? I ask him, whether he holds it to be fair and just, that, if a husband die without a will, leaving neither children, nor father, nor mother, nor brother, nor sister, and leaving property, with a yearly rental say of one hundred and fifty dollars—yes, sir, I will leave it to the gentleman's own sense of justice to say, whether, in such a case, it be right or equitable, that some aunt or uncle, or even some cousin, or cousin's child, should take two-thirds of the estate, a hundred dollars of the rental; leaving but the poor residue of fifty dollars for the support of the widow? I am sure he will not maintain that justice is done by such a law.

But now, sir, I pray you to bear in mind what the gentleman from Wayne told us the other day, that some twenty-five years ago, being a member of the Legislature, he sought to procure a change in this iniquitous law of descent; that he was ridiculed for his pains, and his project scouted and put down.

Take, in connection with this, the attempt made by myself some thirteen years ago, as I have already stated to the Convention, to amend this same law. I shall never forget the torrent of abuse it brought down upon me; such an attack, in truth, as I never experienced in any legislative or deliberative body, before or since. And, since I have touched this subject, I will say here, in passing, that I consider myself indebted to the Convention for the courtesy with which I have personally been treated throughout this discussion. He must have small experience of public life, and know little of human society, who, when about to introduce and advocate a novel change of the peculiar character of that now under consideration, did not feel, that he ran no little risk of being attacked, however unjustly, in a violent and personal manner.

But to return from this digression. It is thirteen years since, after a violent debate, a change was effected for the better in this law of descent. Was this change, moderate and insufficient as it was, maintained? No, sir; five or six years afterwards, when our code was revised, even this small mitigation of the original statute was discarded, and it fell back to the old heartless law, the same to which I have just referred.

Now it will not do to say, that these humane changes have been resisted, lest thereby that conjugal harmony which the gentleman regards as the offspring of the common law, should be disturbed. Then why have they been resisted? Why has the land been so long cursed with this legal injustice? Is it not because the injustice is done to women? to those who have no votes, or voice in the matter? Have they not been neglected? I appeal to the gentleman himself for the answer.

I ask him also to justify another matter in connection with this subject; namely, the rule of the Common Law, which gives to a widower, if he has, or has had, children by his deceased wife, the "tenancy by the curtesy," that is, the rents and profits, during his life, of the whole of his wife's real estate, while to the widow, under similar circumstances, one-third of the rental only is assigned. Will the gentleman defend or excuse this favoring or trusting of the man, and this mistrusting and disfavoring of the woman? Is not the woman, as to her children, the more trustworthy? Ought she not to have been trusted, even in preference?

Mr. HOLMAN (interposing). I have never undertaken to justify or defend our law of descent, in these particulars.

Mr. OWEN (resuming). I was very sure the gentleman's sense of justice would not permit him to do so. And glad I am to find, that some of these old laws infringing so flagrantly on the rights of women, are beginning to be regarded as they deserve.

But now, as to the policy of the change proposed. And this brings me to the comparison made by the gentleman between the two great rival systems, the Common Law and the Civil Law.

Sir, these rival schools of law divide between them the civilized world. Each has its admirers and supporters among men distinguished for their talents and legal ability. Neither is to be spoken of without respect, or uncereemoniously condemned in terms of sweeping censure. Each has its advantages. Each must also be confessed to have its defects.

If it should be thought to savor of presumption in me, that I, not bred a lawyer, should enter on a discussion as to the relative merits of systems of law with one of the profession, I say here, in my defense, that I have been compelled to give to the subject of law not a little attention. It became necessary to the due fulfilment of the public duties with which I have been charged, that I should thoroughly investigate, not the various details of law, indeed, but its general rules; the leges legum, as Bacon phrased it; the laws of the laws; the great foundation principles that underlie and govern all laws; by the study of which we learn the spirit of all laws, and the rules by which to classify, and the standard by which to test them. I need hardly add, that I have read, as every public man ought, Coke, Blackstone, Kent, and other similar works, including the standard authorities on international law. If I now mention this, it is merely that I may escape the censure incurred by those who touch on matters to which they have given no sufficient attention.

If I understood the gentleman from Dearborn aright—or if not, I will here give way for his correction—he condemns the Civil Law as a whole, and prefers, in all things, the Common Law to it. Well, sir, if such be his opinion, it differs from that of legal writers of the greatest experience and highest reputation. I concede to him, that in everything which concerns civil and political liberty, in all principles determining the relations between government and people, in all provisions, also, for personal security in criminal cases, the Civil Law cannot be compared with the free spirit of the English and American Common Law system: and to this may in part, doubtless, be attributed that national superiority and prosperity to which the gentleman from Dearborn has adverted as the characteristic of nations governed by the Common Law when compared to others living under the Civil Law rule. In accordance with this view, we find, that in Louisiana, various guards of civil liberty, and personal privileges, incorporated in our bill of rights, and peculiar to the common law have been borrowed thence and incorporated into their civil law code.

But as regards private rights and personal contracts, and the duties thence resulting, the civil law, beyond all reasonable question, stands pre-eminent. In these departments it is as far in advance of the common law, as is the common law superior to it in its governmental relations. This view of the case is admitted even by Kent, no partisan of the civil law, certainly. Speaking of its provisions as to contracts between individuals, Kent admits, in his commentaries, that there is "no system of law in which principles are investigated with more good sense, or declared and enforced with more accurate and impartial justice."

It seems to me, then, the part of wisdom, to act in this matter, in the spirit of the text, which bids us "prove all things and hold fast to that which is good;" not to remain wedded, with exclusive preference, to the one system, and to reject, with sweeping condemnation, as the gentleman from Dearborn seems disposed to do, every part and parcel of the other; but to take from each its best portions; those most in accordance with the mild spirit of modern civilization and the progressive advancement of the age. Kent tells us, that in England, "a national prejudice against the Civil Law was early formed and too much cultivated by English lawyers;" and I fear, that though my friend from Dearborn is an American, not an English lawyer, the remark is not without its application to him.

I turn, now, to the gentleman's argument deduced from the domestic felicity of the English home circle as compared to continental Europe, France especially; where, he asserts, no such thing as true home feeling, and quiet fire-side comfort is to be found. Without adverting, at this time, to the injustice which prejudice has often done to the French in their domestic relations; without doing more than simply to remind the gentleman that Germany and Holland (truly domestic nations) are included in the category; I turn once more to an opinion of Chancellor Kent, somewhat at variance with that of the gentleman from Dearborn as to the influence of the civil law on the character of women. Here are Kent's words, already, on a former occasion, quoted by me, but which will well bear repetition: "Whatever doubts may arise in the mind of a person educated in the school of the Common Law, as to the wisdom or policy of the powers which, by the Civil Law, and the law of those modern nations that have adopted it, are conceded to the wife in matters of property; (the very case of my friend from Dearborn!) yet it cannot be denied, that the pre-eminence of the Christian nations of Europe, and their descendants and colonists in every other quarter of the globe, is most strikingly displayed in the equality and dignity which their institutions confer upon the female character."

The institutions of the Civil Law, says Kent, confer "equality and dignity on the female character." This is strikingly displayed, he tells us, in the pre-eminence of Continental Europe. Here is a great variance of opinion between Kent and the gentleman from Dearborn. If we borrow from the Civil Law but a single principle, says the gentleman; if we concede to married women, as that system does, independent rights of property, we "risk the destruction of the fair harmony that now exists." The Common Law elevates: the civil law degrades; that is, in brief, the drift of the gentleman's whole train of argument. Far other is the opinion of Kent—"It cannot be denied," says he, that the rights accorded by the Civil Law "confer equality and dignity" on the female character. And this, too, I pray you to observe, in virtue of the powers which, under the Civil Law are "conceded to the wife in matters of property;" the very powers which my friend from Dearborn denounces as an actual "invasion of the sanctity of the marriage contract." No two opinions can be more widely at variance than those of Chancellor Kent and the gentleman from Dearborn. I leave it to the Convention to decide—on sober re-consideration, I believe I might almost leave it to the gentleman himself to decide—between them.

But a word more in regard to the happy homes—almost proverbially so—of England, and to the source whence the gentleman thinks that happiness has its birth, the pecuniary dependence to which the Common Law reduces the wife. I can speak in this matter, from actual experience. Half my life time was spent in my native country. Of course, then, I am likely to know more of its habits and customs and the effects thence resulting, than the gentleman, who, as I think, has never visited it. I may be unduly partial to the country of my birth; yet I do believe, that, so far as regards those classes fairly removed above want, the circles gathered round the domestic hearthstone throughout the British Isles comprise as happy and harmonious groups as are to be met with in any other nation on earth. In the families of England, and in those of America, like to the land of her ancestors in this, there is, I concede it to the gentleman, as much of that "fair harmony" of which he speaks, as he himself claims for them.

But whence its origin? Has it birth in pecuniary dependence? Does England owe to the Common Law doctrine, her domestic happiness? She does not; for the best of all reasons; and that is, that doctrine does not, as a general rule, but in exceptions only, regulate in practice the property of English married women. The gentleman from Dearborn is entirely mistaken in supposing, that the practice of conveying to trustees for their benefit, and this custom to which he objects, of ante-nuptial contracts, are confined, in Great Britain, to the nobility and very wealthy alone. The practice is universal. Of this there is sufficient proof in the statement endorsed by Kent, that half the real estate of England is vested in nominal owners, on account of trusteeships growing out of the practice of marriage settlements. Half the land of the kingdom! Think of it! It shows, what has come under my own observation; that in England the general rule is, where property comes by marriage, to make a settlement for the wife's benefit; and that the cases where the property is abandoned to the husband, as the Common Law provides it shall be, and the gentleman thinks it ought to be, are the exceptions only; and rare exceptions, too. The married women of England may be said to be living, as to property, under the Civil Law rule.

What becomes of the gentleman's argument now? It is turned against himself. In a country where evasion of the Common Law on this subject is the rule, and conformity to it the exception; where almost all married women, having property, become, through the intervention of trustees, the independent owners of it; in that country, by the gentleman's own admission, is most especially to be found that domestic harmony, which he would have us believe flees away at sight of a wife with any rights to property at all.

I have myself known hundreds of families in England, where such arrangement of property, by trusteeships, was made: and I never yet heard it intimated, that any domestic dissention grew out of the arrangement.

I remark, further, that this English evasion of the Common Law is harsher towards the husband than the Civil Law rule, itself; it usually requiring the consent of the trustee as well as of the wife, to transfer any part of her property to the husband.

If, now, I am asked, why, if this be so, the plain, straight forward Civil Law rule has not been adopted in England; I reply, first: that the extreme reluctance of the English courts to depart from ancient precedent, is, doubtless, one cause; and I do not think it is doing the legal profession much injustice to conjecture, that the heavy fees incident to the complicated machinery of the trusteeship system, may be another.

But in this country, the gentleman may, perhaps, remind me,—in this western country, this wholesale evasion of the law is not commonly practised; and upon this fact he may base an argument, that, if not in England, here at least, we are satisfied with the Common Law rule, in all its strictness. The argument would be without any foundation whatever. We abstain from adopting this cumbrous and complicated system, simply because it is cumbrous and complicated, and, as such, unsuited to our habits. Whether we like the general law or not, we seldom, here in the west, trouble ourselves to escape, by special contract, from its provisions. There, for example, is the law of descents. I undertake, with that law in my hand, to canvass any county in the State—the gentleman shall have choice in selecting it anywhere, from the Michigan line on the north, clear down to the Ohio River—and, if I do not get nine out of every ten of the inhabitants to condemn it, and to sign a petition for its repeal, then I will admit, that I know nothing of human nature. Yet how often is that law evaded by a will? Not in one case out of five, certainly; perhaps hardly in one case out of ten. Such is our habit. We take things as we find them; sometimes without inquiry; sometimes putting off to a to-morrow, which never arrives, our resolution to change them.

For this reason, it is the more necessary that our general laws should be good and just ones. Such as they are, they will usually govern, even in cases where special provision is made, whereby individuals may, at their pleasure, modify or rescind them.

But the gentleman from Dearborn further defends this common law rule, descending to us as it does, from ancient feudal times, by the assertion, that it "conforms to the natural fitness of things." I trust he will not impute it to me as presumption, if I ask him, at this juncture, a few legal questions.

It needs not that I remind one versed in law as the gentleman is, that, if the husband acquires by marriage, along with other property of his wife, certain choses in action, as the phrase is; that is, notes or other demands due to her; it needs not, I say, that I remind him, that these become actually the husband's property only after they are reduced to possession by him; and that if, before he has succeeded in reducing them to possession, the wife die, they are no longer his, but descend to her heirs. But has the gentleman ever pursued this matter a little further? If he has, he knows that if, in order to realize these choses in action, the husband find himself compelled to ask aid from a Court of Chancery, it is the custom of the court to require, that he shall make, out of the expected proceeds, a reasonable provision for his wife and children. Thus, so long as the husband proceeds, without legal process, to turn into money the debts and demands due to his wife, equity stands aloof, and sees him appropriate, unchallenged, the proceeds to his own use, or surrender them to satisfy a creditor's claims; even if, by so doing, he leave his wife and her little ones, in case of accident to himself, wholly without resource. But, if it so happen, that he must resort to chancery for assistance, then equity is wont to step in and require, before she gives the aid demanded, that, as the condition on which it is given, the wife shall have something secured to her. And this, according to the maxim favored in chancery courts, that "he who seeks equity should do equity." Why he should not do it, who is not compelled to seek it, is a question in ethics which I commend to the gentleman's attention, and to which, I think, he will find some trouble in replying.

To the uninitiated it certainly seems a somewhat startling inconsistency, that, where the husband is taxed with no expense, encounters no difficulty, he takes from the wife the whole; but where he incurs costs, and trouble, and delay, he is compelled to surrender to her a part. I am too dull to see in this any remarkable conformity "to the natural fitness of things." If the gentleman from Dearborn can enlighten me on this point, it will be very much, I think, to the credit of his ingenuity.

There is another provision of the Common Law of which I remind the gentleman, and which does not seem to me to have much "natural fitness" about it.

If a woman, at the time of marriage, be indebted, the husband, as the gentleman doubtless knows, becomes liable for the debt, and it may be recovered by action against him, provided judgment be obtained while the wife yet lives, but not otherwise. Thus, if a wife, owning a millner's store perhaps, brings to her husband a stock of goods, worth four or five thousand dollars, owing thereon a single thousand dollars, and the husband refuse to pay; and, after suit brought against him but before judgment rendered, the wife die, in that case, the husband holds the goods, and is exonerated from payment of the balance due for part of the very goods he holds. Will the gentleman defend this rule? I remind him, that, even to some of the English courts, wedded as they are to the Common Law, its injustice has been so apparent, that they have scrupled to recognize and enforce it. The gentleman will find a reported case before Chief Justice Talbot, in which a strong effort was made to charge the husband, after his wife's death, with a debt of hers to the extent of the property she had brought him, which greatly exceeded the debt.

Lord Nottingham, impressed with the hardship of the case, and not seeing, I suppose, much of the "natural fitness of things" in this Common Law rule, declared, that he would alter the law; but the Chief Justice said nothing less than an Act of Parliament could do that, and that the rule could not be disturbed by a court of equity. It has accordingly remained undisturbed to this day. One of the reasons given by Lord Talbot why it ought not to be disturbed, is remarkable enough: "If relief ought to be given," said he, "against the husband because he received sufficient property with the wife, then, by the same reason, if the wife had brought no fortune to her husband, and judgment was recovered against him during coverture, relief ought to be afforded to the husband against this judgment." Very true. The one rule of the Common Law is quite as unjust as the other. Both are contrary to conscience and justice between man and man. Why the law should not be changed, and relief be granted in both cases, I leave to the eulogist of the Common Law, my friend here from Dearborn, to explain.

The gentleman called in question an assertion made by me, or by some other gentleman, that "woman occupies an inferior position in society"—legally, of course, was meant. Now, leaving out of view the right of dower, which confers upon the wife, while she remains a wife, no actual right of property whatever, but only a sort of partial veto power, whereby she can prevent her husband from conveying real estate except by an incumbered title,—leaving this profitless right out of view, wherein does the relative position of husband and wife, under the Common Law, unmodified by statute, differ, as to property, from that of the Mississippi planter, and the slave that works his cotton field. If the gentleman, or any other gentleman, can perceive and can point out the difference, I should like to have him do it, here and now. I shall gladly give way for the purpose.

There is no difference. In both cases the individual wronged has not the right to own personal property. In both cases the individual wronged has not the right to derive revenue from real estate. The wife has the right to demand necessary apparel. So has the slave. The wife has the right to subsistence. The slave, too, may demand that from his master; and, as in the case of the wife, the law of any slave State will enforce the demand. The claim of the slave who toils from earliest dawn till darkness closes around him, on the hot cotton fields of Mississippi—just that claim and no more—the claim for necessary food and raiment—may enlightened woman, the pride and ornament of civilized society, demand, at Common Law of her husband.

And yet we are told by gentlemen, whose sincerity cannot be doubted, but whose clearness of perception in this case seems woefully at fault, that woman, in law, under this system, is the equal of man? His equal? Whenever I can be made to perceive the legal equality existing between a Southern slaveholder who owns everything and his negro who owns nothing, then may I also believe that the common law makes woman the legal equal of man; but not till then.

"No gentleman here," says my friend from Dearborn, "proposes to attack the rights of women." I dare say not. It would be a difficult matter to attack anything impalpable, invisible, non-existent. We cannot very well take away what is not there to take. (Laughter.) We can more readily seize and touch the viewless winds of Heaven, than to lay hands on the wife's rights to property under the strict Common Law rule. The one has an existence. We can feel if we cannot see it. It is far more tangible than the other.

But there is a charge of the gravest character brought against the Civil Law rule as to the property of the wife. "It invades," says the gentleman, (and others, in this discussion, have said the same)—"it invades the sanctity of the marriage contract." I regret to see a topic so utterly irrelevant dragged into this debate. Has the gentleman duly considered the character and the bearing of this accusation? Half the nations of the civilized world live under the Civil Law. Have they all invaded the sanctity of the marriage contract? Not Louisiana alone, on this continent, but a dozen other States,

New York, Pennsylvania, Maine, Wisconsin, and others heretofore alluded to by me, have adopted the Civil Law rule, which makes the wife an independent owner of property. Have they all invaded the sanctity of the marriage contract? What says Judge Story of this civil law rule, thus unceremoniously denounced? "There are," says he, "in the Civil Law system (in regard to the rights of property between husband and wife) a great many admirable provisions; and I am not sure, as a whole, whether it does not work better than the Common Law on this subject." What says the same eminent jurist of such a change as that now proposed? He says, that the Common Law rule "requires great alterations and amendments for the protection of the property of married women, coming to them after as well as before marriage." He approves, then, the change which the gentleman considers an invasion of the sanctity of marriage; and could not, of course, so have regarded it. Judge Story and my friend from Dearborn differ widely here. Had he not better reconsider his opinion? He may vote against the sections under consideration; but, in so doing, he ought to bear in mind, that the principle contained in them—not the exact words, of course—has been approved and endorsed by one of the most able and enlightened jurists of modern times.

Nor is this all. Our own State, by the law she passed four years ago, granting to the wife as her separate property all rents and profits of her real estate, effected a radical alteration in the Common Law principle on this subject, and has already, if the gentleman's argument be good for anything, "invaded the sanctity of the marriage contract." Shall we deem all those who voted for that law—even ourselves for tolerating it—guilty in this matter? I do not see how the gentleman, if he adhere to the premises, can avoid the conclusion; for this change as to real estate was, in fact, a greater innovation than that I now propose to add to it, by securing to women personal as well as real property.

And, finally, I believe the gentleman has even himself justly incurred a portion of the reproach which his argument virtually casts on all innovators in this matter. The very amendment he has introduced to the sections as reported, is an encroachment on the Common Law rule. Is it, on that account, an invasion of the sanctity of the marriage contract? I leave the gentleman to settle that question with himself.

To one other remark of the gentleman I must, for a moment, advert. "The husband," he told us, as a vindication of the justice of the common law rule—"the husband, on the death of the wife, takes none of her property, while she is always entitled to dower in his."

That is a strange defense of the Common Law. As to personal property of the wife, the husband takes none of it at her death, for the very sufficient reason that it is all his already. It became his, absolutely and irrevocably, at the moment of marriage; and a man cannot very well take the same thing twice. As to real estate, if there be no children, it is true that it goes from him to the wife's heirs; but if there be children—by far the most usual case—its rents and profits are his for life, as tenant by the curtesy.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not as the law now stands.

Mr. OWEN. If the gentleman refers to the law on our statute book, I have only to say, that it is an encroachment on the Common Law; one of those encroachments which the gentleman fears may disturb domestic felicity, and break up the kindly relations that should exist between husband and wife.

In conclusion, sir, as to the gentleman from Dearborn, I cite a question which he put forth: "Are not the weak," said he, "already protected by the strong?" After the specimens I have given him of the Common Law, and the exposition I have made of the true legal position in which the wife is placed by its provisions, I am willing, I believe, to abide by the answer he himself may make to his own question.

I have a word now to say to my friend from Hendricks (Mr. Nave). I ask him, in the first place, whether he has ever been a flat-boatman?

Mr. NAVE. I have not.

Mr. OWEN. Well, I have. I have dwelt for months on a flat boat, trading with the planters of the Lower Mississippi; and I claim, therefore, to have had more experience as to the honesty and mode of dealing, in Louisiana and the adjoining States, than the gentleman, studying law at home, is likely to have obtained. At a former period of my life I was occupied, somewhat extensively, in the raising of stock—cattle, horses, and mules—for the lower market. And I can say, as the result of my experience, that, for every dollar I ever lost by bad debts in Louisiana, with her Civil Law code, I lost twenty in Mississippi, where, I believe, the Common Law rule, as to the wife's property, still prevails. The argument of the gentleman from Hendricks was, that the effect of the Civil Law doctrine in Louisiana is evinced in the fate of the thousand unfortunate traders who, in that State, are swindled out of their property in consequence of its existence there. The facts are unfortunate for his theory. I see over the way my friend from Gibson, (Mr. Miller,) who has traded down the river far more frequently than I, and I will ask of him, whether, in dealing with the Louisianians, he has found, in consequence of the prevalence among them of the Civil Law, any greater difficulty in collecting debts than elsewhere, in Common Law States?

Mr. MILLER of Gibson. In reply to the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) I state, that, in all my dealings with the people of Louisiana, they have uniformly paid me promptly; the only delay being the three day's grace allowed by custom there, after a note falls due. In Mississippi, on the contrary, I have often had great difficulty in securing debts, and have had many losses.

Mr. OWEN. I see another gentleman here, one who I know has made his fifteen or twenty trips down the river, and who may be able to give us some testimony on this subject; my friend from Warrick (Mr. Graham).

Mr. GRAHAM. My experience is similar to that of the gentleman from Gibson.

Mr. OWEN. Still additional testimony. It was an unfortunate allusion made by the gentleman to Louisiana and the commercial probity and promptitude of her planters. In Mississippi, a Common Law country so far as I know, it has been found much more difficult to obtain prompt payment, or even payment at all, than in Civil Law Louisiana.

But the gentleman is even more unfortunate in another respect. After deploring the consequences of the Civil Law rule to the creditor, and opposing on that ground the sections as reported, he himself introduces an amendment providing that the wife's property, real and personal, shall be exempt from seizure for her husband's debts. I ask the Secretary to read the amendment offered by the gentleman from Hendricks.

The amendment was read by the Secretary as follows:

"No law shall be passed whereby the property owned by a feme covert at the time of her intermarriage, or by her acquired subsequent thereto, either by inheritance, gift, grant, devise, or otherwise, shall ever be taken for the debts of her husband contracted before or after said marriage."

Mr. OWEN. Exactly, sir. The wife's property is placed by the gentleman's amendment beyond the reach of the husband's creditors. The gentleman thus himself becomes the author of a proposal, containing the identical feature which he considered so obnoxious and dangerous in the law of Louisiana! I have done with the gentleman from Hendricks.

I had a few words to say to the gentleman from Putnam, who sits next to me, and regret to see that he is not now in his seat. I desired to remind him that he had given a general challenge to all comers to controvert the position assumed by him, namely: that the principle of the Civil Law embodied in the sections on your desk is "contrary to the spirit of the Christian Scriptures." And I desired to add, that I was ready, either now or at any future time, to join issue with the gentleman on that point.

The gentleman from Putnam (Mr. Badger) talks much about "what the people expect," and about "what they were promised on the stump," and seems to protest against our even mooted any thing here that does not come under that category. What was promised to the people from the stump in Putnam county, I know not; nor is it very essential to know. If the gentleman from Putnam declared to the people of his county, that he would never vote to restore to married women those rights of property which have been so unjustly withheld from them, I cannot help it; nor, though his action in the premises may be a very proper guide to him, is it any guide to me, or the rest of his fellow-delegates. No gentleman has a right to dictate to another, in this Hall, what he shall or shall not introduce. We are independent, and each judges for himself.

Throughout the entire canvass in Posey county, from the very first meeting held to the last, I mooted, before the people, the reform embodied in these sections. It obtained, with hardly an exception, the assent of the people there; a sober, quiet, reflecting people, I will take occasion to say; not at all given to wild innovation.

But if it had never been discussed there or elsewhere during this canvass, it would not alter the right or wrong of the question. If any proposition be just in itself, if it be clearly conducive to human welfare, and if, in addition, it be suitable for incorporation in an organic law, that proposition should have our votes, no matter if it had never been spoken of during the canvass. And if it be just and expedient that women should be recognized as independent owners of property, what place so appropriate to assert a right thus unjustly withheld, as in that Constitution, where all the important rights of the citizen are set forth and permanently established?

[About this time the gentleman from Putnam (Mr. Badger) entered and took his seat.]

Mr. OWEN. I am glad to see the gentleman from Putnam in his place. I repeat to him, what I said in his absence, that I am ready and willing now, or shall be prepared at any future time, to join issue with him on his assertion, that the rule of the Civil Law contained in the sections under discussion, is "contrary to the spirit of the Christian Scriptures." He assumes the affirmative; I undertake the negative. And I will add, that if the gentleman succeeds in proving his position, I shall at once withdraw all support from the sections, and here publicly pledge myself to vote against them.

I shall now briefly advert to the speech of the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Clark). That gentleman, in opposing the proposition before us, goes back, for his weapons, into somewhat remote antiquity. He cites examples from the history of ancient Rome. He reminds us, among other things, of some of the incidents connected with the repeal of the Oppian law, some two hundred years before the birth of Christ, when the Roman matrons demanded their rights, and were rebuked for that demand by Marcus Porcius Cato. If we look fairly at the circumstances connected with that episode, they do not tell, I think, very favorably for the argument of the gentleman.

Let us see, in the first place, in what company, in those old days, the proposal to deprive women of their rights to property, is found. Not in very reputable company, I think; but the Convention shall judge for itself.

I have here the volume of Livy whence the gentleman drew his authorities, and find quoted the provisions of the Oppian law. That law, passed during the heat of the Punic war, enacted, that "no woman should possess more than half an ounce of gold, or wear a garment of various colors, or ride in a carriage drawn by horses, in a city, or any town, or any place nearer thereto than one mile," &c.

Here was a law depriving women, single, it would appear, as well as married, of the right to possess more than a very trifling amount of property. As to married women, our Common Law goes further still, for it does not permit a wife to possess, in her own right, even a penny-worth of gold. And does the gentleman from Tippecanoe propose to renew, in our day, the propositions associated with this old disqualification as to property? Are we to have a sumptuary law, forbidding women to indulge in garments of various colors, and robing them, from head to foot, in one uniform Quaker hue? And are they to be compelled, in all our towns and cities, to traverse the streets on foot, no matter how great the storm, or how deep the mud may be? If the Romans are to be quoted for precedent, let us carry the matter fairly out, and adopt this triumvirate of restrictions at once.

But, in seriousness, is not the very association of such propositions an indication of the rude character and spirit of the times in which the rule which deprives woman of property had birth?

The Roman matrons, we find, took a deep interest in the deliberations which were to decide their rights. And this circumstance, as the gentleman from Tippecanoe reminded us, stirred the indignation of Cato, well named the Censor, and caused that denunciatory harangue, of which he has quoted a portion. He has omitted, however,—ashamed of it, perhaps,—the Philippic therein introduced against the matrons, because they ventured to approach the scene of the discussion of their rights.

"It was not," said this proud and harsh dictator, "it was not without painful emotion of shame, that I, just now, made my way into the Forum, through the midst of a band of women."

It would seem that in those days, as now, they whose rights were at stake sought the scene of debate. Whether the matrons of that day were as fair as those who, during this discussion, have graced our Hall with their presence, may well be doubted; but this we do see, that neither on that occasion nor on the present have the sex shown that indifference to their legal rights which some gentlemen have ascribed to them. I return to Cato's speech.

"Had I not," he proceeds, "been restrained by respect for the modesty and dignity of some individuals among them, rather than of the whole number; and been unwilling that they should be seen rebuked by a Consul, I should not have refrained from saying to them: 'What sort of practice is this, of running out into public, besetting the streets and addressing other women's husbands? Could not each have made the same request to her husband at home? Are your blandishments more seducing in public than in private? and with other women's husband's than with your own? Although'—listen, I pray you, Mr. President, to this concluding sentiment—"although, if females would let their modesty confine them within the limits of their own rights, it did not become you, even at home, to concern yourselves about any laws that might be passed or repealed here.'"

"Even at home," says Cato. It is unbecoming, he thinks, for a woman to speak, even to her husband in the privacy of home, about any law which he and the rest of his sex choose to pass or to repeal, touching the rights of women. That is the old Roman's doctrine. Does the gentleman from Tippecanoe think it entirely accordant with the mild and Christian spirit of modern times?

So much for Cato's denunciation of the matrons of Rome. But there is another side to this picture. There was a reply made to this speech which the gentleman has omitted to notice; a good reply, too. Lucius Valerius, one of the Plebeian tribunes, and who had made the motion to repeal the law, commented upon Cato's attack upon his countrywomen as follows:

"What new thing, let me ask, have the matrons done in coming into public in a body? Have they never before appeared in public? I will turn over your own Antiquities and quote them against you." (This was an allusion to a historical treatise by Cato, on the antiquities of Italy.) "Hear, now, how often they have done the same, and always to the advantage of the public. In the earliest period of our history, even in the reign of Romulus, when the capital had been taken by the Sabines, and a pitched battle was fought in the Forum, was not the fight stopped by the matrons running in between the two armies? When, after the expulsion of the kings, the legions of the Volscians, under the command of Marcus Coriolanus, were encamped at the fifth stone, did not the matrons turn away that army which would have overwhelmed the city? Again: when the city was taken by the Gauls, where was the gold procured for the ransom of it? Did not the matrons, by unanimous agreement, bring it into the public treasury?"

That was a hard hit, Mr. President, and I think that Cato, impassive as he was, must have felt its force. When the matrons had the right to money that was the use they made of it! Ay, sir, and if the matrons of our own Revolution, instead of being deemed, by the common law, unworthy of any right to property, had been, like the Roman matrons, capable of holding it, do you believe that, in the "days that tried men's souls," they would have shown less public spirit than did their sisters of Rome? Who will say so? Who believes it? But I proceed with the reply of Valerius:

"In the late war, not to go back to remote antiquity, when there was a want of money, did not the widows supply the treasury? And when new gods were invited hither to the relief of our distressed affairs, did not the matrons go out in a body to the sea shore to receive the Idæan mother? The cases, he says, are dissimilar. It is not my purpose to produce similar instances; it is sufficient that I clear these women of having done any thing new. Now, what nobody wondered at their doing, in cases which concerned all in common, can we wonder at their doing in a case peculiarly affecting themselves? But what have they done? We have proud ears, truly, if, though masters disdain not the prayers of their slaves, we are offended at being asked a favor by honorable women."

I will take that speech, any day, as an offset to Cato's peevish diatribe. It procured, as it well deserved to procure, the repeal of the Oppian Law. Spite of Cato and his censures, the rights of women prevailed, as I hope and believe they will to-day, in the face of the opposition that is still made to them.

But the gentleman from Tippecanoe has remarked that the law proposed by me "may answer very well for the rich, but does not suit the poor."

The very reverse, sir! emphatically the reverse! We have already legislated for the rich, and if we had not, they commonly know how to take care of themselves. To the rich the common law itself is no rule. By trusteeships and ante-nuptial contracts they constantly evade its provisions. And our statute aids them in this. A woman who is a land-owner is already protected by our laws, and has been for four years past. Her rents and her profits are her own separate property. The proposal before us, the very sum and substance of the sections, is to mete out to her less wealthy and less fortunate sister the same measure of protection. It is to secure to the wife personal property, as we have already secured to her real estate. And who, among our women here in Indiana, are usually those whose property is personal alone? And what sort of personal property is owned by the great majority of young girls about to be married here? Is it bank stock, or railroad stock, or other similar securities, to a large amount, as in the large cities on the Atlantic border it often is? No, sir; such cases are rare; they are mere exceptions here. The general rule is, that if a girl about to be married in Indiana is possessed of only personal property, that personal property is, to a small amount, usually household furnishings, with, perhaps, a few head of cattle or horses; on an average, probably, not exceeding in value one or two hundred dollars. It is this class of women who will chiefly be protected by the rule embodied in the sections under consideration.

And if it be said, that because the amount of this personal property is usually small, it is of no great consequence whether it be protected or not, I reply, that small as it is, it is the poor girl's all; as much to her, as to others may be their thousands or tens of thousands; a portion of it, perhaps, endeared to her by early recollections, or as the gift of a parent soon to be numbered with the dead. Be its amount great or small, she is as much entitled to have it legally protected and secured to her, as if she were heiress of princely wealth, the possessor of millions.

Mr. President, I have spoken on the present occasion, because I was unwilling that some of the remarks, made by the opponents of this measure, should go forth to the Convention and to the public, unnoticed and without reply, and not, I desire distinctly to say it, because I desire here to see closed the discussion on the sections under consideration. I am willing at the proper time, that they should abide their fate; to be voted down if they be wrong; to be incorporated in our Constitution, in some shape or other, if the principle they embody be right. But let us hear the reasons for adopting or rejecting, and discuss in accordance with their worth, the various amendments that may be offered. I am by no means desirous of cutting short debate, or hastening the vote upon this question. No good cause ever lost ground yet by having time afforded to consider its details. I am rather desirous that definitive action should be postponed upon the question until it shall come up again in regular order for final adjudication. We have seen already, with regard to the Grand Jury question, that the discussion had here upon its merits has done good. Public sentiment which was not very extensively consulted in regard to that question during the canvass is coming back to us. Let us take the same course with regard to the present question. The debate already upon it has elicited useful interchange of opinion; and a postponement of final action for one or two weeks will afford time for further thought and more deliberate judgment.

Mr. BLYTHE. I would inquire of the Chair whether it would be in order now to propose an amendment to the original section? I understand there is an amendment pending to strike out and insert.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would inform the gentleman that there is pending an amendment to strike out and insert a substitute for the original section. The gentleman has a right to amend the original section.

Mr. BLYTHE. Then I propose the following amendments to the first section:

Amend section—, by striking out the first and all the second line to the word "law," and also the word "them" in the third line, and inserting in its place the word "women;" also the words "gift and devise," in the fifth line; and inserting between the words "purchase" and "descent" the word "or;" and also the residue of the section after the word "descent," in the fifth line.

So that it will read—

"SEC. —. Laws shall be passed securing to women, under equitable conditions, all property, real and personal, whether owned by them before marriage, or acquired afterwards, by purchase, gift, devise, or descent."

The PRESIDENT having stated the question upon this amendment,

Mr. READ of Monroe said:

Mr. PRESIDENT—With the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) I most deeply feel that no subject more important than the one now before the Convention will occupy our attention—nay, can occupy it during its session. It is a subject which most intimately concerns the happiness and welfare of our daughters, our sisters, our mothers, our wives. There is no family in Indiana—not one—which is not interested in the result of our deliberations upon this most momentous subject.

The law of husband and wife, as it exists in theory, is, I hesitate not to declare, a disgrace to this age of Christian civilization. I do not mean to say that the actual condition of married women in our country is one of degradation and slavery; but if it is not such, it is because the sentiment of the age rises above the law. It is because there is a law reigning in the hearts of Christian men which is above the law of the land.

I do not stand here to advocate the political rights of women. But even in regard to these I will adopt the words of an eminent lawwriter in saying, "they form a positive exception to the grand doctrine of equality. Women have no part in the formation or administration of government. They cannot vote or hold office. We require them to contribute their share in the way of taxes to the support of government, but allow them no voice in its direction. We hold them amenable to the laws when made, but allow them no share in making them. This language applied to males would be the exact definition of political slavery; applied to females, custom does not teach us so to regard it. Perhaps it would be difficult to deduce from any abstract reasoning the justice of making this their political condition. But we know it always has been what it now is, and there is no prospect of changing it; and probably the most refined and enlightened of that sex would be the last to desire a change, which would involve them in the turmoil of politics."

Why, sir, the very negroes and mulattoes, whom we propose to exclude from the State for the very reason that we cannot admit them to terms of political equality, have all the political rights of women.

No man upon this floor proposes any change in this respect. But, sir, I do insist in the name of every generous sentiment, that from this very consideration we, their brothers, fathers, and husbands, who claim that in our persons we represent them, are the more sacredly bound to guard and protect their rights. Did I speak of generosity? There is, sir, no generosity in the case. It is a question of justice which is before us—that simplest form of justice of which Justinian speaks—the rendering to each one his own. The question is not what part of the husband's property the woman shall have, or whether, indeed, she shall have any of it. It is simply whether, under the Constitution of Indiana, she may have her own property—that which comes to her from her parents—that which is given her by a brother—that which is earned by her own hands? The question is, whether in declaring the great and fundamental right of acquiring and possessing property, we shall say that married women may have any rights of property?

Mr. President, when I think of the simple, naked question, divesting myself of the prejudice growing out of long established usage, it is to me a matter of utter amazement that we are here seriously debating the propriety of granting a right so fundamental in its character that it would seem to belong to the most abject of the human species.

The writers on natural law tell us that the highest title of property which any human being can have, is that of maker. The celebrated Locke says that the labor of a man's body, and the works of his hands, are properly his. But, sir, even this most sacred title will not avail the married woman. It will not stand against the husband's grog bill! The product of many a day's toil and labor, bestowed with all the earnestness of woman's busy care, are not, under our laws, safe to herself and her children against the debts of a profligate and spendthrift husband.

The spirit of the common law in relation to husband and wife is fully breathed forth in the very technology which it uses in designating the parties. It calls them baron and feme—the LORD and his WOMAN! The day a woman is married, however different in the heart of the husband, this is the relation in the eye of the law. From this day she has no more rights of property than has the slave of her lord. Over his property, or her own, though it may have been millions, she has no legal power whatever. Her contracts, except as his servant, are void.

For a living her claim is exactly that of the slave—for the necessities of life—and this, though she may have brought him the very fortune which he is spending in riotous living.

This, sir, is the law—this the law which has been praised for its tender regard to the female sex—the law which, on this subject, has been pronounced, on this floor, the same as that of Christianity—the law which, according to the gentleman from Dearborn, (Mr. Holman,) has made England and the United States the scene of the felicity and virtues of domestic life beyond all the countries where the civil law and its principles prevail. The common law of England, for which so much is claimed in making happy and virtuous homes, is the basis of our law as now existing, and, humanized by a few alterations, is in fact the same.

But let us look at this system in its original symmetry, and mark its provisions for promoting connubial happiness, and the dignity and elevation of the female sex. Here I adopt the language (abbreviating it) of Christian, the celebrated annotator upon Blackstone.

If the baron (the lord) kill his feme, it is the same as if he killed a stranger. But if the feme kills her baron, it is treason, and her punishment is, to be drawn and burnt alive.

Women, not being entitled to plead benefit of clergy; might be executed for the first offense in simple larceny, bigamy, manslaughter, &c., however learned they were, merely because their sex precluded the possibility of their taking orders, though a man who could read was, for the same crime, subject only to burning in the hand, and a few months' imprisonment.

A son, younger than all his sisters, (and of course an elder one,) took the whole real estate, leaving sisters utterly unprovided for; while the personal property, in case of intestacy, was divided equally among brothers and sisters.

A woman's personal property, by marriage, becomes absolutely her husband's, which, at his death, he may leave entirely away from her [this, I blush to say, is this day our own law, under which a man, by marriage, may receive thousands, and the very next moment, will every dime of it from his wife]; but if he dies without will, she is entitled to one-third if he has children, if not, to one-half.

By marriage, the husband is absolutely master of the whole profits of the wife's land by the curtesy, in case he has had by her a living child; but the wife by dower, has her third only. This is now the law in Indiana!

The husband can be tenant of the trust estates of the wife, though the wife cannot be endowed of the trust estates of the husband.

With regard to the property of women, there is taxation without representation.

In regard to chastity, it is protected from violence; but the only mode by which the parent has redress in case of seduction, is by alleging that his daughter is his servant, and that in consequence, he has lost her service, or by alleging a trespass upon his close.

Female virtue is perfectly exposed to the slanders of malignity and falsehood; for any one may proclaim in conversation, that the purest maid or the chastest matron is the most meretricious and incontinent of women, with impunity. Thus female honor, which is dearer to the sex than their lives, is left by the common law to be the sport of an abandoned calumniator.

Blackstone says, by the old law the husband might give his wife moderate correction. For, as he is to answer for her misbehavior, the law thought it reasonable to entrust him with the power of restraining her by domestic chastisement.

Mr. President, this is the common law in regard to females, too much of which remains to this day—most of it, indeed, so far as relates to their rights of property. Does my friend from Dearborn seriously think that this system has had anything to do in making the happy homes of England and America? Does he think the graces of character and purity of life which distinguish our women, are the result of the coarse and unjust legal system—coarse and unjust so far as they are concerned—under which they have lived? No, sir; other causes have made our firesides what they are. Christianity—Christianity, with its hallowed and blessed influences, which, in Great Britain and the United States, exercises a wider and more controlling power in families than anywhere else—it is this which has so elevated and purified the females of our land. The same great influence has placed the women of Scotland, which is a civil law country, in every virtue, by the side of our own women. The gentleman has committed the common logical error, called by logicians non causa pro causa. He has assigned quite the wrong cause for an existing state of facts.

But, Mr. President, we are told of the Anglo-Saxonism of the present law of husband and wife. The injustice and cruelty of the system was by no means congenital with that race of which we so often speak, and from which we claim to derive our origin. Here is the picture which Tacitus presents of their marriages, while yet in their native forests of Germany: "The bride brings no portion; she receives a dowry from her husband. In the presence of her parents and relations, he makes a tender of a part of his wealth; if accepted, the match is approved. In the choice of presents, female vanity is not consulted. There are no frivolous trinkets to adorn the future bride. The whole fortune consists of oxen, a caparisoned horse, a shield, a spear, and a sword. She, in return, delivers a present of arms, and, by this exchange of gifts, the marriage is concluded. This is the nuptial ceremony, this the bond of union, these their hymeneal gods. Lest the wife should think her sex an exemption from the rigors of the severest virtue, and the toils of war, she is informed of her duty by the marriage ceremony, and thence she learns that she is received by her husband to be his partner in toil and danger, to dare with him in war, and suffer with him in peace. The oxen yoked, the horse accoutred, and the arms given on the occasion, inculcate this lesson, and thus she is prepared to live and thus to die. These are the terms of their union : she receives her arms as a sacred treasure, to be preserved inviolate, and transmitted with honor, a portion for their wives, and from them descendible to her grand-children." Such were the rights of the wife in the very cradle of the Saxon race.

Mr. President, the law of husband and wife, as now existing, had its origin at a much later period, under the feudal system—that system which regarded war as the great business of human life—a system which, from its very design, paid little respect to the rights of minors and females, whether married or unmarried,—a system of tyranny which, for centuries, held its iron sway over the rights of men, and is not even yet eradicated from the legal code. The grand principle of the system is, that all property is held upon the condition of military service. As women could not take the field as soldiers, their rights were not acknowledged, or they were disregarded and trodden down. Under this system—not in Christianity, which gives rights to women and takes none from her—originated the common law doctrine of baron and feme.

Such, Mr. President, is the power of custom and usage over the reasons and consciences of men, as utterly to blind them to enormities which would otherwise shock their sense of justice. The African slave trade was an example of this strange perversion of the moral sense of men, through the power of custom. Upon this principle alone can I account for it, that we do not cry aloud against that wickedness and iniquity which, upon marriage, strips a woman of all that is her own, and gives her no fair reciprocity in the property of her husband.

When we mention any particular case of cruel injustice, we are told it is but a single case, and hardships will exist under any system. Such cases have been given as occurring by the sanction of the law, and that they do not often happen, is owing to the moral sense of men and to public sentiment. One such instance which awakened great sympathy, and which was mentioned to me by the lawyer who had examined the case, I will state : A lady worth about $10,000 married a man worth nothing. In some six months, the man dying, under some diabolical influence willed the whole from her. She had no remedy. Under the statute of distribution it was found that she could hold nothing. Now, sir, I grant you such cases are not common ; until men turn into wild beasts they cannot be ; but so far as the law is concerned, they may occur just as often as there is a concurrence of circumstances rendering them possible. I charge this very case, and all like it, upon the law. The law is in fault. We, as Christian men, are in fault for allowing the law to continue as it is. In the case I have named, the money was, upon every principle of justice, the woman's, and should, by law, have so continued, notwithstanding the marriage.

But the gentleman from Dearborn tells us, we shall mar the simplicity and brevity of our legal system, and render it voluminous and complex, by providing laws to give married women their own property. No where in the world, Mr. President, are the laws so simple and brief, as where there are no legal rights at all. In the Asiatic countries, the laws are simple enough in all reason. The despot has all the rights—the people none. Their code is a short one. Is not the very reason, why, according to the common law, the system so far as relates to women is so short and simple, that the lord has all the rights, and his woman none?

There is, on this subject, an advancing public sentiment, which is exhibited in all our later American law writings, and in the ameliorated legislation of the country. We are not proposing an experiment. We propose, in declaring the great right of acquiring and possessing property, to make some declaration, in behalf of married women. We do not approve the reason of the law, nor its humanity, which, in order to promote a union of interest between husband and wife, strips the wife of all her rights, lest, perchance, she should be tempted to assert them. We believe that proper laws, securing the rights of the wife, will afford the true home-stead exemption, and so far from working discord in families, will promote unity, and in cases of adversity, in many instances, prove the sheet anchor of their safety.

Mansfield, of Cincinnati, who is known to be sufficiently conservative upon all questions of reform, makes the following remarks, in his late work upon the rights of women :

"There are, doubtless, amendments of the laws of property, in relation to the wife's control over her own property, its release from the debts of the husband, her capacity for separate business, and her rights of dower, which may, and ought to be made. There is, at this time, very little doubt, that from the tendency of public opinion, and the general progress of liberal principles, all such amendments in the law as seem really to promise any social improvement will be made."

He says further, in speaking of what has been done : "the reader will see in the following pages, detailing the laws of the United States, in relation to women, how great has been the improvement in the laws of inheritances already made, an improvement which has done more to equalize the people of the United States than any other legal measure could have done. It must be recollected also, that this was an improvement which did not necessarily follow either the establishment of our national independence, or the formation of our Constitution. Both these events left the municipal laws, with regard to property, as it found them. It was the general effect of the principle of liberty, acting on the people, and through them on the State Legislature, which abolished, everywhere in the United States, the feudal principles of inheritance."

The question being now demanded from different parts of the house—

Mr. BLYTHE said, before the question was taken, he would like to modify his proposition by striking out the words included in brackets in the above copy.

The PRESIDENT said, the gentleman had a right to modify his amendment as he might see proper.

Mr. DOBSON said, I suppose, from the indications, and especially from the quiet which we have just now, that perhaps the ammunition of gentlemen is pretty much exhausted; therefore, if every gentleman has said all that he desires to say, I will move to postpone the further consideration of the subject, until it shall come up in the regular order of business.

SEVERAL VOICES. "No, no, no."

Mr. DOBSON (resuming his seat). Oh, I'll take it back again, if any gentleman wants to speak.

Mr. OWEN. If I understand aright the gentleman from Vanderburgh (Mr. Blythe) he proposes to alter the words in the first of the two sections, "to their sole use and disposal." I have no special objection to this; but I ask the gentleman whether he has any objection still to retain a declaratory clause, say in this form: "Married women shall have the right to hold property to their own use?" Or whether he objects to this also, as perhaps conferring certain undefined rights, which may be claimed before the actual passage of the laws contemplated in this section?

Mr. BLYTHE. I will explain the motive which I had in view in offering the amendment, and that, I suppose, will furnish a sufficient answer to the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen). It has occurred to me, sir, upon looking at the section, that the first clause opened up almost too wide a field. We can hardly tell what consequences will flow from the use of language of this character; and it occurs to me at present, that the language which the gentleman from Posey now proposes to use, would be obnoxious for the same reasons. As it seemed to be the main object of the gentleman from Posey to secure to women hereafter married, the right to possess and enjoy personal as well as real property, and as this seems to be the wish of all who have spoken upon the subject, in favor of the provision, my object was to confine the language to the declaration of this simple principle as near as possible. It seems to me unnecessary to go beyond the declaration, that we recognize the right of all married women to possess and enjoy the right of property. This is the object which I had in view: and my amendment relieves us from the consequences which might flow from the use of the language of the original section, as well as the language which the gentleman now proposes to use.

Mr. OWEN. If the gentleman from Vanderburgh thinks there is any objection to the modification I have suggested, I will not press it. I suppose the gentleman thinks the language would make a difference in the decisions of the courts upon the present law.

Mr. BLYTHE. That is my objection.

Mr. BASCOM. I call for the previous question.

But the Convention refused to second the call.

Mr. MOWRER. I move to postpone the further consideration of the subject, till it shall come up in regular order.

Mr. PETTIT. I favor the motion made by the gentleman (Mr. Mowrer) over the way, and I am satisfied that a large number of members entertain the same feeling. A postponement has already been suggested by the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) the mover of the proposition, in order that it might receive the attention of members who have not yet been heard upon it. I do not know but I shall desire to say something with reference to the question myself. I had drawn up a substitute for both sections reported by the committee, putting no difference between women married and women to be married. I think there ought to be no difference made in the provision. One reason why I hope this motion will prevail is this: Last evening I handed my proposition to the gentleman from Posey, for his examination, and he forgot to return it to me. It is now in his room, and I cannot have it here before dinner.

Mr. NILES. I would suggest the propriety of postponing the consideration of the subject to some certain day—say two weeks from Monday, if that day would be acceptable to the gentleman from Posey. The gentleman has intimated his purpose to be heard again upon this question, and I hope that all who desire it, may have a fair opportunity of being heard. I will take the liberty of saying, on my own behalf, that I came here wholly unprepared to vote upon this question. I was not even aware that it was to be considered at all by the Convention; but I have been listening attentively to the debate for the purpose of forming a sound and correct judgment upon the question. Perhaps I may desire to make a few remarks upon the subject whenever it shall come up in order, though I am by no means certain that I shall. The proposed change may vitally affect the condition of society. I hope it will not be precipitatedly adopted.

Mr. MOWRER. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I renew the motion of the gentleman from Henry. I am in favor of postponing this subject, and taking up every subject in regular order. I do not know what amount of business there will be in advance of this upon the calendar, but I apprehend there is a good deal. I object to postponement to a certain day; while at the same time, I sympathize with the gentleman on my left, (Mr. Niles,) who has suggested such a course for the purpose of enabling him to cast a judicious vote. But I would prefer the proper order, for the reason that I, also, have been absent, and heard but little of the debate, and know but little of the subject, being but little acquainted with women, at any rate. Perhaps in the mean time, after looking over the subject and learning something of its merits, when it shall come up in regular order, I shall be prepared to define my position, and I hope also, by that time, that my friend on the left—knowing with what facility he can gather up his ideas—will be prepared to give us a learned dissertation upon the subject.

The PRESIDENT. If gentlemen will take the trouble to turn to the 28th Rule, which reads: "All questions relative to priority of business, shall be decided without debate"—they will perceive the duty of the Chair in the premises.

The question being first taken upon the motion to postpone to a certain day, it was rejected.

And then the motion of the gentleman from Ripley (Mr. Smith) was agreed to.

POLL TAX.

The PRESIDENT having announced the order for the presentation of resolutions and memorials—

Mr. McCLELLAND presented a petition from sundry citizens of the county of Randolph, praying the Convention "so to amend the Constitution that henceforth and forever, no tax shall be levied or collected off the polls of the citizens of the State of Indiana," and moved that the paper be referred to a select committee of five members.

The petition having been read through by the Secretary,

The motion to refer to a select committee was rejected.

Mr. EDMONSTON said, the matter contained in this petition had been already before the standing committee, to which it would naturally be referred; he therefore moved to lay it upon the table;

But the motion being immediately withdrawn—

Mr. BASCOM said, that he, himself, with other gentlemen from his portion of the State, were instructed upon this very point, and they were desirous of acting here in accordance with the known will of their constituents. They were aware that the subject had been already referred to the standing committee on finance and taxation. Now they wanted this petition to go to a select committee, and for this reason he hoped the Convention would not lay the subject upon the table. The people of his county were opposed to a poll tax. They believed their property to be the legitimate subject of taxation, and not their heads.

Mr. McCLELLAND said, in addition to what had already been advanced, there were many reasons going to show that the citizens of every portion of the State had a right to be heard by way of petition, and that their representatives should have the right to set forth some of the reasons why their prayer should be granted. The standing committee had already come in with their resolution upon this subject, and it would be wrong again to refer the same thing for the action of the same committee; and to be unceremoniously cut off by laying the petition upon the table, he thought it would be treating the petitioners very discourteously.

Mr. EDMONSTON asked for the reading of the petition; and accordingly it was again read through by the Secretary.

Mr. HOLMAN said, the question had not yet been before the committee just in the shape that it was brought up by this petition; and, notwithstanding the fact that the subject had been acted upon to some extent, he would be glad if the petition could be referred to a select committee, according to the wish of the gentleman who had presented it. If this could be accomplished only by a re-consideration of the vote just taken upon the question, he would make that motion. If the reference was made, probably some reason would be given for the course which the committee might take.

This motion was agreed to; so the vote by which the Convention refused to refer the petition to a select committee was re-considered.

And then the question recurring upon Mr. McClelland's motion to refer to a select committee of five members, it was agreed to.

GOT THROUGH.

The PRESIDENT then proceeded to call the committees for reports; and the committee on county and township organization being called,

Mr. SMITH of Ripley stated that this committee had got through, and reported upon every subject which had been before them, and therefore he would move that they be discharged from further duties.

SEVERAL VOICES. "No," "no," "no."

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would inform the gentleman from Ripley that it would be rather out of the common order of doing business to entertain his motion.

Mr. SMITH thereupon withdrew the motion. He had only thought to save the time and trouble of calling over the committee every day.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATION.

The PRESIDENT announced the order for the consideration of resolutions, under the amendment of the rules, making Saturday resolution day, and stating that there were a number of resolutions which had been referred to the committee of the whole, not likely to be considered there, and he asked what would be the pleasure of the Convention in regard to them?

Mr. DOBSON remarked that gentlemen had been looking out for precedents, going outside of the State, and even beyond the continent, in quest of them, and he thought it would be well enough to have the sanction of a precedent for the action of the Convention in this case. He recollected that the Convention which formed the State Constitution in 1816, at a certain state of their proceedings found themselves encumbered with a pile of papers, and they ordered the Secretary to burn them. He recommended this as a good precedent for the action of this body with reference to those resolutions which had been referred to the committee of the whole.

The PRESIDENT said, these resolutions had reference to the subject of the apportionment of representation.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe moved to refer them to the committee upon that subject.

Mr. EDMONSTON observed that there was no necessity for such a reference. The committee had already reported upon that subject.

Mr. CLARK withdrew his motion.

And then on motion by Mr. EDMONSTON, which was agreed to by unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the resolutions lie upon the table.

THE LICENSE LAW.

The resolution originally offered by Mr. Robinson on the ninth instant, instructing the committee on the legislative department to report to the Convention a section to be placed in the new Constitution, prescribing that the General Assembly shall neither pass nor continue in force any law authorizing license for the sale of ardent spirits, next coming up for consideration—

Mr. EDMONSTON moved to lay the resolution upon the table, but withdrew the motion for

Mr. OWEN, who moved to change the phraseology so as to make it a resolution of inquiry; Which motion was agreed to;

And then the resolution was adopted by unanimous consent.

THE HALF HOUR, RULE.

The PRESIDENT next announced the consideration of the following resolution offered by Mr. Sherrod on the twelfth instant, which was read by the Secretary:

Resolved, That no member, in making a speech upon an original proposition or resolution, shall occupy more than "thirty" minutes, and on amendments more than "ten" minutes.

Mr. SHERROD. That resolution was laid on the table, but I will now move to take it up for consideration.

The PRESIDENT. The Journal does not show that it was laid upon the table.

Mr. SHERROD. It was, however, laid upon the table by a vote of this Convention.

The yeas and nays were demanded and ordered upon Mr. Sherrod's motion.

Mr. OWEN. I would ask whether a motion take a proposition from the table is debatable?

The PRESIDENT. It is not debatable.

The yeas and nays being taken, the Secretary reported—yeas 66, nays 25—as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Badger, Balingall, Bascom, Beard, Berry, Blythe, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Carter, Coats, Colfax, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dobson, Duzan, Farrow, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Gordon, Hadson, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Newman, Pepper of Crawford, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Todd, Trimby, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Zenor, and Mr. President—66.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Barbour, Beach, Carr, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Crumbaker, Edmonston, Fisher, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Hall, Kinley, Miller of Clinton, Milroy, Mooney, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Niles, Owen, Pettit, Smith of Ripley, Taylor, Work, Wunderlich—25

So the resolution was taken up.

Mr. CARTER proposed to amend, by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting the following:

"That, after Tuesday next, no member of this Convention shall speak more than fifteen minutes on any amendment, and then only by way of explanation, or more than thirty minutes on any original proposition."

Mr. CARTER. The object which I have in view in offering this amendment, is, to cut the wind of some of our four-mile horses. I want, if possible, to get through with our business here before crop-time next spring.

The amendment was agreed to, upon a division—yeas 49, nays 34—and the question recurred upon the adoption of the resolution as amended.

Mr. EDMONSTON. Is it in order now to amend the resolution?

The PRESIDENT. It is in order to amend by adding new matter, but not by striking out.

Mr. EDMONSTON. Would it not be in order to strike out any of the words of the resolution?

The PRESIDENT. It would not.

Mr. EDMONSTON. Then I am opposed to the resolution; for, if we are to adopt this arrangement, I wish to tie all down alike. If we are to tie down our four mile horses, I wish the ponies, also, to be tied up to the rack along with them.

Mr. RITCHEY. I have heard the speeches of some of our four-mile nags—I have heard them by the hour, when hardly two ideas could be gathered from their remarks. I wish to proceed with business better than we have heretofore; and we must proceed, or we shall not get through before next harvest. We have been here already six weeks, and yet not one single point has been settled, that has occasioned any difference of opinion. When, sir, do you think we shall get through at this rate? I tell you, sir, we shall never get through, unless we adopt some other course of proceeding. If a man have any ideas at all, it is my opinion that he can express them in half an hour. But, unfortunately for this body, many of the speeches here have not been so full of ideas as of words. I voted, when this resolution was first before the Convention, to lay it upon the table; but I am now satisfied that I was wrong, and I shall vote for its adoption.

While I am up I will take this occasion to say that I pledged myself to my constituents, while upon the stump, that I would be a conservative so long as I might hold a seat in this body. I told them that I was opposed to embarking in the wide ocean of political experiment—that I was against engrafting any provision in the Constitution of the State, which had not been fully examined, and which was not generally demanded by the people. And, sir, I say now, here—and I wish it to be distinctly understood—that if, in the amended Constitution, this body shall lose sight of the old land-marks of experience, which have obtained in the State government for the last thirty odd years, I will pledge myself to employ whatever lawful means may be in my power, to procure the rejection of the instrument which may be submitted to the people, so that we may, at least, get back under the wholesome influences of the old Constitution. Sir, there are but a very few prominent objections to the old Constitution; and, if the old Constitution had contained a provision by which the people could have amended it by means of the Legislature, this Convention never would have been called. Some three or four, or, perhaps, half a dozen amendments to the old Constitution, are all that the people have desired; whilst we have been sitting here, day after day, proposing and debating changes which the people have not demanded, and do not desire; and we have been here already about as long as the people expected it would require to complete our labors. I hope, therefore, that the Convention will be willing to act upon every proposition promptly, and allow us to hope that we may yet return to our homes in some reasonable time.

Mr. CARTER. If the gentleman on my right, (Mr. Edmonston,) intended by his remarks to class me with the ponies, I desire to let him know that I have a disposition to travel well.

I have occupied the floor but twice during the last six weeks—during the session. Once I made a few remarks on the Grand Jury system, and then only for the purpose of stating that I could not vote for the resolution of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, but that I would favor a change or modification of the system; and once I stood up to offer a motion to adjourn.

But, sir, with reference to the resolution under consideration, I would, if possible, go even further than the terms of my amendment. I would not only stop the four-mile horses, which have proved themselves possessing more wind than bottom, but I would say that hereafter gentlemen shall have the privilege of reading their speeches by their title, with a standing order for their publication. If such a rule were to be established, the Convention would not only be relieved from the hardship of hearing interminable lectures, but the public interests would be subserved, by the time which would be saved for the transaction of business. Sir, I want to obtain a good Constitution, with as little expense as possible, either of time or money, and this is a common feeling among the people.

Sir, how much of your forty thousand dollars appropriation has already been expended, and where will it be by the last of November? And where will be the advantage of your labors if you procure the rejection of your work? It is true that you have passed upon and adopted the principle of biennial sessions of the Legislature; you have decided that certain officers of State shall be elected by the people, and their terms shall be limited; and you have said, after a long discussion, what no man in this State has opposed for the last ten years, that there shall be no imprisonment for debt. And what more have you done? Nothing. But still the cry is, let us have more speeches—speeches for home consumption—speeches for Buncombe, and nothing else. And I agree with the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Gregg,) when he asserted that every long speech which gentlemen shall make on this floor will be to their own injury and political destruction.

Sir, it is my object to tie down this spirit of debate and discussion. Here we have been three or four days, consuming our time and the money of the treasury, doing what? Discussing woman's rights, without coming to any conclusion; and still gentlemen have postponed the further consideration of the subject, for no other reason, that I can see, than to have a rehearsal of the former arguments.

We were a week on the Grand Jury resolution; and there, again, we did nothing. We were sent here for some other purpose than for blowing Buncombe wind. I desire to see what will be the effect of the adoption of the resolution, upon the business of this body; and I want the yeas and nays called, so that the people of the State of Indiana may see who in this Convention are working men and who are men of wind.

Mr. GRAHAM of Warrick. The gentleman who has just taken his seat has passed his judgment upon the deliberations of the Convention; and he has gone so far as to declare upon what ground his people will accept or reject the amended work—their acceptance or rejection depending entirely upon the length of time in which we may be engaged in concocting it. I profess to represent a constituency of a very different temper. They do not look to the length of time we may be engaged here; they look to the principles which may be adopted, and their applicability to the general welfare.

The gentleman affirms that all the long speeches made here have been exclusively for "Buncombe;" and that they answer no good purpose here. I do not wish to be uncharitable, but I will say, that if there was anything but "Buncombe" in the last speech of that gentleman, I am not capable of perceiving it. I can see no other object which the gentleman could have in view; I am able to see nothing in his remarks which does not indicate a desire to be thought a leader of that party (of which we find many leaders in every community) commonly styled the dollar-and-cent party—a party looking not to the value and importance of fundamental principles so much as to the cost of maintaining them—a party proceeding upon the principle that whatever comes cheap in legislation and jurisprudence, will be acceptable to the people.

Sir, I have myself been interested and enlightened by the discussion in which we have already been engaged; and I hope to find interest and improvement in the discussions that are still before us.

The gentleman from Johnston (Mr. Ritchey) says we should take up the consideration of no subject here, which has not been canvassed before the people and upon the stump; and he seemed to assume that every necessary amendment had been discussed in Johnson county—as though there were no other people in the State.

Mr. RITCHEY (interposing, and Mr. G. giving way,) said, I wish to correct the gentleman. I did not assume any such thing. I did not pretend to say that the people of Johnson county had discussed all the propositions to amend the Constitution, which have been agitated throughout the State of Indiana; but I did say, that those questions which have been generally discussed throughout the State are the only questions that ought to be acted upon here. My objection was urged against the practice which has obtained here, (and which has detained the Convention some five or six weeks,) of discussing questions that are almost entirely new to the masses of the people, so far as known to me.

Mr. GRAHAM (resuming). Still I ask, what is the legitimate inference from the gentleman's remark? Is it not that we should not entertain any question here, which had not been discussed in Johnson county, for does he not mean that when he instances matter of debate here which had not been discussed in the session of the State from which he hails? I think such an inference might be fairly drawn.

With regard to the proposed gag law, I have only to say that, by our rules, as they now stand, we have the power to stop discussion at any time, whenever the majority of the body may desire to do so. We can call the previous question, and whenever debate has proceeded to a wearisome extent, the previous question ought to be sustained, bringing the Convention directly to a vote. So long as we have the power, therefore, why should we gag the speech of members? I hold that every question proposed upon this floor should be fairly considered—that its friends should have a right to give their views in its favor; that those who are opposed to it should have a right to state their reasons against it—and that this right should be without restriction. I have some respect for this body; and I feel that there might be such a thing as the people of my district being heard here, without their delegate. I believe it is the right of every delegate here to exercise his own judgment, and to act upon all questions as though he were a representative of the interests and views of the whole State.

So long, then, as we have the power to stop debate, whenever a majority of the Convention think proper so to do, I am opposed to the resolution, and shall oppose it in every shape it can assume.

Mr. COOKERLY. I propose the following amendment:

The Secretary read,
"That a committee of five be appointed to inquire whether or not" _____

The PRESIDENT. The amendment is not in order.

Mr. WOLFE. If there was any hope of getting a vote upon this resolution, I would not move to lay it upon the table. [Several voices "no, no"]. Very well. I will just remark, then, that I have been looking over the committee reports in my hand, and I find that we have now before us 108 pages of reports from the various standing committees, and we have not yet disposed of more than two or three sections. If we continue to progress only at this rate, sir, when do you think we shall be able to get through? Look at these pages, and consider what we have done during the six weeks time we have been in session. Eight weeks were the extent of the time thought to be sufficient for the entire session, amongst my neighbors. Now, sir, I hold up these pages [holding a file of the committee reports] as my speech upon this resolution. We have then 108 pages, which are yet to be passed upon by sections, and afterwards adopted as a whole. Should we not be admonished that these propositions will run up and accumulate upon our calendar, just as matters do in the Legislature, until towards the close of the session, when we shall begin to hurry through them?—and whatever is done in a hurry is ill done.

Mr. NAVE here made an ineffectual motion to adjourn.

Mr. NEWMAN. It is certainly the duty of gentlemen to condense their remarks as much as possible. This duty we owe to ourselves and the country. Therefore, for the purpose of disposing of the question, I move that the resolution, as amended, be referred to a select committee, with instructions to report the following rule:

"That no member, debating any question before this body, shall speak more than thirty minutes, without special leave of the Convention."

Mr. KILGORE. I move to amend the instructions, by striking out the word "thirty," and inserting, in lieu, the word "sixty."

Mr. WOLFE (interrupting). I move to lay the subject upon the table.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Sullivan must withhold his motion until the gentleman from Delaware yields the floor.

Mr. KILGORE (continuing). I make that motion, sir, in good faith. It seems to me, if we were to adopt a fifteen minutes, or a thirty minutes rule, that such a thing would be a reflection upon the intelligence and statesmanship of the members of this body. You know, sir, that, in the Congress of the United States, whose members are selected without special regard to talent and statesmanship, they are allowed to speak a full hour; whereas, the members of this body are chosen men, charged with the most important and responsible duties—men selected for their wisdom and statesmanship, from various parts of the State. This being the case, I ask you, whether it would be doing ourselves justice to declare that fifteen minutes or half an hour of time is long enough for any one of us to express our views? I am willing to say we shall be restricted to one hour; for I do not believe there are ten men upon this floor who would commonly desire to occupy more than that length of time. I really do not think it would be treating our four-mile horses well, at this period of the session, to limit them to fifteen minutes or half an hour. For there are some of those whom I know to be very modest men; and they have not been manufacturing capital either for Buncombe or for Montgomery. They have hitherto allowed the younger members to occupy the time with making speeches to their constituents, and now, having enjoyed this advantage so long, I ask whether it would be generous and fair for them to place this limit upon others? And besides this, the reported speeches will give a false idea of the statesmanship of members. For here is one man to whom the people have been looking as a man of superior ability, but his speech will occupy only about half a column of a newspaper; and then, turning back a few leaves, the reader will find his man entirely thrown into the shade by some young sprout, who has made a speech some four or five columns in length.

With reference to Buncombe speeches, permit me to remark, that the speech of the young gentleman over the way, the gentleman from Montgomery, (Mr. Carter,) must have been intended exclusively for Buncombe; and the resolution itself was intended for Buncombe. [Cries of "no, no."] Yes, sir, it was; and it will be held up in the next canvass all over the gentleman's county. As evidence of his habitual support of measures of economy, he will say to his constituents, "I once offered a resolution in the Convention, limiting all the speakers to fifteen minutes," and then, perhaps, by turning over the leaves of the Register of Debates, it might be shown where he made a speech an hour long in support of it!

I hope, sir, that the resolution will not be adopted; but that the amendment which I have offered to the instructions of the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Newman) will prevail. My people, sir, are a talking people; and they are willing to pay for my talking here, whenever I feel like it; and, as for those Delegates who are opposed to talking, I would recommend to them to remain quiet in their places; and then, before their constituents, they can point to their silence as an indication of their feeling upon this subject.

On motion of Mr. CRUMBACKER,
The Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The PRESIDENT remarked, that the pending question when the Convention adjourned was upon the motion to commit the resolution and amendments to a select committee of three, with instructions to strike out from the original resolution, (Mr. Sherrod's,) relative to restricting members in the length of speeches, all after the resolving clause and report the following:

No member shall speak more than thirty minutes "at any one time."

The original resolution as amended is:

"Resolved, that on and after Tuesday next no member of this Convention shall speak for more than thirty minutes on an original proposition nor more than fifteen minutes upon an amendment, and then only by way of explanation.

Mr. CHAPMAN moved to amend by adding that,

"No member shall hereafter have leave of absence except in case of sickness of himself or family."

Mr. COOKERLY called for a division of the question.

The PRESIDENT. A division being called for, the first—

Mr. WATTS. Mr. President, one word as to the amendment just offered. I trust that my friend from Marion (Mr. Chapman) as he is living at home, as he has but to cross a street from the Capitol to the residence of his family, will withdraw his amendment, which, if it were adopted, would operate upon other members—he being safe from its application. Is it not indecorous to the Convention, is it not in bad taste for the gentleman living in Indianapolis, to seek to restrict members who may live within twenty miles, from visiting their homes! Had the amendment been proposed in any other quarter than the one from which it comes I presume that there would be no opposition. I hope the gentleman from Marion will withdraw his amendment in consideration of the somewhat delicate position he occupies on this floor in regard to that matter.

Mr. CHAPMAN. I shall not be strenuous for the adoption of the amendment, and I would withdraw it if such was the general desire of the Convention. I shall make no objection to granting leave of absence where it is evident that it is necessary for a member to be absent with his family or on account of his own health. But, sir, I think it quite unbecoming in members who have had frequent leave of absence, while members from this county and others have attended during every hour of the session, to come in here occasionally and deliver us a periodical lecture upon our incompetency and upon the tardiness with which the public business is conducted. There are those upon this floor who have had frequent leave of absence, and who have been but for a small portion of the time in their seats attending to the progress of business who, when they do come here, improve the first opportunity to consume the time of the Convention by haranguing us upon our slow progress, declaring that the people are in favor of a short session and short speeches, and delivering themselves of a general lecture as to what we should and should not do. As the object claimed for the resolution before the body is economy of time and money and the expedition of business, I think we may as well go the entire length of the subject and prevent the non-attendance of members except in case of sickness.

It may appear indecorous in a member from Marion county to present the amendment which I have sent up to the Chair; it is not that I indulge in any feeling toward any members. I certainly should do the same thing if I lived elsewhere. But when properly considered, the fact of my residence here places me in no "delicate position" in offering the amendment. It provides that members may have leave of absence in case of sickness—what more is wanted? Absence for the purpose of business or pleasure? Then the rule would operate upon the members from this county equally with others, for it certainly would be very much to my interest, to have a few days or a week of leisure, to attend to business, and it certainly would be most agreeable to have a week's interval for a trip, for the double purpose of health and pleasure. Therefore it is evident that we of this county would be as much restricted by the rule as others.

Mr. President, I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. RITCHEY. I am rather sorry, on the whole, that the gentleman from Marion has withdrawn his amendment. I imagine that the speech and the amendment were both intended for my benefit—that they were aimed especially at me. I am informed that it has been the subject of remark and animadversion outside of the bar of the Convention, that I have occupied a portion of every day that I have been in the Chamber in lecturing the members upon their duties. The remark that I have been in my place but a day or two, is untrue. I have been in my place now four weeks. As to my absence, it is well known that I came up here on the day of the organization and stated that I had come up to assist in the organization of the Convention, but should be obliged to return to my home, as I then had a son lying very sick of a disease prevailing in my neighborhood that had carried off between thirty and forty persons living all around my home. I returned, however, as soon as I could leave my son without the apprehension that he would die in my absence, which was in some three or four days. But, as soon as my son had recovered, a little daughter was taken sick, but during a part of that time I was here in my seat. Now if, under these circumstances, any member will object to the amount of time I have been absent, let him say so. Sir, I have, on one occasion, in obedience to a sense of duty, and in the discharge of a public duty, left my home, and during my absence one of my children died. And now am I to be taunted that I forget my duty to my constituents, am absent a great portion of the time, and when I do come here I seize upon the first occasion to make a little "Buncombe" by lecturing the working members that they make long speeches, and do not get along fast enough? I hope that such remarks will not be repeated—even for "Buncombe."

Mr. CHAPMAN. The last charge that will be made against my course in this Convention by intelligent persons who watch its proceedings will be that I do anything for "Buncombe"

—the reverse will more likely be said of my course, for I shall certainly deem it right to oppose with whatever strength I have, certain measures, popular not only with an overwhelming majority of members here, but claimed to be most popular with the people. Neither am I here, sir, to bring in remarks made outside of this Hall for effect in debate; what I say outside of this Chamber, I am responsible for outside of it; and what I utter upon this floor I am responsible for, both to the Convention and to the community at large.

Mr. President, the gentleman (Mr. Ritchey) has lectured the Convention—when he has been here—upon the course they should take, the time consumed in debate, and “all that,” and I declare that in my judgment he is not entitled to the sympathy he expects to result from his statements and explanations. He did lecture us here in the first days of the session, because we did not sooner organize, and he has since, upon other topics, pursued the same obnoxious course. I am among the number who are restless under such castigations, and say so frankly to the Convention and to the gentleman (Mr. Ritchey).

Mr. STEVENSON. I regret that the discussion of this resolution has given rise to an exhibition of feeling, and to the severe remarks of the gentleman from Marion (Mr. Chapman). The question, nevertheless, is one of interest to ourselves and to the people, and deserves a serious consideration, void of all personal feeling. There has already been a very considerable latitude, in debate; every person has had all the time given to him while on the floor; and I think that now, with six weeks of the session already passed, the proposition in the resolution before us is fair and will work injustice to no one, while it must serve to expedite business and bring nearer the close of our labors. Half an hour is certainly long enough for any member to occupy at any one time in debate—by condensing, not the argument, but the remarks, gentlemen will be able to express all they desire to in that time, and frequently in fifteen or twenty minutes.

A speech of half an hour occupies about one-fourth of an entire day's session, and will fill two columns of the paper in which our debates are published. Now, when we take into consideration that there are upon this floor one hundred and fifty delegates, all anxious to express, in one form or another, their opinions, certainly no gentleman will be willing often to occupy so much more time and space than would fall to his proportion, even when restricted to half an hour. Speeches of half an hour in length would give from eight to ten long speeches each day—four or five on each side of a question. With speeches of this length, we can fairly and fully investigate and discuss every question brought before the Convention, and still get through with our labors in a very reasonable time. If a gentleman, in discussing a proposition, does not quite finish all he has to say in half an hour, his friend upon the same side can carry out the argument. Upon amendments it will be unnecessary to occupy so much time as upon original propositions, and therefore fifteen minutes will be ample for that purpose. It is very evident that at the rate we are now proceeding, we cannot get through this winter. The country will become restless under a protracted session, and the Constitution that we shall frame and send out to the people will not be so well received as it would otherwise be. I am not disposed to repress needed discussion, nor would I knowingly “gag” any man. I am not only willing but anxious that all should have an opportunity to express their opinions and give their reasons for and against the engrafting in the new Constitution of the several propositions as they come up for approval or rejection. This is what they come up here for, and it is the valuable privilege of every member to give the reasons for the support of a measure, or for his opposition to the same. But I really think that half an hour is a liberal allowance of time for this purpose, and therefore shall support the resolution, for I am satisfied that while it will expedite business, it will work injustice to no one. I hope that the amendment proposing to let members speak longer than half an hour by common consent will not be adopted, for it will surely result in confusion and the virtual nullification of the half hour rule. For no gentleman here would refuse, on an appeal to the generosity and forbearance of the Convention, to allow a member to proceed with his speech. You will have continual appeals of this kind for indulgence, and they will always be effective to secure the privilege of speaking ad libitum. My resolution is obviously a fair one, and I hope it will not be voted down.

Mr. SHERROD. Sir, it has been remarked, I believe by the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. Kilgore) that this resolution was intended for “buncombe.” Now, sir, if acting under a high sense of the duty I owe to those who sent me here, and with an eye single only to the interests of the great masses of the people, by bringing the proceedings of this Convention to a speedy and happy close, merits this remark, I for one sir, am willing to bear the charge. And I can inform the gentleman, if he expects to deter me from my position by such remarks or declaration, he is mistaken in the man. No sir, I am here to act for those who are only interested in the best interests of our common country; sir, I am well satisfied, unless there is something done, to check this everlasting debating on the various questions that are brought up here, why gentlemen will talk an hour, on questions of minor importance, and if we continue to pursue this course, I predict, this Convention will be in session until spring, beyond a doubt. Hence sir, I am in favor of placing restrictions and limitations upon this body in debates especially.

The gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Kilgore) spoke disparagingly of some of the younger members of this body. Now I do not know whether in this he wished to allude to me or not.

Mr. KILGORE. I certainly had no intention to include the member from Orange in the class of "young sprouts" [laughter].

Mr. SHERROD (continuing). I am sure, sir, that any man here can condense his remarks within the space of half an hour. I have that good opinion of the abilities of this Convention and hope no gentleman will disappoint me by showing, by a speech of an hour or more, that I have over-estimated his powers of condensation [laughter]. In the New York Convention, the proceedings of which are so often quoted approvingly on this floor, the fifteen minutes rule was adopted. For my own part, although I have taken a deep interest in many of the propositions before us, I have not at any time occupied so much as thirty minutes in expressing my views.

I hope that the motion to commit to a select committee of three, with the instructions proposed, will not prevail, because I believe that a majority of delegates are prepared to vote understandingly upon the resolution now, and thus obviate the necessity that will otherwise occur for spending another half day upon this subject.

Mr. SPANN. Inasmuch as I voted to take the pending motion from the table, I will remark that I am now, after hearing the objections urged, satisfied that the best course would be to lay it again on the table, I therefore move to lay the motion of the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Newman) which is to commit the pending resolution to a select committee with instructions, upon the table.

Mr. WOLFE. Does this motion to lay on the table, should it prevail, carry with it the original resolution?

The PRESIDENT. It is to lay the original resolution and pending amendments upon the table.

Upon the motion to lay on the table, the yeas and nays were demanded by ten members, and being ordered, resulted yeas 24, noes 74, as follows:

AYES.—Messrs. Alexander, Beach, Biddle, Carr, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Crumbacker, Dunn of Perry, &c., Edmonston, Graham of Warrick, Hall, Jones, Kent, Kilgore, Miller of Clinton, Milroy, Mooney, Niles, Owen, Rariden, Spann, Steele, Taylor, and Wunderlich,—24.

NOES.—Messrs. Badger, Balingall, Bascom, Beard, Blythe, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Carter, Coats, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Dobson, Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami; Haddon, Hardin, Hawkins; Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of Warren, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Pepper of Crawford, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Stevenson, Tague, Todd, Trimby, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Zenor, and Mr. President.—74.

So the Convention refused to lay upon the table.

Mr. WOLFE. Is it now in order to move to lay the pending amendment upon the table?

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark, that the pending question is upon committing the resolution to a select committee, with instructions to strike out the original proposition, and report a resolution that after Tuesday next, no member shall occupy more than thirty minutes in debate, at any one time, without consent of the Convention. The gentleman from Vigo (Mr. Cookerly) having demanded a division of the question, the same will first be upon committing to a select committee.

Mr. COOKERLY. I move to lay the motion on the table.

Mr. OWEN. A few words, Mr. President, if the gentleman from Vigo will withdraw his motion?

Mr. COOKERLY. Certainly, to accommodate the gentleman.

Mr. OWEN. I should not have made the request, if I did not consider this an important matter. Let us look at the subject deliberately, and be careful, that in some heat and confusion coupled with haste, we do not take a step which the common sense of the Convention will compel it to retrace before the expiration of another week. Things done in a hurry are often done badly; done so as to be repented of afterwards.

It is quite evident, that this resolution has enlisted in its favor, wholly or in part, a majority of the Convention; and that, in some shape, it will be finally adopted. The pending question is upon the motion to lay upon the table the resolution of the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Newman). That leaves us the resolution of the gentleman from Montgomery; and his resolution is, in substance, that after Tuesday of next week, no member shall be allowed to speak more than thirty minutes upon an original proposition, nor more than fifteen minutes upon an amendment, "and then only by way of explanation."

I ask a moment's attention to the last clause. How many speeches are ever made here upon an original proposition? How long is an original proposition ever under discussion before amendments are proposed? Discussion hardly ever arises, as all our experience has shown, before amendments are proposed. All the discussions we have had, with but few exceptions, have arisen and have been predicated upon amendments. It is evident, then, that the resolution, as it is drawn, will operate not only as an unjust restriction, but almost as an absolute prohibition of debate. Even the brief space of fifteen minutes is not allowed except for purposes of explanation.

While it is upon my mind, I will remark to the gentleman from Orange, (Mr. Sherrod,) that he is partly mistaken in his statement of the rule adopted in the New York Convention. The restriction of the time occupied in debate to fifteen minutes, was not adopted until near the close of the session, when all the important propositions had been fully discussed, and when the Convention was already, in a measure, prepared to vote upon the amendments which had been debated.

But the effect of this proposition, even if the clause requiring explanation be stricken out, is to limit debate to fifteen minutes. No matter how important the subject, no matter how anxious the Convention may find itself to hear an argument finished, fifteen minutes is to be the extent of time allowed to each member in the discussion of amendments; or, in other words, in nineteen out of every twenty cases of debate that arise. Subjects the most vital to the interests of the people of Indiana, decisions to endure, perhaps, for half a century to come, will be before this body. The Convention may find itself in need of the most thorough and elaborate discussion of the principle of some important amendment, before its members are willing to take the solemn responsibility of casting a vote which may decide its rejection or adoption as a part of the organic law of the State. No matter! Speech, argument, deliberation shall not be allowed. There stands the imperative resolution that no member shall occupy more than fifteen minutes in debating an amendment, and then only "by way of explanation!"

Sir, if this resolution is passed, it will be without example in the history of deliberative bodies. What! no argument whatever upon the adoption or rejection of matters that may be a blessing or a curse to our people for half a century to come!

Are we ready to pass such a resolution? Pass it, then! It will not stand unchanged on your journals through one day's session. The gentleman himself who moved it, could never have looked narrowly to the words he used; could never have clearly seen whither his proposition led, or calculated, with any forethought, its practical effects.

Sir, the proper disposition of the various propositions which will come before this Convention, is of more practical importance to the people of Indiana than the action of twenty Congress. [Cries of "consent—consent."] And shall I not feel the deepest interest in the settlement of a question which involves the deliberate consideration of propositions destined so intimately to affect the great future of this State; the State in which for a quarter of a century I have lived! the state in which I expect to die! For one, sir, never shall my vote be given to a proposal that shall hurry through the consideration of those great questions which we were sent here to examine and decide. Never by my vote shall be passed a resolution, declaring that no member shall occupy more than fifteen minutes in the discussion of any one of these—and then only by way of explanation! It is an outrage upon common sense!

Take such a question as that which occupied our time for nearly a week, the question of the right of way for public improvements. I ask any gentleman who was present during that debate, if the provision finally adopted could have been carried without the full discussion which preceded the final vote? The ground was carried by sheer debate—carried inch by inch. When the subject first came up, the Convention were wholly unprepared to act upon it. Not only was there an almost infinite diversity of opinion, but that opinion was in an unformed, unsettled condition; and it was the contact of mind with mind, laboring to evolve the right, that finally concentrated a majority upon the provision as it now stands. In that single proposition were involved interests to the amount of hundreds of thousands—yes, of millions of dollars. Some gentlemen may think we decided wrong. No matter; it was the deliberate, well considered opinion of the majority of this body. And propositions of corresponding magnitude—yes, of greater magnitude—are yet to come up. Each gentleman has his own ideas of duty, and has a right to them. I dictate to no man; but I say, that for myself, I should consider it a violation of my sworn pledge as a delegate, were I to vote for a resolution restricting debate within such narrow and impractical limits.

More than a third of a century has passed since the formation of the present Constitution. Are we so little acquainted with the history of the world—have we so carelessly read its lessons—as not to feel that such a lapse of time renders necessary and proper many changes, many reforms, many radical alterations in unison with the progress of the age and the advance of civilization! And can we shut our eyes to the fact, that these are to influence, for good or for evil, the destinies of our children and of our children's children?

No man is more anxious to secure reasonable despatch than I am—no man more desirous to see once more his home and his family than myself. But I am not willing to purchase that gratification at expense of a solemn duty—by the sacrifice of great objects, to secure which we were sent here.

The gentleman from Johnson (Mr. Ritchey) says, he "is a conservative in principle;" that he desired to see as few amendments as possible made to the old Constitution; and that he hopes no propositions will be either debated or adopted, except those few and simple ones mooted in the canvass for delegates before the people. Everything else he wishes summarily disposed of, without question or hearing. And he has undertaken to tell us that we "were proposing changes which the majority of the people never thought of or desired." I purpose no disrespect to that gentleman when I ask him, whence he derived the right to make such an assertion? Who authorized him to lay down the rule, as to what the people of Indiana do or do not desire? He must remember that we have, in this State, a North as well as a South, and besides a South and a North, a centre. He must remember that subjects which may have engaged no attention in his immediate section, may yet have been warmly advocated in another; and that if it should chance that a few simple measures only were talked of in an Eastern county, they may not constitute the complement of constitutional reforms desired in the West. The gentleman, I presume, did not canvass the entire State before his election? How can he determine, then, what questions have been debated before the people, and what subjects have received from them no consideration? Such remarks are unadvised, and little calculated to create or to maintain good feeling among us. I repeat, that no delegate is more desirous of reaching his home than myself; yet that shall never cause me to run into an extravagance in this matter; or to pursue a false economy at expense of interests of which the value can hardly be estimated in dollars and cents. The money which our session may cost, is as dust in the balance, compared with the proper performance of the task we have here to accomplish. The main point is to make a good Constitution. It is a mere secondary consideration how long it takes us to make it. Patient deliberation is our first and most imperative duty as delegates.

I have been a member of many deliberative bodies, in and out of the State of my residence, but I have never been in one where the speeches of the members—taking them throughout—were as brief and as much to the point in debate, as in this Convention. There have been, indeed, some which might have been condensed and better arranged; and others which it would have been no loss to have omitted altogether. But this must be so in all such bodies as ours; and it furnishes no reasonable cause for complaint, nor just ground for a rule, stringent and unprecedented as that proposed on this occasion.

As to the resolution moved by the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Newman,) which allows to each member half an hour, in all cases, and a longer time with the consent of the Convention, I shall, at this time, offer no special objection to its adoption. I should never have introduced it myself, nor can I vote for it, except in preference to a more exceptionable proposal; but it is so much better than the one now before us, that, for the present, it may pass unchallenged.

I remark, farther, in relation to what was said by the gentleman from Sullivan, (Mr. Wolf,) that, while I know his anxiety to get through with business, I ask his attention to the fact, confirmed by legislative experience, that the first, and by far the largest, portion of a session is always consumed in speaking; in discussion, in doors and out of doors. At first, men's minds are unsettled. Members compare views, ascertain the ideas of others, get their own minds made up, and then, towards the close of the session, they go to voting, for they are prepared to vote. It will not do to apply to this matter the strict rule of three, and ask us, if it has taken six weeks to engross as many sections, how long will it take us to decide upon some hundred and fifty sections? If little is finally decided, much has been examined and prepared. I have often seen preliminary debate occupy seven-eighths of a session, and scarcely an eighth consumed in voting and final disposition.

The very collection of reports, voluminous as it is, which the gentleman held up to us as his speech, is a pretty good speech on the opposite side. It is an evidence of industry, and of the progress that has been made in business. These articles and sections thus reported have all been carefully considered and debated in committee, before they were brought in here to pass the severe test of the judgment of the Convention.

I have little doubt but that, at the rate we are now proceeding, we shall accomplish our business in some three months from the time of our convening; and that we shall get away not later than some time in January.

I trust, Mr. President, that, in preference to the pending resolution, the motion of the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Newman,) will prevail.

MR. NILES. MR. PRESIDENT: I can appreciate the motives of gentlemen who are in favor of this resolution, while I should deeply regret to see it adopted. It is very true, as remarked by the gentleman from Sullivan, that we have finally disposed of but few of the large number of subjects which will come before, and must be decided by the Convention. But, gentlemen will recollect that our work is all prepared, and that we have pretty thoroughly discussed the three most important questions, with only one exception, which will come before the Convention during its entire session. There does occasionally a man appear upon the stage, who can communicate his thoughts upon any subject, in a few brief and startling sentences. But such a man is the production only of a century. We can lay no claim to such ability. Who among us, could attempt to discuss, in all its bearings, such a subject, for example, as that of currency and banking, if limited absolutely to the brief space of thirty minutes?

As remarked by the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) this Convention is of more importance than any Congress ever assembled. And yet it is admitted on all hands that one hour is the shortest possible time in which questions of mere legislation and temporary expediency can be discussed in the House of Representatives. With what propriety, then, can members of this body be limited to fifteen or even thirty minutes, in debating great principles affecting the organization, and most vital interests of society? Were our action subject to be repealed or modified at the next session of a Legislature, it might be less important; but its influence may be felt for a quarter of a century, or for many generations.

I trust, then, that, anxious as we may and should be to save time and money, and to return to our homes, we shall adopt no such short-sighted policy as proposed in this resolution. I am free to say that I did not come here fully prepared to vote upon all the questions which have been submitted, and I can say, unhesitatingly, that I have listened with interest and profit to the debates which have taken place. I acknowledge my obligations to gentlemen who have expended labor and thought in preparing themselves to discuss the great questions which we are to decide. It may be that speeches have sometimes been more prolix than is altogether consistent with the most classical taste. Indeed, I myself may have been unfortunate in extending my remarks upon one occasion, to near an hour in length; and if by doing so, I have helped to prepare the way for the introduction of this resolution, I most sincerely regret—indeed I do—that I have ever uttered a syllable upon this floor—[several voices, “not so—no, not on that account.”] I can, however, assure gentlemen, that they have little to fear from me in the way of speech-making. But, if I should undertake to address the Convention upon any subject of great and practical importance, I should, under the operation of the rule proposed, be most seriously embarrassed. The reflection constantly uppermost in my mind, would be, how soon could I get through and sit down. Indeed, I should not be willing, under the operation of such a rule, to attempt to speak upon any important subject. I should not be willing to hurry through with remarks, leaving my thoughts half uttered, and in a shape liable ever afterwards to be misunderstood, and I cannot imagine but that our gentlemen must feel the same embarrassments. Without occupying more time, I will simply express the hope that the resolution now before the Convention will not be adopted in its present form. Under its operation, men would speak more frequently but less satisfactorily to themselves or others. I do not believe it would save an hour's time.

Mr. COOKERLY. I asked for a division of the question upon the motion to commit with instructions, because I did not approve of the latter. I moved to lay the original resolution on the table, but if that portion of it were stricken out which provides that no member shall speak upon an amendment more than fifteen minutes, and then only by way of explanation, the remarks of the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) were very pertinent upon that point, and I think they must convince every one of the folly of adopting that portion of the resolution.

I would move, if in order, to amend by striking out all after the provision that no member shall speak for more than fifteen minutes at one time. I would make no reference to or distinction between original propositions and amendments.

The PRESIDENT. It is out of order now to amend in that way.

Mr. NEWMAN. I was aware of that fact, Mr. President, and for that reason moved that the resolution be committed to a select committee, with instructions to report a resolution embodying the amendment I desired to see adopted, and which I should have moved had it been in order.

Mr. COOKERLY. While I wish to see this resolution amended, I am opposed to the commitment proposed by the gentleman from Wayne, because I think that now is the proper time to settle it, and right here. The minds of a majority are made up, and it can be decided just as soon as we can get a direct vote. I want to see the question met fairly and settled for the session. I am opposed to any compromise in the matter, and shall vote against the proposition to allow a speaker to continue after the expiration of their half hour by the consent of the Convention. We must do one of two things; either allow members to speak just as long as they choose, or limit them to a specified time and then enforce the rule rigidly. I do not want any clause as to extending the time by the consent of the Convention, in the resolution. The courtesy of the Convention will be appealed to by every wordy member, and the rule will be a dead letter, merely encumbering the Journal. I do not think that the speeches which have been delivered here have delayed the action of the Convention so much as the number of new and unexpected subjects of discussion which have been introduced since we convened. If this body had confined itself within its legitimate sphere of amending the Constitution, and if for the future it would only entertain that class of subjects which properly belong to it, we should soon get through. But when we assume legislative powers, and bring in matters which peculiarly belong to the legislative department of government, then we are not only out of our proper sphere, but by continuing in that course we shall protract the length of this session to six months. Now, sir, whenever a member proposes any proposition which is essentially a proper subject of constitutional reform, I shall favor its full discussion, whether I am for or against it. I have no disposition to curtail debate when it is applied to subjects legitimately connected with constitutional reform, and when it confines itself within proper and reasonable limits. And I consider that if we fix upon half an hour for each speaker it will be so reasonable and just a limitation that no gentleman can complain of it. But, sir, when a gentleman rises here and proposes any measure which has economy in view, economy of time or of money, up jumps somebody, and declares that it is done for "Buncombe." Sir, I declare that had it not been for a general desire on the part of the people to see the expenses of the State government economized, to have a system by which government should be administered at a less cost, this Convention would never have been called. For one, I came up here as a reformer, and I sustain the present resolution on the principle of economy, and I am not at all disturbed by the cry of "Buncombe." I shall steadily pursue the course I have indicated. For the purpose then, of economizing the time of the Convention and the money of the people, I am in favor of the resolution, with the exception of the clause providing that upon amendments members shall only speak by way of explanation, and but fifteen minutes at a time. Most of the necessary and useful discussion is necessarily upon amendments, and therefore the clause is an unwise and ill considered one.

But we are told that without this resolution, debate can be stopped by the operation of the previous question. I never moved the previous question, and I never intend to, but, sir, those who speak the most in this Convention are the very men who have been in the habit of calling the previous question.

After two or three hours spent in debate, mostly consumed by the "long talkers," if one of those who are considered the "small fry" gets up to offer his views upon the subject, they will pop up and move the previous question. This I condemn as wrong, and mention it to indicate to gentlemen some of the causes which have contributed to the state of feeling which they see exhibited this afternoon, and which is bound to carry this resolution in some shape. But I will not vote to restrict members to fifteen minutes upon amendments, and then only by way of explanation. I wish to be reasonable in my opposition to long speeches, and I think that clause is unreasonable.

If the gentleman from Wayne will strike out from his motion the clause providing that speakers may continue after the expiration of half an hour, I will vote for it.

The PRESIDENT remarked that the gentleman from Vigo could effect his object by moving to amend the instructions.

Mr. COOKERLY accordingly moved to amend the motion to instruct the committee so that members should not be allowed to speak beyond half an hour by consent.

Mr. CARTER. I desire to amend my own amendment.

The PRESIDENT. You cannot do that now without getting a majority of the Convention to agree with you.

Mr. CARTER. I was going to accept of the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Posey and strike out from my amendment the words "and only then by way of explanation."

The PRESIDENT. It is too late for the gentleman or the Convention to amend in that manner.

Mr. CARTER. My only object in desiring to amend is to secure the passage of the resolution. I should vote for it as it is rather than to see it lost, but am willing to modify it. I would remark that in drawing up the amendment I copied the rule in force at the last session of Congress. There, no man is allowed to speak more than fifteen minutes upon an amendment, and then only by way of explanation.

Mr. OWEN. The gentleman is mistaken in his understanding of the Congressional rule upon this subject. When near the close of a session, a bill containing a number of sections is before the House, a resolution is introduced providing that no member shall speak for more than fifteen minutes upon any amendment to that particular bill.

Mr. CARTER. I supposed it was the rule that prevailed during the session—it is published so as to give the reader that impression. But be that as it may, I consider the rule a politic one, whether in force in Congress or not.

The object, however, which I had in view in rising was to remark that I was misunderstood by some gentlemen in what I said this morning. It seems that I was understood to say that the people of Montgomery county would vote against the adoption of the new Constitution for the reason that the Convention had been so much longer in session than it should have been. What I intended to say and probably did say, was that by our protracting the session to three or four months by long speeches, thereby increasing the expenses of the State some fifty thousand dollars beyond what it was supposed this Convention would cost the people, the people would become so tired of the matter, and so displeased with the waste of our time and their money that they would not receive the new Constitution in the same spirit they otherwise would; I feared they would become prejudiced against the instrument itself and be more apt to vote against it.

There is another thing to which I will allude. It was intimated by some gentleman that I belonged to the dollar and cent party. Well, sir, I shall not deny the impeachment, I do belong to that party and am not ashamed to own it. [Several voices—"nor are we."] It was the party that sent me here, and the principle of economy and reform is one of the issues upon which I was elected. I declared that I believed economy should be practised in public as well as in private business. I believe that economy should be practised here at the Capitol, in the Senate and the House of Representatives as in all the different occupations of life. I shall therefore advocate the principle of economy in every shape and form, and especially in the administration of government. I desire to have this session a short one—to that end I wish to see less discussion and more voting. I venture to say that if the ayes and nays could be called now this resolution would be adopted, and so with a great number of other propositions; if we could get to a vote upon them they would all be settled in a comparatively short space of time. I cannot see that any outrage would be committed thereby, either upon the members or the people.

MR. OWEN. When I used the word "outrage" I meant no allusion to any person.

MR. CARTER. No sir, I did not suppose the gentleman from Posey meant the remark for an offensive or personal one. But no outrage will be committed upon the freedom of debate. A large portion of the time of the Convention has already been spent in debate, for much of which I could see no necessity, and as it has been in the first part of the session, so will it be for the future, unless a resolution like the one now pending is adopted. There are subjects of great importance not yet touched upon, the reports of committees "on the organization of courts of justice; on criminal law; law and law reform; elective franchise and apportionment; on currency and banking;" which, sir, will alone occupy two weeks each in discussion, at the rate we have been going on; then there are the subjects of "State debt and public works; corporations other than banking; finance and taxation; education; salaries, compensation and tenure of office;" besides several others, which as the country merchants say "are too tedious to mention." Now, sir, all the subjects which I have hastily enumerated come in the latter part of the orders of the day, and after the subjects which have already been discussed. Will there not be much discussion upon all these subjects, legitimate subjects, as they are of Constitutional reform, more important, certainly as important as the subjects which have engrossed our time for the last six weeks.

We have been told by the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) that there is always more debate in the early than in the latter part of a session. But while I admit the fact I am not certain that it is necessary, why should it be so?

I am in favor of the resolution because we have already spent six weeks and done nothing, and I wish to avoid having the same thing said six weeks hence. The only way to draw the session of this Convention to a speedy close, is for the working members to cut off this interminable debate hereafter, commence voting upon the articles and sections already prepared, finish our work and go home, instead of sitting here at an expense of six hundred dollars a day until spring comes upon us, and find us still in the midst of debate.

The amendments to the Constitution desired and expected by the people, are few and simple. It is true, as the gentleman from Posey has said, that some peculiar measures of reform have been discussed in one part of the State that have not in another; but, sir, by far the greater number of propositions for Constitutional reform—the main principles of the whole subject—have been fully discussed in every newspaper and on every stump in the State. I shall venture the further assertion, that there is no member upon this floor who has not made up his mind upon the course he will take upon these questions before the discussion commenced.

The gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Kilgore) has made some remarks, intimating very plainly that I was actuated by a desire to make "buncombe" by advocating this resolution and proposing my amendment. Now, so far as this charge of "buncombe" is concerned, this is the first office, or the second, rather, that I have ever held, and probably the last. In offering this proposition with which my name has become connected, I was actuated only by a desire to secure a greater economy of time and money to the people. If I had been actuated as I am charged, by a desire to make "buncombe," I should have fixed the time at ten minutes, or at fifteen minutes, in all cases, instead of fixing the time at half an hour on original propositions, and fifteen minutes on amendments. I am willing to be restricted to this time myself, and consider it ample for any one member out of one hundred and fifty to occupy at a time. I can conscientiously defend the motives by which I have been actuated, and if the advocacy of such sentiments brings with it "buncombe," I am willing to take it.

But, sir, the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Kilgore) having made a strenuous opposition to this resolution, I am willing, inasmuch as he declares he cannot express his views in half an hour, and inasmuch as he is a peculiarly modest man, [laughter,] an unusually modest man, I will add a proviso that that gentleman be allowed to speak without reference to the rule restricting other gentlemen. I trust that the general rule will be set aside in his case. I know that he is a remarkably modest and retiring man; I have never seen his name figure more than five times in any one day's proceedings, and I am willing to hold out inducements and encouragements that may have the effect to draw him out, that we may have the benefit of his councils in debate.

I had no "buncombe" in view in offering this proposition. I desired, first, to have such a rule adopted for my own convenience and interest; and secondly, and which is the main reason, for the interests of the people.

I hope we shall be allowed to get at a direct vote upon the subject, for when we do, the whole matter will be settled in favor of the people and their treasury.

Mr. RARIDEN. I suppose, Mr. President, that the object of every gentleman in this Convention is about the same. While I accord to all of those gentlemen who have spoken on the subject, perfect candor in the manifestation of their feelings in regard to economy, I do not entertain the idea that the residue of the members of the Convention, who have omitted to give utterance to their sentiments in regard to that matter, feel any less disposition to study and practice economy than the gentlemen who have spoken so much on the subject. No, sir, not at all. It is not those gentlemen alone who are always talking about "economy" who feel that it is quite proper that the affairs of the State of Indiana should be honestly and economically administered.

Another word, sir, on this subject. I must confess that gentlemen, notwithstanding all their arguments and long speeches on the subject, have failed to convince me that it would be economy to cut off debate on any question. If, for instance, the majority of this House should not be so happily endowed as to arrive at a correct conclusion on any question which may be presented here, by a mere flash of the understanding, but must come to a conclusion by a tardy and laborious process of reasoning and thinking, it might be, that without sufficient debate, a majority thus organised, would carry measures that would neither be reputable nor profitable to the State; and it might be that, going on in this way, and cutting off all debate, and making it a matter of controversy as to who should make the shortest speeches and occupy the least of the time of this Convention, the Constitution which we are sent here to make, might not go out of our hands in a reputable manner, nor in any way redound to the honor of our State. What would be thought of such a course in the world at large—for we have a reputation abroad; the world at large judges us from what they see. Is there any State in this Union whose Constitution involves principles more important than that of the State of Indiana? Is there any State in this Union, or any country on the face of the earth, in which the great mass of the people regard the principles of human liberty guaranteed by our Constitution more sacredly than do the people of Indiana? I apprehend there is not.

Now, Mr. President, I occupy a position perhaps somewhat different from a great many other gentlemen upon this floor. Although there are many provisions in the present Constitution which I would like to see changed, and among the foremost is that the election of officers should be invested in the people, yet apprehending the great expenditure of public money, which would necessarily result from a revision of the Constitution, and knowing that on a great many subjects there would be a great diversity of opinions manifested here, I voted against a call of the Convention; and have said from the beginning that the closer we stick to the old barque, the better will I and my constituents be satisfied with the result of our labors. And if a few new propositions are brought forward, which have never been tried in their effects upon society, I desire to have time to contrast these new theories with the principles which have been well tried and long established. I want time and opportunity for consideration, for I do not believe in this thing of men being inspired with wisdom merely from the fact that they have been elected as members of this Convention. ["Hear, hear," and "consent."] It may be a very unpopular notion that has got into my head, but it is there, and it cannot be got out without a longer speech than one occupying half an hour. Sir, I cannot believe that the mere fact of a man's being elected a member of this Convention makes him possess a greater amount of knowledge than he possessed before his election. Now when gentlemen propose new modes of organization, new principles as a basis of legislation which may operate very differently upon the interests of the community, from anything we have yet experienced, I want time to consider them, to go into details, and endeavor to discover how they will effect the various interests of the community; to compare those principles in their probable operation with the operation of those contained in the old Constitution, with the workings of which we are already acquainted; and then, having made the fullest investigation, and weighed the whole matter with as much care as my judgment will enable me to do, if my mind preponderates in favor of the new project, I will vote for it; but I do not want to go hastily to work, and "guess" at it. I feel that the questions which are agitated here are too important to the mass of the community to permit myself to "guess" at them, and to risk the possibility of doing great injury and injustice merely for the want of a little consideration.

Now what is the complaint which has been made in this Hall? It is about "much speaking." Well, sir, I have spoken perhaps as much as any body else; but, at the same time, I feel that when I think I understand the probable effect of a measure and have given my opinion about it in my own way, and when gentlemen entertaining different opinions from mine, give utterance to their opinions, I thank them for so doing; and I will be candid enough to say that, on more than one occasion I have found that my own opinions have been changed by the remarks of gentlemen who have spoken, perhaps not more than a quarter of an hour; I mean those strong minded men who speak but few words, and yet put things in a strong common-sense light before this Convention. But, sir, I have found that even to men of this kind, men of strong minds and clear perceptions, who, unfortunately, have not had leisure to examine questions in all their bearings, nor of learning what the great men of the world have said and thought in past times on subjects similar to those which are in process of discussion here; I find that even to these men, full and copious debate is in no degree objectionable; and they perhaps more than any others in this Hall, are improved by it.

Now I submit to gentlemen, what time has been unnecessarily expended in this Hall from the first day of the session to the present moment? I believe that my friend from Tippecanoe did make a speech of an hour and three-quarters in length on the Grand Jury system, and I must say that I never listened to a speech with more interest and attention in my life. I was glad to think that that gentleman has subjected himself out of this house to the labor of mastering the whole subject, and of bringing it in all its phases before the consideration of this body. Was there any tautology in that speech? Was there any thing said that could have been omitted without detriment to the whole argument? And could he have delivered it in less time? Did he not begin at the first point and go through the whole subject? And how could a man do less? Sir: there has been less debate in this Hall—fewer long-winded speeches in this Convention than in any other Convention that has yet been convened in modern days. In that respect the proceedings of our Convention will compare with the proceedings of any Convention in America. It should be remembered too, that we labor under some disadvantages. We do not sit here perhaps quite as many hours as we should sit; the Hall is crowded and uncomfortable, and men listen less patiently to speeches delivered in a crowded Hall than they would if they had a moderately convenient place. But, sir, I do not think that any man should tell me that I must hurry through this business, and adopt new provisions in the Constitution without hearing the reasons which can be urged for and against them. Sir, we have come here to improve upon our Constitution, which I will say, at the time of its formation, was one of the best Constitutions in the United States. It secures to every citizen all the essential principles of human liberty. It is convenient in its administration, and secure in what it proposes to accomplish; but time has developed some improvements which perhaps may be introduced into that instrument with advantage to the people; but are we to adopt them hastily, without understanding their details, and the probable effects of their operation? I hope not. Let me intreat gentlemen not to be impatient; and while they sit for hours in their seats—a business which perhaps they justly think is very tiresome—let them endeavor to become interested in what is being said; to comprehend the course of reasoning and remarks adopted by each speaker who may address the Convention, and they will become interested in his matter, however awkward and uncouth his mode of expression may be. Men who think on these subjects are universally disposed to hear the thoughts of others when they come in conflict with their own.

Now I admit that it is not uncommon with gentlemen who are in the habit of public speaking sometimes to speak for Buncombe, and sometimes to the gallery. This is especially apt to be the case with young men. Well, I like to hear young gentlemen speak, and I will say that if any gentleman of my age should occupy the floor to the exclusion of the younger members of the Convention, I would be the first to remonstrate; but the idea of laying it down as a rule for all to follow, that there is no principle which can be embraced in any amendment that may be proposed to the Constitution that could profitably employ more than half an hour's discussion is out of the question. This may do very well for those capacious minds of which I spoke in the beginning of these remarks, which do not pursue the common trodden path of reasoning, but arrive at a conclusion with the rapidity of a flash of lightning. Such, however, I must say is not always the safest mode of deciding upon a question.

Permit me now, Mr. President, to make one other remark as a practical man. Like my friend from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) I have been in a great many deliberative bodies, and from the experience of the past I do not hesitate to say that there will be more time consumed in useless debate if you adopt this rule than if you let every man alone, and permit him to take his own course. With regard to the practice in Congress—and gentlemen will find that it is so, if they will give themselves the trouble to inquire—allow me to say that in the beginning of the session, during the first eight, or ten, or twelve weeks, every man speaks upon some general subject for Buncombe, or for his party and against the other party. Every man's sentiments on all leading questions of the day are laid before the world through the medium of the reporters and the newspapers. Then when every man seems to be tired of speaking, and when they are pressed for time and it is desirable to ascertain the sense of the House on the question under discussion, they commence by limiting the speeches to one hour, and as the thing progresses they shorten the time, and finally they interdict speaking altogether, especially on those subjects that have undergone much discussion, confining all remarks to mere matters of explanation. But this notion of limiting speeches to half an hour on any proposition to amend the Constitution, seems to me to be very improper. It is probable that I shall not want to speak half an hour on any question which may come before the Convention; but I think it is not at all improbable that many of those gentlemen who are now so anxious to limit the time of speaking will, when the discussion of some of the greater questions comes round, be as anxious for more time to deliver their sentiments as any other gentlemen.

So far, then, as economy is concerned, I hold such a proposition to be the very opposite of economical; for if we go through this work in a hurry and without due deliberation, we cannot expect the people to be satisfied with it, and they will reject it after all the expenditure of money that has been made. Then sir it will follow that if there was a necessity for the calling of this Convention to revise the Constitution, and if we make such a revision of it as is not acceptable to the people, then the same necessity will exist for the calling of another Convention and thus a double expenditure would be incurred. And does any man suppose that the people would vote for another Convention that should bedumb when they come here? We then are the people here to all practical effect and we have met to talk with each other and inform each-other's minds, and until that is done we cannot tell what principles ought to be embraced in the Constitution and what should be rejected. I do not suppose that any gentleman has come here under the idea that he is so far advanced in the knowledge of political science that he cannot be enlightened any further upon the subject—that he can see at one glance the practical effect of any principle that may be engrafted upon the Constitution. And even if there were any such gentlemen here, it would be uncharitable towards others in this Hall, who entertain different views to prevent them from portraying to the Convention what they regard as the practical workings and effects of measures proposed. And I think it is not at all improbable that—unless these gentlemen are determined to be deaf to everything like argument or reason—however confident they may be of the propriety and correctness of their own opinions, or however invulnerable they may have supposed themselves before they came here—if they will but have a little patience they may find good cause to change their sentiments in many particulars, I say this not from any want of respect towards gentlemen here, but from a knowledge of my own feelings. I have in many instances in the course of my life, been certain that I could not be mistaken in regard to a matter; but when I have heard the opinions of other men on the same questions and reflected upon them and compared them with my own, I have seen that I have been wrong; and seeing this I have been led to change my views, without in any respect lowering myself in my own estimation. Now I think it may be just the same with every other man. All men cannot comprehend everything at a glance; and this thing of debating and “jostling” against each others minds—if I may use such an expression—is a great thing in enabling men to settle down finally to correct conclusions; and by this course only do I think we can arrive at those amendments in our Constitution which will make it acceptable to the people.

Mr. TAYLOR next addressed the Convention at considerable length and contended that there was no economy in adopting such a restrictive rule; that it would inevitably create confusion, and in many instances would tend to smother the sentiments of the people as entertained by their representatives. This was not the first time that such a proposition had been introduced; and although on a former occasion he had voted for a restriction of this kind he had on calmer reflection seen his error, and was now in favor of permitting every man on that floor to express his sentiments as fully as he desired, believing that, in the end, such a course would not only prove to be the most economical, but that it would be more satisfactory in every respect to the people of the State. He should therefore vote against the half hour restriction.

Mr. NEWMAN. As the motion which I made in the earlier part of this debate, has given rise, if not to considerable “buncombe,” to a good deal of allusion to that term, I will offer a word of explanation without taking up but a moment of time. I made the motion to commit to a select committee, because it was not then in order to move an amendment. I moved the instructions because I saw what is evident to every observing mind, that a large majority of this Convention is disposed, if not determined to limit the time a member may consume in debate. I could not go for the resolution as it was, and I considered my amendment a compromise between the two parties; fifteen minutes is too short a time, but I considered that to limit debate to half an hour would be quite reasonable.

The PRESIDENT. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Vigo.

Mr. COOKERLY. But I should not press my motion if the gentleman could change the character of his instructions. I am in favor of the restriction of debate but not to fifteen minutes in all cases.

Mr. NEWMAN. I will withdraw my motion to commit with instructions, and will move a reconsideration of the vote adopting the amendment of the gentleman from Montgomery (Mr. Carter). I did not fully understand the character and effect of the amendment at the time I voted for it. I make this motion with a view afterwards proposing to insert the half hour principle.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I had not intended to say a word, nor would I now, were it not for the fact that "Buncombe," has been used so often, and in so disrespectful a connection; I rise to make my objections to the practice of gentlemen making "Buncombe" the scape-grace of all their sins. I was born in Buncombe, [laughter] and cannot help feeling a respect for the old county.

But a word in seriousness as to the limitation of the time which each speaker may occupy in debate. I know that many who are favoring it are actuated by the best of motives, but have they well considered how much will be gained by the adoption of such a rule? One would think after hearing this day's debate that the majority of speeches in the Convention had been several hours in length. But how many have there been since the organization of more than half an hour in length? Sir, the aggregate amount of time consumed, over half an hour by gentlemen in debate during the session, is not equal to the amount of time consumed this day in debate about the economy of time! The resolution is an unwise one, and its practical working will be such that the Convention will be in as much haste to repeal it as they now seem to be to adopt it. A man cannot discuss any of the important questions coming up here, so as to finish in the course of half an hour.

Sir, without the adoption of such a resolution we have, as matters now stand, a way by which we can cut off useless and protracted debate. When we see that gentlemen are disposed to consume time unnecessarily we can resort to the call of the previous question which will most effectually cut off all debate.

There is no member on this floor more anxious to get through with the business which the people have intrusted to us, and to get home than myself, but I cannot indulge in such a gratification at the expense of that business. Questions of great importance have been brought before us which were not canvassed before the people prior to the election of delegates, and it becomes of the highest importance that those questions upon which public opinion, has as yet had no opportunity to become settled, should be most fully and patiently investigated. The interests of more than one generation may be dependent upon the decisions of this body, and I feel the responsibility which presses upon me as an humble and individual member of it. I am therefore, decidedly unwilling to jump to a conclusion upon any of the questions that arise for settlement in the organic law, merely for the sake of adjourning a week sooner than otherwise. But sir, while I desire to secure to every gentleman the freedom of discussion to a just extent, when I may see that a member is disposed to consume time unnecessarily, then I shall not shrink from motives of fear of delicacy from seconding a demand for the previous question. But right here is the difficulty in the adoption of the resolution now pending; it will apply to all gentlemen, to those who are giving to the Convention an argument of the greatest interest and pertinence to the subject in debate, which the Convention may be most anxious to hear, it will apply to such speeches as well and as stringently as to those mere wordy harangues which only serve to consume time without either interesting or enlightening the Convention.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I consider the proposition a perfect failure, and warn gentlemen that it will create more mischief than any resulting benefit will compensate for—it will consume money for the sake of saving time. I will not remark farther upon the matter and will close my brief remarks by moving that this debate be peremptorily closed, on or before this day week [laughter].

Mr. BASCOM. I am in favor of this resolution for the same reason that the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles) is disposed to oppose it. There are many delegates upon this floor who would like to express themselves upon the various questions as they come up in debate, and whose duty it is to represent their constituents in debate, who will never have an opportunity of being heard for five minutes unless the Convention adopts a resolution similar to the one in debate. It is right that the counties represented here by members who as yet have been unable to get the floor, should be represented in debate, as well as upon your journals in the recorded vote by yeas and nays. They should have the opportunity, not of making long and tedious speeches—the Convention has had too many of such already—but to give their reasons, to render their arguments for the course they take. Questions become so complicated after the introduction of a plain, simple original proposition, by the proposed amendments and motions, that a man's vote is very likely to be misconstrued, unless he has the opportunity to render his reasons for his course. A section may contain one principle of which he approves, and in the next sentence a sentiment to which he is utterly opposed; the question may be taken on the section as a whole, and he may feel constrained to vote against it on account of the obnoxious principle; in cases of this kind which frequently occur, every gentleman should have the opportunity of a few minutes time in which to address the Convention. But what is the practice under the system which has prevailed? A few of the "leading men," or those who consider themselves the leading men of this body, get the floor at the commencement of a session, and two of them will occupy all the time of a session to the exclusion of the more modest and retiring members. And, sir, when one of this class does get the floor at the close of one of these hour or hour and a half speeches, up jumps one of these great men and moves to adjourn, or says, "I suppose this question has been sufficiently discussed and until the Convention is weary of it, and I move the previous question" [laughter].

There is another course often taken when a young man, or one of those who may not yet have had an opportunity to debate the question, rises; those same gentlemen will commence calling "question! question!! question!!!" [Laughter.] For my own part I want that the voice of my constituents should be heard here, and with due deference to the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Kilgore) I intend that their voice shall be heard and respected here. I shall not bow to the mandate of the Delaware Chief [laughter] while I have an equal position and equal privileges in this Hall. I desire to improve myself as well as to secure the interests of the people by the occasional opportunity to make brief remarks upon pending questions.

I desire, then, that the voice and will of all portions of the State shall be heard through representatives here, but unless you apply a gag to these long winded speeches about the white race, and the African race, and the Mongolian race the people will not be heard. If you want to know their sentiments, if you want to know the general feeling of the people you must let their representatives, humble and unpretending as they may be, speak within proper limits, and not allow the "big men" of the Convention to consume all the time, exhaust all its patience, and then, move the previous question [laughter].

Mr. President, I revere age, and I respect grey hairs, I bow with deference to the words of experience, but the mere age of no man shall hush me on this floor. No man, because he may be on the track for Congress, shall say that because I am young I shall not speak. And I think it would be well for some aspiring gentleman here to remember that he should thank God that he had somebody to help him when he was young [laughter].

I came here as a reformer, determined to support every thing that would effect more economy in all public business, but when, in endeavoring to support such principles, the Chief of the Delawares [merriment.] is allowed to tell us that we "have been permitted to speak" my indignation is aroused. Generally speaking I am opposed to the principle of the gag rule, but here there seems no way of avoiding its adoption.

I hope that the working members of this body will take this matter into their own hands; they have the power, let them use it for the public good. Let them allow no man after having consumed an hour and a half to have still "another crack" at the question, while many have not spoken since the organization.

Mr. WOLFE rose and was proceeding to address the Convention but was arrested by cries of "question—question—question."

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Sullivan has the floor.

Mr. WOLFE. Now this is just what the young gentleman from Wells (Mr. Bascom) has been complaining of, he just told us that whenever one of the "small fry" got the floor he was put down by cries of "question—question—question."

I presume that many gentlemen are tired of debate and desirous of adjourning, but I shall not move that the Convention adjourn. I am one of those working members who have been alluded to and I will sit here until twelve o'clock to night if it is necessary to secure the adoption of this resolution, if others who are desirous of saving the people's time and money will stay with me and fight this thing through. It has been said that my holding up the file of reports of committee's not yet acted upon, as I did for my speech this morning, proves a better argument against my position than for it. I am not convinced of that. We have twenty-three committees and have acted upon but three of their reports and six weeks of the session has passed! How long will it be at this rate before we adjourn?

Nor do I think that these committees have performed the amount of work claimed for them by the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen.) Much of the time there has been but one session a day and these committees have certainly consumed much time and their reports are all to be brought up for a lengthy discussion afterwards. I am on one of those committees, and we met one afternoon and in a short session our whole work was done up and perhaps as well done as the work of any other committee—it certainly cannot be worse handled or torn to pieces than some reports which have been up for decision.

Why, sir, there was one report up here, that of the committee on the "rights and privileges of the inhabitants of this State," one section of which was debated for three entire days—Upon reflection, sir it was upon three words [Laughter.] that three days discussion was expended. Those words, if I can remember were—

Mr. SHERROD. "Strong presumption of"

Mr. WOLFE. Yes, sir, those are the very identical words—"strong presumption of"—each of which occupied an entire days debate of the the Indiana Constitutional Convention! This will show the rate at which we have been proceeding. After this, will gentlemen accuse those who favor this resolution to restrict speakers to half an hour, of desiring to gag free discussion?

When I was a boy I used to be very fond of fishing. I used to go out and after baiting my hook and fixing the fishing tackle, rod, line, cork and all, just right, would "throw in" and wait for "a bite." Well when the fish first swallowed the hook it would flutter much, but when you began to draw him out by "the gills" and got him near the top of the water he would flounder "right smart" and work to "get shut" of the hook. Now this is the way with some gentlemen: they begin to see that the proportions of their speeches must be "hailed in" and as the resolution is about to pass, you see them fluttering prodigiously. Now, sir I do not mean to let go, or to let them get the hook out of their mouths, unless I can get a better hook, with a stronger barb in place of the one in. [Laughter.]

Therefore, I say that if other members will stand by me, I will sit here until twelve o'clock to night for the sake of securing the passage of this resolution or a better one.

The gentleman from Tippecanoe thinks that half an hour is not long enough for a member to get through with an argument, carefully prepared, to meet an important question. But I will tell my friend that making speeches here, is not the most profitable kind of work that they can be engaged in. I like to hear short speeches coming without all this preparation, warm and fresh from the speaker. As with batter cakes, so with speeches. I don't care much what shape they come in so they are only warm and fresh.

Mr. Speaker, I want to know what the question is. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT. The question now is upon the motion to reconsider the vote by which the original resolution was amended by the gentleman from Montgomery (Mr. Carter).

Mr. WOLFE. Well, I may have been a little off the subject; and I will sit down.

Mr. KILGORE. As is well known, I am a very modest man—very. [Laughter.] And the "noise and confusion" which has prevailed this afternoon has still more confused my usually bashful and diffident nature.

But a single remark, in all seriousness. When I before had the floor, I made some jocular allusions, that seemed not entirely out of place, considering all the circumstances. These have been partially misunderstood. I am opposed to this resolution, because I believe it will prohibit that free interchange of sentiment so desirable among men assembled on an occasion and for a purpose like this. Every man has his own peculiar notions, to which, with more or less tenacity, he clings, because he believes they are right, and better calculated than any others to promote the general good. We shall not be able to agree upon any single proposition, I care not with what wisdom and forecast it may have been drawn, unless there is a concession "all round" of each one's peculiar notions—a concession, not of principle, but of individual opinions, upon the detail of propositions. In order to make these concessions, it will become necessary to exchange views and opinions freely, for each to hear the arguments of the others patiently and attentively. After that, we can, upon all the points which will arise, adopt some compromise measure, upon which, for the sake of harmony, all will unite. This was eminently the case in regard to the provision relative to the "right of way" for public improvements. After a long and laborious consideration of the subject, the result was that we made a compromise, each member of his peculiar views—a compromise which is satisfactory to all parties. We must expect to have to compromise in respect to other important matters; and without we go on in that spirit, and unless the fullest opportunity for discussion is given here, the Convention will be dissatisfied, the members will yield to the new Constitution, framed by a mere numerical majority, a cold support, and after all, the result will be, that these very propositions, upon which debate is cut off here, will have to be debated at home, before the people, upon the final adoption of the new Constitution.

As was correctly remarked by the gentleman from Dubois, (Mr. Edmonston,) this Constitution, if it shall be adopted by the people of Indiana, is not framed for one year, nor yet for one generation alone; and it should be our high ambition, and our settled policy, to frame an organic law that shall be commensurate with the wants of the people of a great State for a century to come. Would any gentleman desire a greater temporal honor than to have been one of the members of a Convention which had the ability to frame a Constitution which would need no change for an hundred years' march of an enlightened people in social and political progress! Then let me again remark, without the fear of being misunderstood, that a calculation of "dollars and cents," abstractly considered, should not enter into our deliberations. The disposition should be, to hear the views of all gentlemen, to compare opinions, and to harmonize upon those propositions which most exactly express the will and feeling of the largest majority, if possible, that will meet with unanimous support. Let each man be disposed to contribute some sacrifice of his peculiar notions as to the details of propositions, to harmony, good feeling, and unanimity.

One of the gentlemen who preceded me spoke with ill-advised haste of the habit of some members here to call the previous question, in order to prevent the young men, perhaps, from expressing their sentiments. This must be a mistake. I think the greatest courtesy has been shown to all—the old and the young—through all the session. As for myself, although I have been for many years a member of deliberative bodies, I never yet called the previous question—I never yet seconded a call for the previous question. But, sir, I am as much opposed to the rule proposed in this resolution as I am to the previous question. The proposition is, that, after Tuesday next, no member shall occupy more than thirty minutes in the discussion of any original proposition, nor more than fifteen minutes upon any amendment, and then only by way of explanation. The practical effect of this will be to cut off members when they may be in the middle of an argument. The evil of this is readily seen. Everything said here is properly noted down by the Reporter; if the speaker is cut short in the middle of his argument by the fall of the President's hammer, he must either have his remarks go out in a mutilated shape, or tell the Reporter to reserve his remarks for another day, when he may be able to finish his argument, and have the whole go out together in a finished and connected condition. But in order to effect this, he must travel back, at the commencement of his second speech, and recapitulate the positions formerly taken and developed, in order that the Convention may understand the last half of the speech; without so doing, it would appear ridiculous.

Thus we see, at every step after the adoption of this rule, we shall feel its inconvenience and its practical operation in delaying business and preventing that careful and satisfactory investigation of important propositions, so desirable to the Convention and for the State.

My young friend from Wells (Mr. Bascom) is much mistaken, if he really supposes that I would make a deliberate effort here, having for its ultimate object the closing of his mouth. [Laughter.] I shall not doubt that he is a very worthy, as well as a very smart young man, nor shall I doubt that he represents a most intelligent and respectable constituency; judging from the representative they have sent up here, we must conclude they are very intelligent.

And as to the young gentleman from Montgomery, (Mr. Carter), I would say nothing to mar his feelings. His remark relative to the number of times my name has appeared in the newspaper in one day, must be understood to refer to the record of yeas and nays which may have been several times called, and not to the number of times I may have addressed the Convention.

My young friend (Mr. Carter) will find, when he comes to discuss important propositions, if he should undertake to engage in such a discussion, that his powers of concentrateness must be much improved from what I think they are, and his "bump" of order much higher than I estimate it, if he could do justice to a grave subject of constitutional reform in the course of half an hour. I cannot do it, I confess. I am not an expert phrenologist, but unless I am much mistaken, there is another "bump" on his head of a greater altitude—it is known as the "bump" of self-esteem.

Mr. CARTER. What is that?

Mr. KILGORE. The "bump" of self-esteem, sir.

Mr. CARTER. I only asked for information.

Mr. KILGORE. Young men should watch the developement of such organs, and repress their undue proportions in time, lest they become confirmed.

But, Mr. President, I am not disposed to treat my young friend unkindly; he has qualities of mind which, if carefully and laboriously disciplined, would enable him to become a useful member of society.

I will not farther occupy the time of this body, but let me say, in all earnestness, let us not be in haste in the consideration of subjects which can be considered but once in a cycle of years. The time may come, in the course of this session, when it may be really necessary to cut off discussion, but that time is not yet arrived, nor will it, until after all the reports of committees shall have been faithfully and fully debated. Among the many important reports yet undebated, are the reports on currency and banking; on law and law reform; on the judiciary; on the organization of courts of law; the powers of the executive and the legislative department, all of which demand and must receive a patient and thorough investigation. It will not do, sir, to cherish this anxiety to get through in a hurry and get home. We were all willing enough to agree to come here without any proviso as to the length of the session, or the hardship of a toilsome and wearisome investigation and discussion of all subjects of Constitutional reform.

After all these subjects which I have enumerated, and others upon which committees have reported, have been fairly debated and examined, then I have no objection to any measures that may be taken to cut off discussion and confine ourselves to voting upon articles and sections. But let us go through once, and first, with the discussion of subjects, and then, if necessary, put on the gag.

I hope that the adoption and the further consideration of this resolution, will be postponed, for a few days at least. It may be, that in the course of two weeks, it will be proper to pass that resolution.

Mr. CRUMBACKER. I am on the floor, sir, neither for the purpose of moving an adjournment or making a speech.

My object in rising is, to move a postponement of the resolution in debate until one week from next Saturday.

Mr. WOLFE. No, no; we will not consent to that.

Mr. MILLER of Gibson. I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

The motion to adjourn was disagreed to.

Mr. COOKERLY. I move to lay the amendment to the resolution on the table.

Mr. WOLFE objected, and remarked that he did not consider that a proper course to take.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I move to lay the resolution also upon the table.

Mr. PEPPER was proceeding to make some remarks, when

The PRESIDENT said that subject was not debateable.

A MEMBER moved to lay the motion (Mr. Crumbacker's) to postpone the further consideration of the resolution, upon the table.

The question being put, and a division being called for, the vote stood, in favor of the motion 55, in the negative 32.

So the motion to postpone was laid on the table.

Mr. RARIDEN moved an adjournment.

The Convention refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT was understood to say, that the pending question was upon the motion to re-consider the vote by which the amendment (Mr. Carter's) was adopted.

The vote upon that motion was then re-considered.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of the amendment offered by Mr. Carter, so that the resolution should read, that on and after Tuesday next no member should be allowed to speak more than half an hour on any original proposition, nor more than fifteen minutes on an amendment, and then only by way of explanation.

Mr. COOKERLY moved to lay the amendment on the table, and remarked that the original resolution, in substance, was, that after Tuesday next no member should speak at any one time more than thirty minutes on original propositions, nor more than ten minutes on amendments, without the consent of the Convention.

Several VOICES. No consent, no consent to speak longer.

Mr. CARTER. I will withdraw my amendment to the resolution.

Mr. NEWMAN. I move to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert the proposition contained in the instructions with which I wish to have a select committee sent out.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford. I move to amend the resolution by striking out the words "unless by the consent of the Convention," so that no speaker, under any circumstances, can speak longer than half an hour at one time.

This motion was agreed to, and the resolution was thus amended.

The PRESIDENT. The pending question now is to strike out all after the resolving clause, and insert the proposition of the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Newman).

Mr. McFARLAND rose and said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: In the excitement and confusion which prevails, I do not know that it will be possible for any one to be heard on this motion.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. McFarland) has the floor, and will be heard, for he has not addressed the Convention before during the session.

Mr. McFARLAND. I was saying that there is so much confusion, I do not know that it would be possible for any man to be heard at this time. The Convention, however, will bear me witness that I am not asking anything on my own behalf, when I express my hope that this resolution will not be carried. I have not thus far, been a troublesome member of this body, nor shall I be so in future, if I continue to be blessed with my reason. But I ask this Convention to consider whether or not, in the heat of passion, and under misguiding influences, they will destroy that which should be the result of their labors? What has produced this state of feeling? Perhaps the scenes of yesterday, or those of a day or two back, may have done more than anything else to produce it.

Now let me ask what of the proceedings will be cut off by the adoption of this resolution. A gentleman furnished me a few moments ago, with a close calculation on the subject of this rule, and he states that, had it been adopted from the first moment of our meeting here, we should have saved four hours and a half. [Hear, hear, and applause]. Now, for the purpose of saving four hours and a half during the next six weeks, are we to deprive ourselves of hearing the deliberate convictions of men's judgments, who may require more than half an hour to deliver them? Certainly both reason and common sense and common courtesy, would answer "no." Sir, what kind of speeches will this rule limit? It will limit those speeches which have been the result of months, and perhaps years of calm, close, and deliberate investigation, while we are to have flooded upon us those "fresh" speeches, of which the gentleman from Sullivan spoke a few moments ago. "Fresh," indeed, they are, sir; for some of them have not "salt" enough in them to save them, even in winter. [Great laughter and applause]. Sir, I will not further occupy the time of the Convention; but I felt it to be my duty to rise and give expression to what were my honest convictions in reference to the proceedings of the Convention upon this question. I feel, sir, that we are about to inflict an injury, not upon the few individuals who have made long speeches here, but it may be that we are about to inflict a deep and lasting injury upon our children, and our children's children, by acting hastily upon this subject. [Applause].

Mr. EDMONSTON. I hope the Convention will now adjourn.

Mr. FOSTER. There has been time enough spent upon this question. I hope the Convention will now proceed to vote.

The question was then taken, by yeas and nays, upon the adoption of the resolution, and it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bascom, Beard, Berry, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Carter, Coats, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Dobson, Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Haddon, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hogg, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Kendall of Wabash, Logan, Maguire, March, May, McClelland, McLean, Milligan, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Newman, Nofsinger, Pepper of Crawford, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Stevenson, Tague, Trimby, Watts, Wheeler, Wolfe, Work, Zenor, and Mr. President—68.

NAYS—Messrs. Badger, Beach, Biddle, Brookbank, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Crumbacker, Dick, Dunn of Perry, &c., Edmonston, Gibson, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Hall, Hawkins, Holman, Hovey, Kent, Kilgore, Lockhart, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Mooney, Nave, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Rariden, Spann, Steele, Taylor, and Wunderlich—34.

So the resolution was adopted.

The Convention then adjourned until 9 o'clock on Monday morning.

MONDAY, Nov. 18, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. BAEB.

The journal of Saturday was read and approved.

The list of the names of delegates was called over, in accordance with the resolution of the Convention,

DEATH OF MR. VANBENTHUYSEN.

Mr. HENDRICKS rose and said:

MR. PRESIDENT: Upon my return to the Convention, after a necessary absence of a few days, I find the seat of my colleague (Mr. Vanbenthusen) vacant. He has left us, sir, to return no more. He has been called from labor, to repose. The transition is his gain—it is our loss.

He died at his boarding house, in this city, at half-past one o'clock, on last Wednesday night. From the morning of the tenth inst., he complained of diarrhea, but continued in the discharge of his duties, as a member of our body, until Tuesday ensuing. After the adjournment on that evening, he complained of increased illness; and, about ten hours before his death, the epidemic, which carried him off so hastily, was upon him. His sufferings were soon over, and he died quietly, as the good man only, dies, who has no regrets when he looks back over the scenes of life, and no fears when he looks forward, into the great future.

Our deceased friend was a native of New York; born in Albany county, in the year 1777. As a soldier, he served his country in the war of 1812, and was connected with some of the most exciting scenes of that period. In 1829, he emigrated to this State, and settled in the county of Shelby. Until called upon to serve in this Convention, he lived retired from public life, occupied in the cultivation of his farm. He asked of his fellow-citizens no official position; and held no office, until he took his seat with us in this Hall.

I can give no higher evidence of the confidence of his fellow-citizens in him, than that his nomination to this position, was the free-will offering of his party, and that without his seeking, he was selected to so important and responsible a position.

In all the relations of life, he was a true man—as a member of the benevolent institutions of the country—in his political connections—as a citizen, and as a christian—he was faithful to all of his espousals. To his order, his party, his country, and his faith—in their prosperity and adversity, their bright day and cloudy day—he was the same true brother, warm friend, zealous patriot, and unwearying christian.

At home, he enjoyed the confidence and esteem of all, and in this body, I am glad to know, that, by his wise and prudent action, he secured the regard and confidence of all with whom he became acquainted.

Whilst all have cause to mourn that a faithful public servant has fallen at his post, I feel in the death of my colleague, a personal loss. I had relied much upon his mature and ripe judgment, for council in the discharge of my duties here.

His circumstances in life were easy, and he left his family comfortably provided for.

The death of my colleague having heretofore been announced in this Hall, and the Convention having taken such action thereon as seemed appropriate, I have no farther action to propose.

On motion of Mr. MAGUIRE, it was Ordered, That the remarks of the gentleman from Shelby be entered upon the journal.

Mr. BORDEN. I find, Mr. President, that since I have been away on leave of absence, a rule has been adopted, which directs that the roll shall be called every morning, and the names of the absent members noted in the journal. I had occasion this morning to step into the Library for a moment, and while there the roll has been called. I would like to have my name recorded as being present.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will remark to the gentleman from Allen, that the rule provides that any delegate may upon application to the Secretary, have his name stricken from the list of absentees.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio moved that the order of business be suspended in order to enable him to offer a resolution, requesting the President of the Convention to invite the surviving members of the Convention, that formed the present Constitution, to seats within in the bar.

The question being taken, the order of business was suspended, and the resolution, by unanimous consent, was agreed to.

Mr. MOWRER asked a suspension of the rules to enable him to introduce a resolution instructing the committee on the executive to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the office of Lieutenant Governor.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I will remark to the gentleman that there has been already one or two resolutions of a similar character adopted and referred to the appropriate committee. So that there can be no necessity for adopting another.

Mr. MOWRER said he was not aware that there had been any such resolution adopted. He had inquired of several gentlemen and was told that there had not been any such resolution adopted.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I do not object to the gentleman's resolution, I only suggest that it is unnecessary.

The order of business was suspended, and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. CRUMBACKER. I wish to know, Mr. President, whether upon the calling of the roll this morning I have been marked as being absent. If so I wish the record to be changed.

The PRESIDENT. The Secretary informs the Chair that he has not marked any gentleman absent. [Laughter.]

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

The PRESIDENT. Does the gentleman from Warrick design making the motion of which he gave notice?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, sir. I will move to take up the proposition in order that some disposition may be made of it.

The proposition of the gentleman was read. It is that the 39th rule be amended so as to dispense with the calling of the roll each morning.

The question upon the adoption of the proposed amendment being put, a division was asked for, and by 54 ayes, 23 noes, the amendment was adopted.

Mr. McCLELLAND presented two petitions; one from citizens of Randolph county, and the other from persons of color of the same county, praying that no prohibition against the immigration of negroes into the State be inserted in the Constitution; and that no restriction be placed upon persons of color, in regard to giving testimony in courts of justice.

The petitions having been read, On motion by Mr. McCLELLAND, they were laid on the table.

Mr. READ of Clark, from the committee on State officers, other than executive and judicial, reported a section, which was read a first time, and passed to a second reading to-morrow.

The section provides for the election of Trustees on the part of the State, of the Wabash and Erie Canal, Warden of the State Prison, and Public Printer, to hold their offices for two years; to be eligible only four years in any term of six years.

Mr. FOSTER. Will it be in order, Mr. President, now to move to reject the section.

The PRESIDENT. That motion would have been in order before the section passed to a second reading.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not like to see every thing run into the ground in this way.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of the orders of the day, being the three blank sections which had been ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time this day.

The sections were read by the Secretary.

They are the sections in relation to imprisonment for debt, the right of trial by jury, and remuneration for property taken by corporations for public improvements.

The PRESIDENT. The question is, shall these resolutions pass.

The yeas and nays were demanded.

Mr. MAGUIRE inquired whether the yeas and nays would be taken upon the other sections together or upon each separately.

The PRESIDENT said, he supposed the vote might be taken upon the three sections together. The Convention had ordered their engrossment together. The yeas and nays would necessarily be taken, as the rule required that upon the final passage of all the sections the vote should be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. EDMONSTON. Is it in order to move an amendment.

The PRESIDENT. The only motion in order is to re-commit with instructions.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I move, then, that the last of the three sections be re-committed to the committee on rights and privileges, with instructions to strike out the words "to the owner." The motion will read then "without just compensation being made or tendered."

Gentlemen will observe that in the case of a non-resident owner, it will be very difficult to find the real owner. The party should be at liberty to tender compensation to the agent or guardian of the property.

Mr. PETTIT. They are the owners for all legal purposes.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I am not lawyer enough to know whether such tender would be legal, but it is contended by some gentlemen that such tender would not be sufficient.

Mr. LOCKHART said, that he would prefer that the section under consideration should go to the committee without instructions; but if instructions were necessary, he desired that they should not be confined to striking out the words indicated by the gentleman from Dubois, for if those words were stricken out it seemed to him that the section would remain in legal contemplation precisely what it now is.

When this section was up for consideration the other day, said Mr. L., I offered an amendment which was voted down, laid on the table, without consideration, reflection or debate. The amendment proposed that when the owner should be a non-resident, a feme covert, an infant, an idiot, or a lunatic, or should be otherwise incapacitated for transacting his or her business, the tender or payment of the money could be made at the clerk's office of the proper county, and paid to the Clerk of the Circuit Court, or some officer to be designated by law, and thus the company, corporation, or individual engaged in constructing public improvements of any kind could avoid the necessity of going in search of the owner. It seems to me that such an amendment would be wholesome, wise, and prudent. I do not propose, sir, to take away the obligation to make pre-payment; indeed, I am in favor of requiring all corporations when they take individual property for public use, to make pre-payment; but I do not wish to throw an obstacle of this kind in the way; I do not wish to say in the Constitution of the State that the payment shall be tendered to the owner when a non-resident, or incapable of receiving payment. Sir, by adopting this section, the company or corporation may have to send an agent all over the globe in search of an owner in order to make payment or tender.

It has been said by some gentleman—I believe by the gentleman from Dubois—the other day, while speaking upon this question, that it would be sufficient to make the tender to the agent of the owner of the property. In answer to this I would say that that question would depend entirely upon the authority the principal might have conferred upon the agent. The gentleman will recollect that it is the principal by whom the agent is constituted, and not the Legislature. He will remember also, that the agent can only act within the authority delegated to him. It is not the Legislature that creates the agent. The law cannot, if this section is adopted as it now is, create an agent to whom a valid payment or tender can be made. The Legislature may pass as many provisions as it pleases, making it lawful to make tender of payment to an agent thus constituted, and it will be of no avail. Unless the principal has constituted an agent for himself, and clothed him with authority, payment or tender to him (I care not what laws you pass) will not bind the principal unless he ratifies the act.

I say it is not in the power of the Legislature to create an agent for the owner of property, to whom tender or payment can be made, if you adopt this section as it is. You have defined in this section what shall be done; you have set forth that amends shall be tendered to the owner, it cannot then be tendered to an agent, unless the owner himself has constituted some person with ample power and authority to act for him in that behalf. For this reason I am in favor of referring the section. I would prefer that it should go to the committee without instructions, leaving the committee free to make amendments as in their judgment they might think proper, after having heard what has been said in relation to the matter. But if the committee are to be instructed to strike out the words proposed to be stricken out by the gentleman from Dubois, and to do nothing more we will not progress, as it seems to me that it will not materially alter the force and signification of the section.

The section will then read thus: payment shall be first made or tendered. Tendered to whom? The legal implication will be that the section means tendered to the owner. Will it be said then that the Legislature can create an agent for the owner, to whom the money can be tendered? Certainly not. I have already said that I do not think the section will be materially altered by making the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Dubois; but if the words "in such manner as the Legislature may prescribe" be added to the section after the words indicated by the gentleman from Dubois shall have been stricken out, the whole difficulty will be obviated. It appears to me that this is the shape in which this section should pass.

Mr. PETTIT. I hope, sir, that this section will not be recommitted, but that it will be passed. It will be recollected that we have spent a good deal of time over these three sections; and I am satisfied that if they are now recommitted, they will not come back to the Convention in any more acceptable form than they are in at present. The whole question will be open again for discussion, and we know not when there will be an end of it. Is there any probability that it will be returned in any more acceptable form than when first reported to us? None at all, in my opinion. And in reference to this legal difficulty, the gentleman from Vanderburgh is right in saying, that striking out the word "owner" will make no difference. The law, by implication, will supply the word "owner." By the word "owner," the law does not mean the actual fee simple owner, but the person who stands in his place, and acts for him—the guardian, the administrator, the agent. The law recognizes the acts of these as the acts of the owner himself. One of the tritest maxims of the law is, that what a man does by his agent he does by himself. There is, therefore, no difficulty at all in finding the person to whom payment is to be made.

But suppose this section be adopted, and a railroad company desire to run a road through a piece of land which has no accessible owner, or the owner of which is not known; what is the result? The company will go on constructing the road. The law itself will not prohibit proceeding with the work, digging the ground, grubbing the trees, laying down the timber or iron, and passing over the road thus constructed. It only secures the right of the party to be compensated for his property; and if he be in a condition to do so, he can by injunction restrain the work; but if he be not in a condition to obtain such injunction either by himself or his representative, his guardian, or agent duly appointed, the work shall go on. And when the unknown owner is found, he will seek his remedy for the injury already done. That is the situation of the matter. If the owner be absent or unknown, you proceed with your work and leave him to take his legal remedy for compensation. It is only where the owner is present, by himself or his representative, that you are obliged to make pre-payment, if he require it. He may then, upon application to the court, obtain an injunction restraining the company from taking any step in the progress of the work until compensation be first made to him for the property which may be required to be taken.

Now I am satisfied, I repeat, that we shall not get these sections reported back in a better form than they are now; and if it were not an odious thing, and one that I abhor to do, I would now call for the previous question. But having myself debated the question, I am not disposed to do so ungracious an act as to prevent other delegates from expressing their opinions; therefore, I shall not move the previous question. But I hope that the proposition to recommit, either with or without instructions, will be voted down by the Convention, and that the sections will be adopted; being satisfied that they are now as perfect as they would be if referred to the committee and reported back.

Mr. EDMONSTON. My object in moving to re-commit the section was to avoid a difficulty that has been suggested by some gentlemen. That difficulty, however, having been explained away by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, and other gentlemen around me, I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. LOCKHART. I move to re-commit the section, with instructions to add the following words:

"Except in cases otherwise to be provided for by the Legislature."

Mr. STEVENSON. It will be recollected that since these sections were ordered to be engrossed, the Convention has adopted a rule declaring that each section shall be engrossed by itself; or rather, that the question shall be taken upon the engrossment of each section separately; and it seems to me, that the fair inference from this is, that we shall pass each section by itself. Now I am satisfied that if the Convention is to vote upon each section separately, there will be no necessity for the recommitment of any other than the section that it is proposed to amend.

The PRESIDENT. The motion is only to re-commit one section.

Mr. STEVENSON. I was mistaken, then, sir; I supposed that it was to re-commit the three sections.

Mr. OWEN. I am not very particular as to whether this section shall be re-committed or not; but if it is to be re-committed, I think clearly that the instructions ought to be these: to strike out the words, "to the owner," and insert, "in such mode as may be prescribed by law." [Cries of "consent."]

Mr. NAVE. Is it in order to move to amend the instructions proposed by the gentleman from Vanderburgh?

The PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. NAVE. Then I move the following:

"Strike out the words 'to the owner,' and insert, 'in the manner to be prescribed by law.'"

Mr. LOCKHART. I will accept the amendment.

Mr. DOBSON called for a division of the question.

The PRESIDENT said that the question was not divisible; because, at this stage of the proceedings, it was not in order to re-commit without instructions.

Mr. PETTIT moved to lay the instructions on the table. [Cries of "consent."]

The question being put on the motion to lay the instructions on the table, it was, upon a division—yeas 57, nays 45—decided in the affirmative.

So the instructions were laid on the table.

Mr. BORDEN. It will be recollected that when this subject was up before, a motion was made to lay on the table the proposition of the gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Bright). Lest my purpose in making that motion should be misunderstood, I will now move to re-commit this section with the following instructions, and upon that motion I should be glad to have the yeas and nays:

"But such assessment shall be made irrespective of extrinsic objects."

Mr. WATTS called for a division of the question.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remind the gentleman, that at this stage the question and the motion to commit with instructions is not divisible.

Mr. BRACKEN moved to lay the instructions on the table.

Mr. EDMONSTON moved to amend the motion so as to lay on the table also the motion to re-commit.

The PRESIDENT said that the motion to re-commit being inseparable from the instructions, the motion to lay one on the table of course included the other.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I wish to be informed by the Chair whether, the motion that I made to re-commit with instructions having been laid on the table, it is in order again to move to re-commit.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman's motion having been laid on the table, it does not preclude another motion to lay on the table with other instructions.

The yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table were ordered, and being taken were—yeas 63, nays 52—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Badger, Balingall, Barbour, Bascom, Beard, Berry, Biddle, Bourne, Bracken, Brookbank, Carr, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Edmonston, Farrow, Foley, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hall, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of Warren, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, McFarland, Milligan, Morgan, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Niles, Nofsinger, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Rariden, Read of Clark, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sims, Snook, Steele, Stevenson, Todd, Walpole, and Zenor—63.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Beach, Blythe, Borden, Bowers, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Fisher, Foster, Gibson, Graham of Miami, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Johnson, Maguire, March, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Newman, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Read of Monroe, Sherrod, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Tague, Taylor, Trimble, Watts, Wheeler, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, and Mr. President—52.

So the motion to re-commit with instructions was laid on the table.

Mr. WALPOLE moved to re-commit the section to the committee on rights and privileges, with the following instructions:

“Strike out the entire section and insert the following:

“That no man's particular services shall be demanded, or property taken, without the consent of his representatives, or without a just compensation being made therefor.”

Mr. PETTIT. It does seem to me, Mr. President, that we have already spent time enough to-day over this matter. The vote of the majority of the Convention has already indicated that they intend to sustain these sections as they now stand, and therefore, it is only a waste of time to offer motions for re-committal with instructions. I call sir, for the previous question on the adoption of the sections.

The PRESIDENT. The question is, will the Convention second the call for the previous question?

On this question, a division being called for, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 53, nays 51.

So the demand for the previous question was seconded.

The PRESIDENT. The question is, shall the main question be now put?

The motion was agreed to.

The question then being upon the motion of the gentleman from Hancock, (Mr. Walpole,) to re-commit the section to the committee on rights and privileges, with instructions,

Mr. BORDEN called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken, with the following result—yeas 42, nays 75:

Those voting in the affirmative were,

Messrs. Badger, Balingall, Barbour, Beard, Blythe, Bourne, Brookbank, Clark of Tippecanoe, Colfax, Farrow, Foley, Frisbie, Gordon, Hall, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Howe, Kendall of Wabash, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, Morgan, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Pepper of Crawford, Rariden, Read of Clark, Robinson, Smith of Ripley, Steele, Stevenson, Taylor, Todd, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, and Work—42.

Those voting in the negative were,

Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Berry, Borden, Bowers, Bracken, Carr, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Coats, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Edmonston, Fisher, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hendricks, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Warren, Logan, March, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Read of Monroe, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Tague, Trimble, Wheeler, Wunderlich, Zenor, and Mr. President—75.

So the motion to re-commit, with instructions, was laid upon the table.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is upon the passage of these sections as engrossed.

Mr. OWEN. I would inquire of the Chair, whether, by the rule, these sections are not to be engrossed and passed separately?

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remind the gentleman and the Convention, that, if they intend to pass the sections separately, they should have so determined before this demand for the previous question was made. [Cries of “read,” “read”].

The PRESIDENT. The sections have already been read two or three times, and it is not in order to read them again.

Mr. WALPOLE. I hope, sir, that the sections will be read again. There are several members who do not know precisely how they stand.

The PRESIDENT. The reading is not in order.

Mr. WALPOLE. Is the section relating to negroes included in these sections which it is now proposed to pass?

The PRESIDENT. It is not.

The yeas and nays being demanded on the final passage of the sections, they were ordered and taken, with the following result—yeas 91, nays 26:

Those voting in the affirmative were,

Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Berry, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Bracken, Brookbank, Carr, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Graham of War- rick, Haddon, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Wash- ington, Mowrer, Nave, Nofsinger, Owen, Pep- per of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Robinson, Schoon- over, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Todd, Trimble, Wheeler, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Zenor, and Mr. President—91.

Those voting in the negative were,

Messrs. Badger, Balingall, Barbour, Borden, Bowers, Clark of Hamilton, Foley, Frisbie, Gordon, Hall, Hawkins, Helm, Howe, Kilgore, Kinley, March, Milligan, Morgan, Murray, New- man, Niles, Rariden, Smith of Ripley, Taylor, Walpole, and Watts—26.

So the 1st, 2d, and 3d sections of No. 2 were passed, and referred to the committee on revision, arrangement, and phraseology.

Mr. PETTIT. I move now to refer these sections to the committee on revision, arrange- ment, and phraseology.

The PRESIDENT. We have already a resolution which carries them there without any action.

NEGRO IMMIGRATION AND RIGHTS.

Mr. BORDEN. Would it not be in order now, to take up the consideration of the next section in the report, connected with the bill of rights?

The PRESIDENT. The next subject in order is the consideration of a section with refer- ence to the bill of rights, being the last section reported on the 26th of October, from the com- mittee on the rights and privileges of the inhab- itants of this State. The Secretary will read the section.

The section was then read, and it is as fol- lows.

SECTION.—The General Assembly, at its first session under the amended Constitution, shall pass laws prohibiting negroes and mulat- toes from coming into, or settling in, this State; and prohibiting any negro or mulatto from pur- chasing or otherwise acquiring real estate, here- after.

The pending amendment, by Mr. Hall, was also read, as follows:

Add to the section these words: "Provided, that nothing herein shall be so construed as to prevent any negro or mulatto now residing in this State, from holding real estate."

Mr. GIBSON, having proposed to amend the amendment, by inserting after the word "hold- ing" the words, "or purchasing;" and the same being read,

Mr. HALL said, I accept that amendment, sir.

Mr. GIBSON. I prefer that the vote should be taken, Mr. President; for I had intended to vote against my own amendment.

A VOICE. "You can't help it now."

Mr. GIBSON. I ask if it is in order to with- draw my amendment?

The PRESIDENT. It is not. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALL'S amendment, as amended, was now read by the Secretary.

Mr. KENT said,

Mr. President, I have but few remarks to make upon the question before the Convention, notwithstanding I look upon it as one of more vital importance to the people of Indiana, than any other that will likely engage the delibera- tions of this body.

It will be recollected by the Convention, that subsequent to the report of the section under discussion by the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of the State, the same committee reported a section that there shall be an annual appropriation, not exceeding ten thousand dollars, set apart by law for the gradual colonization of so many of the negroes and mulattoes now in this State, as shall de- sire to leave it, and shall not have the means to do so.

Now I think it must be apparent to all, that when we reach this section by the regular order of business, this whole subject will again come up for discussion, however much and long we may now debate the section before us. If I am correct in this, would it not save time to postpone the further discussion of the question, until we reach the section last reported?

But there is another consideration why this subject should be postponed, and, perhaps, re- ferred to a select committee. I am aware that the Convention has decided that the question of negro suffrage should not be submitted to the people, as a distinct proposition. With this decision I am content. But the question of prohibiting negroes and mulattoes from coming into the State, is one of deep interest and vast moment to us and to ours, to the present, as well as future generations. It is one of the greatest questions that ever engaged the attention of any deliberative body in this State; and connected with the appropriation of ten thousand dollars annually for colonization purposes, it lays sure the foundation of ultimately excluding from the State the entire negro population, thereby securing a homogeneous race in the great and growing State of Indiana. And is not the attainment of this object desirable? Can the friends even those who profess to be the exclusive friends, of this unfortunate and degraded race, devise a more feasible plan of ultimately bettering their condition? Can gentlemen for one moment doubt but that the object of these sections is to secure the greatest good and highest interest of the two races?

Gentlemen greatly mistake American character and American feeling and sentiment upon this question, if they think that opposition to the provisions of these sections will receive the approbation of the people. The tendency, strong and irresistible, of the American mind, is finally to accomplish a separation of the two races.

At the last session of Congress the Naval Committee made a report, recommending the Government to establish a line of mail steamships to the Western coast of Africa, for the purpose of suppressing the African slave trade, and of promoting the colonization of free persons of color from the United States to Liberia. In this report the committee recommend the Government to build three steamships, to be of not less than four thousand tons burden each, and the three to cost not to exceed the sum of two millions seven hundred thousand dollars. It is estimated that these vessels will transport to Liberia eighteen thousand passengers annually, at a cost of not to exceed ten dollars for each emigrant over twelve years of age, and five for each one under that age. These sums also include the transportation of baggage, and the daily supply of rations.

The committee then proceed to remark, that it is chiefly for the great and beneficent objects of removing the free persons of color from this country to the coast of Africa, and of suppressing the slave trade, that they are disposed to recommend the adoption of the proposed measure. The latter of these has been the subject of treaties by our Government with other nations, with whom we have engaged to maintain a large naval force on the coast of Africa, to assist in suppressing the inhuman traffic; while the emigration of the free blacks has long been an object of great interest in all parts of the country.

"In no part of the Union do the free blacks enjoy an equality of political and social privileges; and in all the States their presence is neither agreeable to the whites, nor is their condition advantageous to themselves. In some of the slave States stringent prohibitions have been adopted, and unpleasant controversies with free States have been thereby engendered. The emigration of this entire population beyond the limits of our country is the only effectual mode of curing these evils, and of removing one cause of dangerous irritation between the different sections of the Union."

This report contains much valuable information respecting the climate, soil, production, and the character of the population of Liberia; and also a most interesting statistical account of the progress of the Colonization Society, and the great benefits contemplated by establishing these mail steamships.

Viewing then this question as one of vital interest to the country, and desiring that it may be separated from the amended Constitution, and submitted as a distinct proposition to the people, I move to refer this section to a committee of one from each Congressional district, with instructions to inquire into the best means of ultimately separating the white and colored races in Indiana; and also into the expediency of incorporating in one article all Constitutional provisions relative to negroes and mulattoes, and submitting the same separately to the people.

THE PRESIDENT. The question now is upon referring the section as proposed by the gentleman from Floyd.

Mr. CRUMBACKER said—

Mr. PRESIDENT: Before the question is taken I desire to make a few remarks; although I know very well I shall be running some risk of doing myself an injury. But I cannot consent, conscientiously, to see a subject of so much importance as this disposed of, without setting myself right before the Convention and my constituents with reference to the whole matter.

It would probably be well enough for me to say, in the commencement of my remarks, that I do not expect to throw any light upon the subject that will have a tendency to change the mind of a single individual member of the Convention; but, inasmuch as we have come here for the purpose of freely exchanging our views with reference to every important matter presented for the action of this body, I shall avail myself of the privilege of expressing the sentiments which I hold with regard to this (in my estimation) very important question.

I am opposed to the section as originally reported by the committee. What, sir, are we proposing to do? What is proposed, in this section, to be done with that important part of the human race, known amongst us as Africans?

I hold, sir, that it is the province of legislation to elevate all the subjects of law to as high a point of civil and social condition as their ability for improvement will permit them to rise. I hold that it is the proper province of every deliberative body like this, about to arrange the organic law, for the purpose of governing a large portion of the people of this Union, to take care that the future legislation and laws of the State shall have for their tendency the elevation of the condition of all the subjects of law.

Now, sir, is it not a mistaken principle, so to legislate, that the laws we enact with reference to any class of the inhabitants of this State, instead of elevating, shall depress and degrade them? If we legislate for them as brutes, we shall make brutes of them. If we legislate for them as men, we shall make men of them. Our laws will then have a tendency to stimulate them to exert all their powers of native improbability, and enable them to rise to the highest point of civilization which it is possible for them to attain. If we legislate for them as for human beings capable of improvement, there will doubtless be found a corresponding improvement on their part.

Gentlemen tell us that the negroes are a degraded race. Well, I admit it. But what has degraded them? Again we are told, that, when they were brought from Africa, they were in a very degraded condition; and that, being brought into this land of—shall we call it liberty or slavery—of liberty to us—to them, slavery—their condition has been elevated and improved. This, also, is true to a certain extent. It is certainly true that their condition has been elevated; but who has sought to elevate them? What, I ask, has legislation done for them in the United States? What has been done, in this way, for the purpose of elevating and ameliorating their condition? I affirm, sir, that the only elevation of character they have attained by being brought to this country, has been brought about in them by the mere force of circumstances, and against all the legislation and all social combinations of the country; the tendencies of which have been to trample them down and keep them in the dust, as low as we found them in their native land. Does not this prove that there is a degree of improbability about the negro race, and that, by pursuing a proper course towards them, they might be elevated far above the position they now occupy? It is true that the whole course of legislation, in regard to this subject, has been designed, and has had a tendency, to keep them in darkness, and in a state of degradation suitable for slaves. It has been the policy of certain States of this confederacy to strive, by their legislation, as far as possible, to shut out light and knowledge from the African race, and keep them in total ignorance, by excluding them from the enjoyment of all those rights and privileges which are dear to the human heart, and which would not have a tendency to diminish their value as slaves. And yet, (still more to approve this national injustice,) the cry is raised in this free State, that we should exclude them from our borders, lest they might attain to some of the rights and privileges which we enjoy in this boasted land of freedom!

I am opposed to this section as originally reported by the committee, because I look upon it to be a right, that we should extend to the negro race all the privileges that can be accorded to them in this State, which will not have a direct tendency to infringe upon our own rights. Many of them—in fact, all the free negroes in our country—were born in this land. The United States is the land of their nativity; they were born and raised here, and here they are surrounded with all the associations of life which are dear to them—having a strong tendency to attach them to this, their home. Should it, then, be one of the objects of this Convention to endeavor to deprive these people of those privileges which ought always to belong to all the inhabitants of the State. Sir, it is going too far to exclude any portion of the human race, who may desire to immigrate to our State, by prescribing, in the fundamental law, that they shall have no right to hold property amongst us.

Sir, how does this course of action, with regard to these people, correspond with the sentiments which, as a nation, we have always held forth to the world? We have caused the boast to go abroad for more than half a century, that this country affords an asylum for the oppressed of all nations—a home for the protection of the refugees of every people, and especially for the protection of the down-trodden victims of tyranny. All have been invited to this happy land, where they may be sure of the enjoyment of equal rights—where the unfortunate Hungarian, the exiled Poles, the serfs of Russia, and all the degraded victims of despotism, from every country of Europe, are invited to come to our borders. We not only open our doors, but our hearts, also, and with open arms embrace them. We take them to our bosoms, and give them everything in our power which may be necessary to support and comfort them in their exile from their native land. But, sir, when these individuals, who have been born in the United States, but who have been so fortunate as to rise above the injustice and oppression which, at first, bound them down to slavery, present themselves at the door of our State, we reject them with scorn; we will have nothing to do with them. Because they are clothed with a dark skin, we will tread them down to the earth.

Sir, we ask for the black race nothing more than what we are willing to accord to all persons coming from foreign countries. We ask for those born in this land only what we, as a people, have always most cheerfully, and willingly, and heartily accorded to those who are born in foreign and distant lands, where the laws and forms of government under which they have lived, have, perhaps, degraded them to a level with the negroes themselves. We care not how ignorant these latter may be, we receive them and give them a cordial welcome. But when the negro comes to our borders, we meet him with an interdiction of his rights; we reject him with scorn and contempt.

It will be out of my power to proceed, in my remarks, with reference to this subject, as I could wish; and I shall, therefore, notice a few things which were said during the discussion of the subject last week. The gentleman from Clark (Mr. —) remarked, with reference to this subject, that the conduct of the Kentucky Convention, with reference to free negroes was a most infamous stain upon the character of that body. I think I cannot be mistaken, for I took down the gentleman's language at the time. Now I would ask you, sir, if the conduct of the Kentucky Convention, in ejecting the free negroes from that Commonwealth, or in other words, making provision that all negroes hereafter set free in that State, and remaining there a certain length of time, shall be sold again into bondage, which is virtually declaring that they shall leave the State; if such conduct was an infamous stain upon that Convention, I ask, in what light we should view our own conduct if we were to adopt a similar provision? Can two wrongs ever make a right? If the Kentucky Convention has done wrong in this matter, I would like to know whether our action corresponding with theirs, can make their wrong right? I think not, sir. It must be regarded as a glaring wrong. Such a course would have no tendency to right the wrong already committed, but it would only double the weight of oppression which it has cast upon that unfortunate and degraded race.

But the same gentleman remarked that the Africans had been civilized and christianized by being brought to our country. I have already spoken with reference to this matter, and I have only now to say that if they have been elevated in their moral condition, if they have been civilized and christianized, they owe no thanks to us. For has it ever been the primary intention, or the tendency of the legislation of this country, to elevate the black race? I answer, no. But, on the contrary, the tendency of the legislation of nearly every State in this Union has always been to oppress and keep them in a condition little superior to the brute. If they have been civilized, and christianized, and elevated in their character, it has been in spite of legislation, and every circumstance in their social condition, which have combined to crush them down to the very dust. And the fact, that in this country, they have been elevated in the scale of civilization, as I have before remarked, is the best evidence in the world of their improbability. If their condition has been improved in spite of the course of oppression and wrong which has been hitherto constantly pursued towards them, does it not prove that if we adopt a more liberal course, we might elevate them to a condition greatly su-prior to anything which it has been supposed they were capable of attaining.

The gentleman from Monroe, (Mr. Foster,) if I mistake not, spoke of the black race as a kind of connecting link between the monkey and the human being. I do not suppose the gentleman was serious in the remark which he made, and therefore I shall not reply to it further than to say that however proper it may be to indulge a good joke at a proper time, it seems to me that upon such an occasion as this, when human rights are at stake, the remark of that gentleman was entirely out of place.

Mr. FOSTER (interposing, and Mr. C. giving way,) said: I was speaking of the theory of Lord Monboddoo, which is not merely applicable to the negro alone, but to the whole human race.

Mr. CRUMBACKER (continuing.) There was also a remark made by the same gentleman with reference to the theory of Professor Agasiz. The theory of this learned Professor may be very ingenious indeed, but I think that when we come to examine the subject in the light which physiologists have afforded us, with reference to the unity of the human race, this ingenious theory must fall to the ground. If we are willing to take the doctrine of Holy Writ in preference to the teachings of a vain philosophy, we must come to the conclusion that however dark the skin, and however degraded the condition, and however ignorant and uninformed the mind of the African, and whatever difference in his formation from that of the Anglo-Saxon race, originally they sprung all from the same stock. For of one flesh and one blood were created all the inhabitants of the earth. And I would remark, further, that if we were to take the most favored families of the white race from the present position which they occupy, and place them at once in the condition of the African slaves, and keep them in the possession of masters for generation after generation, and age after age; if they were to have no covering to protect their heads from the scorching sun, think you that their hair would not crisp even more than some of ours? and if their feet were never made to feel the wholesome restraint of shoes, I would like to know whether their heels might not be expected to run back; and by wading in the rice swamps for years, their feet would become broad and flat! Think you that this change of condition would not make a corresponding change in their complexion and form, and that the consequent moral degradation would not bring them down at least to a level with the African race themselves?

It is true that in the course of ages, however elevated we may now appear to be, however fine the form and symmetry we may now possess, by a course like this we would eventually be brought down to a level with the African in his most degraded position. Sir, there is no kind of doubt of it.

Now, sir, permit me to say a few words in reference to the theory advanced by the gentleman from Floyd (Mr. Kent). He remarked that the tendency of the American mind is to separate the races. I believe, myself, that this is the only true policy. I believe that it is the only policy that will ever succeed, or that will result in the complete elevation of the African race to the highest position which they can attain. I like the theory well enough; but, until it is carried into practical effect, until some means are devised by which the theory can be carried into practice, I must forever raise my voice against the provision reported in the original section which is now under consideration by this body. Until this theory—the complete separation of the races—can be accomplished; until it is introduced into practical effect; until some means are devised by which money may be appropriated, and means made use of, to bring about this desirable end, I say let us, as far as we possibly can by legislation, and by our conduct in every respect, give to the negro race something to stimulate and elevate them—something that will elevate their character and make them better than they are now.

But, by the way, I am not done with the remarks of the gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Foster). He said in reference to the African race, whether they are a separate and distinct race from the white man or not, that he does know they are under the ban of Heaven; that a curse was pronounced upon them by the Almighty, and that it still remains upon them. I should very much like that the gentleman would quote the language of Holy Writ by which that declaration can be sustained. We may go back to the time when Noah's son received the malediction of his father—that he and his children should be the servants of servants. I say I should like any gentleman to prove to me whether the African race are the regular lineal descendants of Noah's son. I should like to have it proved whether, at this distant day, the genealogy of the African race can be traced back to the unfortunate son of Noah. I think gentlemen who undertake to establish the fact will undertake a hopeless task, or to prove that they are yet under the ban of Heaven and the curse of the Almighty.

Mr. President, there are many things that crowd upon my mind in connection with this subject to which I would like to give utterance on the present occasion, but I do not feel that I have strength sufficient to make further remarks now. My health has been feeble for some length of time, and I find that my strength has failed me sooner than I anticipated. For the present, therefore, I must desist—thanking the Convention for the attention with which they have heard me.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford said—

MR. PRESIDENT: Without wishing to detain the Convention with a set speech, I desire to give, in brief, the reasons that will influence my vote upon the question now pending. It is not merely an abstract question of right or wrong to the negro, not now an inhabitant of our soil, but one of a practical character, that should address itself to the candid consideration of every mind—what is best in the premises to be done, Shall Indiana continue to remain a free and prosperous State, uncontaminated by the further and continued influx of free negroes? Or shall we quietly leave open our doors and thereby suffer the State to become a great almshouse of pauperism, and consequently of vice. These are the true questions we have boldly to meet, and at once, call them by whatsoever name you please.

Gentlemen may talk eloquently about the rights of man; they may point to the blood-bought stripes and stars of their country's ensign; they may depict in glowing terms the piteous condition of the whole Ethiopian race, and appeal to the philanthropy of the human heart—yet all this will not change the true issue. The question still is, what is best for the free-men of this State, now and for the future.

Sir, to my mind the path of duty is clearly marked; that great principle that underlies all other rights—self-defense—self-preservation—requires that we should act wisely in adjusting this very difficult matter.

It is very clear that by the emigration of free blacks among us, we will not be in any wise benefited—the State none the gainer.

It would be conceded that if, by admitting the colored population into our social compact, they would be benefited and we in no wise injured, it would be altogether proper to suffer them to come.

But, sir, I hold that such would not be the result. On the contrary, it is clear to my mind that the worst of consequences would follow. As has been remarked, histories, both sacred and profane, teach that distinct races, if entitled to equal privileges, cannot dwell together prosperously and happy any great length of time. It is further demonstrated by experience in this and sister States, that the whites and free colored persons cannot live together in harmony. The latter universally have a sneering contempt for those they please to term "poor white folks;" jealousy, hatred, and malice usually exist between them, and not unfrequently terminates in a war of extermination of one or the other combatants.

This may be, and doubtless is, to some extent, owing to the want of proper training and education on the part of the blacks; but shall we be called upon to bear the infliction of those grievances until a new mind and heart are given this unfortunate race by a still further draw upon our benevolence by educating them in our proper schools? This would be taxing our good nature rather much. I will offer another reason, which, to me, is of paramount importance, why I oppose their immigration and settlement here. It should be our true policy to encourage and foster the labor of this country; in this single item, more than in all others, depends our prosperity as a State and as a nation; it should be respected everywhere and by every person; nothing should be allowed or suffered that would lower or degrade it.

Now, I would ask gentlemen, if we flood the State with free negroes, bring them into competition with white male and female labor, if it will not degrade it? It certainly will. Nor will this be all. It will not only degrade white labor, but it will drive white competition away. Sir, no man here more heartily pities the unfortunate African than myself; no man would be more rejoiced to see their condition ameliorated; nay, more, to see them free and independent, in the full enjoyment of all the rights that appertain to freemen; but I want them to enjoy those rights as a separate colony or nation, not as tenants in common with the Anglo-Saxon family.

These rights can only exist to the extent named when thus separated from the whites.

Believing, therefore, that the interest of the State, the lasting prosperity and happiness thereof, as well as the true happiness of the blacks, demand that the two races should be separated, I go for shutting them out; for raising, if necessary, a wall high as Heaven between them and us.

As to the question said to be involved in the second section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States, it is quite clear to my mind that we have the right to make any sort of restriction we please. That section reads as follows:

"The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

As was remarked, when the Constitution of the United States was adopted, free negroes were not regarded as citizens in any of the States, and had not, prior thereto, been so regarded in the colonies.

And at this time they are not regarded as citizens "entitled to all the privileges and immunities" in any of the States of this Union, and therefore the section above referred to is not binding upon the action of this Convention.

Mr. President, while I am anxious to establish the most stringent measures to effectually bar the further immigration of negroes into this State, I deem it, nevertheless, to be the duty of this body to guard the vested rights of these who now have their settlement here; we should take no step which would have the effect of making them worthless, vicious, and idle, by depriving them of the right of holding and enjoying property.

While inhabitants of the State, they are entitled to the protection of the law; their right to acquire and enjoy property should not be denied; they should have the right to pursue their own substantial happiness in every lawful way.

From the argument of gentlemen on the other side, particularly the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Gregg,) one would think that if this restriction is placed on the Constitution it will be rejected by the people by an overwhelming vote, and will, moreover, add oil to the flame of discord that now burns in the various sections of the Union, if, indeed, it would not prove the cause of its dissolution.

This is an important question to Indiana, but surely the destinies of the Union do not hang upon it.

Sir, it is true that now and then an angry cloud obscures the bright effulgence of the political sky, but I have an abiding confidence in the perpetuity of this Union; it is not made of a rope of sand—it is indissoluble.

All the negro factions, North and South, are not able to subvert it. Twenty millions of freemen, armed with stout hearts and brawny arms, will stand by the Constitution of their country in the hour of peril, come when that hour may. The colors that were borne aloft triumphantly in the revolutionary struggle, will never be disgraced while liberty is appreciated or the rights of man respected.

But, sir, if dissolution must come, if the sisterhood of States is to be broken, if those bright luminaries that give life and light to the great federal ark, are to be extinguished and rudely torn asunder, if a second independence is to be achieved, greater will be the necessity for the citizens of Indiana to be of one heart, one mind, one purpose.

In that dread hour we shall want men of tried valor and patriotism; not negroes nor mulattoes, but men bound to the interest of their country "by hooks of steel."

Mr. ROBINSON. Situated as I am upon this question, and occupying the position which I do, I feel it to be my duty before I give the vote which I expect to give upon the question now under consideration, to place myself right before the people whom I represent, as well as before the community at large, upon the broad principles of justice on which I think every member of this Convention ought to stand. It is a failing that attaches to legislators and perhaps to all men, that we are too apt, upon exciting questions, to run into extremes. When we attempt to do what we think is right, we are too apt to allow our feelings to carry us beyond the proper point. I look upon this discussion and upon this question as a great one; and I am the last man that would trifle with it or treat it with levity. It is a question involving the rights of human beings—a part of the community whom God has made for a noble purpose; and in the eyes of the great Creator of the Universe they are as good as we are. But, sir, we are now called upon to do that which will materially affect their rights, not only for the present but perhaps for all coming time. I look upon it, therefore, as a question of serious import, as one that should not be trifled with by any man who possesses proper feelings. Because I am free, and enjoy all the blessings of liberty, I cannot conscientiously stand here and see legislators trifle with the rights of those who are more unfortunate than myself.

Upon the subject of prohibiting these unfortunate beings from coming into the State, I shall, at all times, cast my vote in favor of it. And I shall do so, not so much as an act of justice, but as an act of right; for I believe that the American citizen, who is enjoying the blessings of liberty and free government here, is the last that should raise his voice, either to speak in terms of degradation in regard to these creatures, or to circumscribe their rights. God made them, and he made them a country. Whether that country was adapted to their happiness or their well-being or not, placed there they were enjoying it, even if it was according to their heathen custom; and, sir, if the hand of fate, or rather I should say the hand of the white man had been kept off them, this question that is engrossing the attention of every American statesman, and threatening to shake the foundations of our blessed Union, is a question with which we would not have been troubled at this day. But, sir, they are here, and an important question is, how did they come here? If they had voluntarily obtruded themselves upon us, and attempted to acquire a settlement among us as a part of the body politic, by their own act and deed, then might gentlemen stand up and talk here about the line of separation, and about their being brutes and below the level of civilization. But, sir, when it is recollected that we are the aggressors, when it is remembered that we are the pirates, that we have torn them from their families and chained them here in servitude, I do think that it comes with an ill grace from any member of this Convention, to talk about a distinction which God himself does not recognize. But, sir, as I remarked before, as a matter of necessity—and there is such a thing as necessity and the laws of necessity—as a matter of necessity, and from the course pursued in the sister States which hold these creatures in abject slavery—and as I have spoken at home among my own people, so shall I speak here—as a matter of necessity for the promotion and preservation of peace and harmony, not only in our own State but throughout the Union, and for the promotion of the ends of justice, I think we ought to say to the State of Kentucky, my native State, and to the sister States who hold the colored man in slavery, “when you have got from these creatures everything you can possibly get, when you have compelled them to serve you until they are worn down by age, the land in which their labors have been expended is the land in which they ought to end their days; and after you have made them serve you thus long you shall be compelled to maintain them during the remainder of their declining years. It would only be an act of justice to the State of Indiana, enjoying as she does the blessings of freedom unconnected with the curse of slavery, to prevent the people of a State who have aggrandized themselves by the labors of that unfortunate race till they are able to labor no longer, from throwing off their old negroes upon us, and making us an asylum for pauperism in its worst forms. I have upon all occasions, and I will upon all occasions vote for the prohibition, for shutting the doors against them in all time to come. But when I am asked to vote upon this question, when I am asked to do an act which I regard as morally wrong, and religiously wrong, when I am asked to forbear to exercise mercy and to do an act of cruelty and injustice, I must pause and consider before I cast that vote; I must place myself in the position in which I would wish to be placed before my people.

Mr. President, an important question presents itself here to my mind. And what is it? It is this: How did these unfortunate creatures that are now settled in little detached settlements in our own State come among us? They came among us at the time when that declaration of rights—that record that speaks the pure sentiments of the patriot and the statesman—had widely thrown open our doors to their admission. They came to a State that was proclaiming in the broad terms of the bill of rights that “all men are born free and equal,” that they have certain “inherent and inalienable rights, among which the right to acquire, possess, and enjoy property.” Under that bill of rights we threw open our doors to them. If the State of Indiana had barred her door against them and shut them out when her first organic law was framed, and if they had afterwards obtruded themselves upon us by stealth or otherwise, I would go with the gentleman who has just taken his seat, to remove them from the State even now. But we held out to them the olive branch; we told them “here is the land of liberty and freedom,” and under that invitation they found their way into the State and settled among us and have honestly acquired property. And now, sir, the question is presented to me as a member of this grave, and I believe honest, body, to cast my vote to take—yea, to steal from them that property, which they have justly and honestly acquired. I will go as far as any man in furnishing means to colonize them and send them off to a country of their own. I believe with many gentlemen on this floor that the two races can never live together; and I hope they can never mix or amalgamate; but, sir, the isolated question presents itself—not whether we will in future colonize them, not whether we will try to better their condition, not whether we will treat them as men, and aid them in seeking a home and a retreat from the hand of the aggressor, but whether we will take from them that right which will give the lie to the bill of rights and that bold charter of our liberties, which every American citizen holds in his hand. Sir, for one I cannot, will not do it, let the consequences to me be what they may. I hope, therefore, that the amendment will prevail. It is not quite so satisfactory as I would wish it, but with that amendment we secure one thing—that those who now have property may hold it. I am willing to go that far; I am willing to say to the African that resides in a slave State, that if you at any future period procure your emancipation papers, and come to purchase property in the State of Indiana, you shall not transmit it either by descent or in any other way. But it would be an act of injustice and inhumanity—an act wholly beneath a Christian people, to say to that man who has acquired property by honest means, who has paid his money into the treasury of the government for his land, and into the treasury of this State in the shape of taxes, who has gone into the forest and felled the trees and cleared the land and improved the country—I say it would be unjust, and contrary to every principle of moral honesty and humanity and sound policy, to say to that people, “we will now take from you these rights.” Sir, I think we ought to get along with as many of this class of people as we have now got, in the best way we can. We must enact laws in future, if necessary, to prevent this flood of immigration of these people. But, sir, they are here; and I can see no way, no law that we can adopt in justice, by which we can take away from those that are here, those rights which they have acquired under the laws of the State. When they came here and settled and purchased property, the laws of the State entered into every part of that contract. When they paid their money into the land office of the Federal Government, they did so under the laws of the State of Indiana, and the contract became a contract between them and the people of the State. When they paid every year their taxes according to their assessment, or when they improved the country under our laws, it was a part of the obligation resting upon us, both politically and religiously, to permit them to enjoy the fruits of their labor. There can be but one sensible way about it; but one way that is just; but one way that is right, and that is to do the best we can with the evil that now exists, and permit them to do what would not be denied to any other men, and what cannot be denied under the spirit of that bill of rights, to prohibit them to possess that property, to transmit it to their posterity, or to sell and dispose of it by deed. Thus far I go upon this subject.

Had I not felt it to be my duty to make these remarks, had I not felt that I stood in a peculiar attitude here, had I not felt that my people are strongly divided upon this question; did I not feel impelled by a sense of moral justice—a sense of honesty and Christian obligation, to make these few broken and disconnected remarks, I should not at this time have imposed myself upon the attention of the Convention. I shall vote in favor of the amendment; and if it is not adopted, if the naked question is put to me and I am called upon as a delegate in this Convention, coming here with an open honest purpose to do right, if it should come to that, that the isolated question is put to me, and I must vote to take from those individuals already here the rights to dispose of their property, let the consequences be what they may, whether they may operate for me or against me hereafter, until I can lay my hand on my heart and say “I am doing right,” my vote shall be recorded against it and shall stand there upon the journals of this Convention and go down in after-time as at least an evidence that I had independence enough to do what I believed to be morally right upon this great question, involving the rights and liberties and privileges of life and property to a certain class of God’s creatures who, unfortunate as they may be, are now amongst us.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe. I rise simply for the purpose, Mr. President, of stating very briefly, the reasons for the votes which I shall give upon this question. I stand here, sir, pledged to my constituents, to vote to preserve the Constitution of the State, so far as it relates to the rights of negroes, precisely as it now exists. And, sir, allow me to say, that I am not thus pledged because of any purpose to secure votes during the canvass. But, on the contrary, I hazarded my election, and, perhaps, came near being beaten by maintaining the ground which I expect to maintain here. I say then, Mr. President, I stand pledged before my constituents to sustain, so far as I have ability, the great and fundamental principles of liberty embodied in the first section of the bill of rights in our present Constitution, which declares that all men have certain natural, inherent, and unalienable rights among which are, the enjoying and defending life, and liberty, and of acquiring and protecting property, and pursuing, and obtaining happiness and safety.

I am pledged, sir, to recognize by law, the negro, as a man, and not to deny to him, the great and essential rights of humanity. The right to life, liberty and the right to acquire the means of subsistence. The right of suffrage, the right to hold office, are not declared in our bill of rights to be natural and inalienable; these may be denied. But the right to life, the right of liberty, the right of acquiring the means of subsistence, must be granted, else, as I conceive, the elementary prin-ples on which our government is based, are wrong. I may, sir, feel constrained to vote against the reference of this subject to a committee. I would prefer to vote directly on the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Jefferson. I would prefer to vote directly to strike out the section reported by the committee, and insert the first clause of the bill of rights as contained in the old Constitution. Here we have the two opposing propositions directly before us; we can choose this one or the other.

I understand, sir, that according to the theory of our government, the sovereignty, the sovereign authority of governing resides in the white male citizens of the State. This is a mere conventional agreement, and I think very properly placed in their hands. But sir, these sovereigns are not invested with this high and solemn trust to be exercised without restraint. Sir, in their hands is deposited this sovereign authority, not merely that they may work out their own will without reference to the interests or necessities of others. They may not consult their prejudices—they are bound to execute justice, if not to be merciful. They are, sir, to govern according to the great and elementary laws, laid down in the words of this amendment now pending, proposed by the gentleman from Jefferson. It is also declared in the great charter of human liberty, the Declaration of Independence, that governments are instituted to protect the natural and inalienable rights of men. So that, by our theory of government, wherever the sovereignty may belong, it must be exercised with a reference to these principles, and executed in such a manner as to carry out the design of its institution.

Nothing could appear more strange to me, an American born, the voice of liberty sounding in my ears from my earliest infancy, reared among the simple inhabitants on the frontiers of our country, than that an assemblage of American statesmen should refuse to affirm the principles of the Declaration of Independence, those great principles inscribed on all our banners, streaming every where before the world. There they are before us, written in letters of living light! Sir, they cannot be obliterated from our memory, nor be blotted out from the hearts of men. Humanity has adopted them as its watchword—the whole human race has seized upon them as their hope for deliverance from oppression.

Our fathers, sir, proclaimed them to the world. In their vindication, they hazarded their lives their fortunes, and their sacred honor. They upheld them triumphantly in presence of the whole world. But what do we propose to do—to deny these sacred principles—to refuse them a place in our government and laws—because our prejudice against the poor degraded negro will not allow us to grant to him protection in his life, liberty, and property?

Sir, the committee on rights and privileges, which reported these sections, might be far more appropriately called the committee on the restrictions and exclusions. For in the face of these sections they have not ventured to report any clause for the new Constitution, recognizing and affirming the great and elementary principles of all free governments. Yet so essential are these principles in determining all questions involving human rights, that the chairman of that committee, (Mr. Owen,) the other day, in his speech on another question of rights, based his argument on these very principles. Sir, the legislators in the enactment of laws, the courts in their decisions, the lawyer, the citizen, all constantly refer to these great principles. They are the sources whence all power derives its warrant of authority. They are the test by which all things are tried in a free government.

Mr. OWEN. Will the gentleman from Tippecanoe allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe. Certainly.

Mr. OWEN. As the gentleman has referred to the committee on rights and privileges in regard to this subject, it is proper that I should explain that there was no vote taken upon reporting or offering to report the first section of the first article of the Constitution; but it was agreed that for the present, it should not be reported until the subject of negro exclusion, or negro rights generally, was disposed of by the Convention.

Mr. CLARK. The gentleman from Posey is right, no doubt, in his explanation—for as I have already stated, that the gentleman's mind was too logical not to perceive the absurdity of reporting the bill of rights, including all the rights of citizens under the government of the State of Indiana, while at the same time excluding the rights of negroes. Applying this principle if we admit the negro as a human being, we must admit that he is entitled to protection in his life, liberty, and property.

I said, Mr. President, that it was a Conventional arrangement, that the sovereignty should reside in the male citizens, and not an essential principle. But it is an essential principle—elementary and unavoidably pertaining to the very nature of a free government—that this sovereignty be restrained within certain and defined limits. That is, that certain rights of individuals be regarded as sacred, unalienable, and beyond the power of the sovereignty itself. These rights are described in our bill of rights. Now, sir, if this sovereignty be without restraint, how does it differ from a despotism, except that a majority of the people decide, without restraint, in what manner they may choose to exercise their authority. I am ready to grant that they are far more likely to exercise this power justly, than a single individual; nevertheless, such a government is a despotism. But happily, sir, for us, ours is no such government; we have the double security that the citizen sovereigns administer the power of the government, and that they are restrained by Constitutional limitations.

Let us remember too, sir, that it is demanded of those who govern, that reason and intelligence are to be their guide, and that passion and prejudice are to be laid aside. In all human affairs wisdom and prudence are necessary to men, whether acting as individuals or as societies under organized governments.

I said, sir, that I had staked my election on this question, for I had promised, when nominated as a candidate, that whatever I found to be true, that I would advocate, fearless of the consequence to myself. I said to my constituents, if you invest me with this high and solemn trust of determining on your own rights and the rights of others, I will seek after what is just and true, and that I will maintain. And, sir, having been born an American, and taught to admit the great principles of liberty and of free government, as proclaimed in our Constitution, to be true, I was unavoidably forced to the conclusion that the negro, that all men, have a right to be protected in their lives, liberty, and property. I found it impossible to arrive at any other conclusion without denying the premises; without discarding the principles which may be said to be inborn in every American heart. I was compelled, sir, to say to my friends, as well as to those who opposed me, these are my principles—these are the conclusions to which my mind necessarily leads me—if they are obnoxious to you vote against me. Humble as my name is, I will not record it in opposition to the great principles of human liberty. I will not support a measure which I think to be contrary to justice and humanity.

And, sir, when it was proposed to me to vote that a separate proposition be submitted to the people of the State, granting to negroes the right of suffrage, I refused to support such a proposition. I would not vote for it as an individual citizen, and I would not advocate it as a public servant; I did not regard it as promising any advantage either to the black or to the white man, for, as I before observed, according to my theory of our government, it is not stipulated that every man shall be a sovereign, but that every man's natural rights shall be protected. So, sir, in reference to the proposition before us. I will not vote for it as an individual citizen, neither as a Delegate in this Convention, for I believe it to be radically wrong, and utterly inconsistent with, and opposed to, the principles of our government.

I have, sir, such an abiding faith in the truth, in the principles of justice and equity, that I am satisfied when we find out what these principles are we may safely commit ourselves to their guidance. I believe, sir, the prosperity of individuals and of nations to be inseparably, inevitably connected with, and resulting from, obedience to truth and the practice of justice. And, sir, when we have discerned what these command us to do, we have found what is true policy with reference to human affairs.

What is called policy, in contra-distinction to truth and justice, is always short-sighted; it does not look forward to remote consequences. Oftentimes, sir, what it prescribes as a remedy is of itself a fatal disease. But the things which are right in themselves conform to the laws of truth, of justice, of religion, which proclaim the laws of Deity. And if we even deny the existence of such a Being, the laws which we ascribe to Him are such as our reason receives as rules which a benevolent and omniscient Being might prescribe for the government of men. I say, therefore, admitting these to be general laws for the regulation of human conduct, perceived (or invented) by the wisdom of men, still they are our safest guides in those matters, the ultimate ends of which we are unable to discern, and their ways the safest paths to pursue. I say then, Mr. President, I have such an abiding faith in the truth that if I can know it, and find it, I will fearlessly commit myself to its guidance, however dark the cloud may appear which hides from my vision the future. I am satisfied that it will carry us forward in the right path, and bring us to the right end.

Let us be admonished by past events; this very evil which now besets us—for which we find no satisfactory remedy—originated in the violation of, and disregard of, the natural rights of man. If these rights had been held sacred these people would not now be here. If the great principle of our government had been obeyed then this evil had not befallen us now. Sir, can we be encouraged to regard another outrage against humanity and our land, as a wise measure—as a remedy for an evil. Sir, this same violation of human liberty has planted the seeds of dissension between us and our brethren of our own race and color; and even now we are threatening to engage with each other in deadly conflict, to butcher one another!

And, sir, I fear that in the heat of our anger towards each other, this helpless race—the involuntary cause of this strife—will be immolated as victims in the vain hope to remedy wrongs of which they are not the authors, but the chief sufferers. Injustice and inhumanity will lead to evil as certainly as that truth and justice will guide us to prosperity.

But waiving these considerations, let us look at this measure as a measure of human policy merely. Let us consider it calmly, and without prejudice. Let us trace out this proposition if we can, into actual practical operation.

I have said, sir, we are invested with the sovereignty of government, which should be exercised as if we were intelligent beings endowed with a sense of justice. We are not to exercise it rashly, and as if there were no responsibility resting on us as to the consequences. We are not to act arbitrarily and without reason; we are not even to destroy enemies without a justifying necessity. This sovereignty has been committed to us by an Almighty Being, in the ways of his providence to be exerted, wisely, justly, mercifully, for the good of those under our dominion.

Now, sir, let us see what it is we are proposing to do. Why, sir, to prohibit by a Constitutional declaration, or decree, any black man from entering into our territory hereafter, and driving those away who are now here.

And I would respectfully ask gentlemen how this can be done. If such a Constitutional provision is adopted and made effectual, must we not provide guards of soldiers on all the frontiers of the State, so that the blacks will absolutely be driven from our borders? If the blacks are driven by the Kentuckians across the Ohio river, will they, fleeing for their lives, stop to consider whether or not our laws prohibit their entering into the State? The law of necessity, of self-preservation will compel the man to flee from his pursuers. And if the fugitive be a free black will Kentucky or Illinois, or Ohio, receive him? No sir, we are told they will not. They will come here, and we cannot send them away, for there is no place to which he can be driven. We must then either butcher him, or imprison him as has been proposed; or recognize him as a human being, and extend to him such protection as justice or necessity may require.

Now, sir, some gentlemen in this discussion have remarked that those who have opposed this measure, have, without any reasonable or justifiable excuse, uttered hypocritical and canting lamentations, over the imaginary wrongs and hardships of the negro. Why, they say it is impossible that the two races can live together, one or the other must perish, must be destroyed. But they are humane, and will not cut off the negro by the sword; they will do him no wrong; they simply require him to leave our country, and go to his own, to his native land. What business hath he here? What a mockery is this? Let him go to his native land? How will he traverse the vast ocean which separates him from his country? How can he reach that far distant home without the means of transporting himself thither. Sir, when did we allow him to raise revenue to build ships; or to accumulate property to take himself there. Sir, we demand of him to leave our soil on pain of being sold into slavery. We declare it to be a crime that he will not go, and yet his going is to him an impossibility. Sir, hypocritical sympathy is better than such humanity as this.

Why, sir, the expatriation of the Irish by Cromwell, who took them by force and sent them away from their native country, was an act of mercy and kindness, in comparison with this proposed extradition of the African race. We want them to leave our territory without the slightest possible means of getting away. Is not this an impracticable idea? Can any gentleman, looking at the question practically, come to any other conclusion than that this proposition is an absurd and an impracticable one? I grant that we are entitled to defend ourselves, and even to destroy the blacks if necessary for that end. I grant that whenever it becomes necessary to defend ourselves against this people we have a right to take them away; we have a right to do as Cromwell did with the Irish. But until that occasion arrives, I maintain that by every law of justice and humanity, we are bound to treat them as men, to treat them with justice and kindness. I maintain this principle, not only as a matter of justice to the negro, but as a matter essential to the preservation of our own rights. If we admit that the sovereign power of the government, through the action of the majority, may be put in practise against the black man, and that he may be deprived of life, liberty, and property. Why may not a democratic or a whig majority, executing its peculiar prejudices, say that either of these parties that may be in the minority, shall not enjoy personal freedom, and that they shall not be protected in their inherent and inalienable rights. What is there to prevent such a result, if we strike out of our Constitution the great and essential principles of free government, by which liberty is secured?

And will gentlemen allow their prejudices against the poor down-trodden African to so mislead their judgment, and excite their angry passions that they will trample upon the institutions of our forefathers, and rend in twain the very citadel of liberty?

Mr President, I did not design making a speech upon this question, for I know that any thing said in opposition to our prejudices is listened to with impatience. I know that it is with difficulty that any one can be heard on this subject; I found this difficulty existing in the canvass before my constituents. But I appealed to their reason, and their judgment; I knew that their prejudices were excited, but that their justice and humanity would triumph over their prejudice. So, sir, I believe of all the people of the State. Politically I have always advocated and maintained the necessity of obedience to law, Constitutional or otherwise, although I think the governmental law ought to conform to what is called the higher law, and if possible, in harmony with it. Yet I believe it would defeat all the ends of government, if we were not to submit to the human, or governmental law. If we were allowed to resist law, under the pretence of a higher and more binding allegiance than that which we owe to the government, there could be no human government at all. But we have the inalienable right to show the makers of the law, if we can, that the law itself may be wrong. And, sir, being persuaded that the provision we are discussing is wrong in principle, and nugatory and impracticable, for the end proposed to be accomplished. I shall vote against it in every shape and form in which it may be presented to the Convention.

CORRECTION.

Mr. OWEN. If I am in order, sir, I will ask that a correction be made of a vote of mine, which I noticed a few minutes since, as given in this morning's Daily Journal. It is the vote on the motion to lay on the table an amendment moved last Wednesday, by the gentleman from Gibson (Mr. Hall). I voted, or at all events, I intended to vote, for the amendment, and against the motion to lay on the table.

The Clerk informed the Chair that the correction was already made, and that the name of Mr. Owen stood recorded in the negative.

Mr. WALLACE said that he desired also to make a correction of the vote he had given on the same proposition. He wished to show the position he occupied on the question by his vote; and he had understood that that position could be evidenced as well by voting to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Gibson on the table, as by giving a direct vote upon the original section itself. He did not know how the mistake had occurred, but he had been recorded as voting in the affirmative, and he desired to have his vote corrected and changed to the negative on the journal.

The correction was accordingly made.

Mr. RARIDEN. I desire, sir, to make a few remarks upon this section relating to negroes, and as it is now twelve o'clock, I will postpone them until the afternoon session, and move that the Convention now adjourn.

So, pending the question,

The Convention adjourned until two o'clock P. M.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention resumed its sitting.

Mr. LOCKHART rose and said, that with the permission of the gentleman from Wayne, who was entitled to the floor, he would offer the following amendment to the amendment:

"And that the committee also inquire into the expediency of striking out the entire section, as provided by the committee, and insert the following:

"The General Assembly shall pass laws with as little delay as possible, prohibiting negroes or mulattoes from coming into or settling in this State, and prohibiting all negroes and mulattoes who have come into this State since the 10th day of February, 1831, and who have not complied with the provisions of the General Assembly of this State entitled, 'An act concerning free negroes and mulattoes, servants and slaves,' approved February 10th, 1831, from purchasing real estate, or any interest therein, hereafter."

Mr. RARIDEN. I will, before proceeding to the remarks I have to offer, repeat to the Convention the proposition which is now under consideration, lest the Convention should have forgotten it. [Mr. R. here read the section under discussion.] He proceeded to say: Mr. President, I do not entertain the idea that there is much difference in the feelings of humanity which influence gentlemen in this House towards that poor, unfortunate, down-trodden race. I suppose it is the main object of gentlemen here, to act in a manner which will best contribute to the interest both of the white and the black race, keeping humanity always in view.

It seems to be a generally admitted fact, that the two races cannot live together upon terms of equality, and both prosper. Experience has demonstrated that they mutually act upon each other for the worst. I know of no neighborhood—and let me say here, that if I was a politician I would be speaking under more responsibility on this subject than perhaps any man in this House, for in my county the feeling on this subject is very strong—but, as I was saying, I have never known a neighborhood of colored persons that has not had a visible effect upon the white population in their immediate vicinity. They pull down the white population more than the white population raises them up. They mutually injure each other. From that fact, and from considerations of a similar character, I take it for granted that there is a settled conviction in the popular mind that the two races cannot get along together to the advantage of both; and so far as the attempt of the Convention may go to separate the two races, I am satisfied that no member of the Convention has any unkind feeling towards the colored race. I am sure that nothing but feelings of humanity can influence any gentleman in acting upon this great principle. We may be mistaken in our notions of humanity; but I am sure that no other feeling of the human heart can be concerned, or should be concerned, except that of keeping in view the true interests of the white race, as well as the true interests of the black race.

I am aware, Mr. President, that this crisis has been hastened upon the public mind by the delusions of a portion of the people, by cultivating those feelings and doctrines which they call abolitionism, to the exclusion of all others, assuming to monopolize all the benevolence and all the humanity towards the black race which pervades the whole country, denouncing every body in the most gross and bitter terms, who does not see the interests of the black race just in the same light in which it appears to them. This has done the colored race more injury than everything else besides, and thus we see that those ameliorations of their condition which were first proposed upon principle, have gone on until they have ended in fanaticism. These, sir, are my sentiments upon that subject—

A MEMBER. And they are about right.

Mr. RARIDEN. A gentleman near me says these sentiments are about right, and a response of that sort is by no means unwelcome. Well, sir, how are we to get along? Because in this matter I say there is a "higher law"—and I address myself to men of age and experience—I say there is a higher law in the community, in regard to the negro population, than the Constitutional law; a feeling of pride that elevates the white man above the black man. Let me mention one thing as an evidence of this, which undoubtedly has occurred in the neighborhood of every gentleman on this floor. There was a time when the colored man had a right to participate in the benefits of township schools. They were provided by the beneficent legislation of Congress for the children of the owners of the soil of the townships. Negroes were as capable of becoming owners of the soil as white men, and, to my knowledge, in many townships they did become owners of the soil, and had thereby all the rights to participate in the advantages of the school system, and to send their children to these schools as the white man; but could they do it? Certainly not; for the whites rose en-masse, and said, your children shall not go to school with our children, and they were consequently expelled. Thus, then, we see that in this respect, there is a higher law than the Constitutional law. The whites stand by each other. Now, some of the abolitionists tell us that this prejudice, or whatever else you may choose to call it, is not on account of color, but originates in the want of courage in the black man; and that there is a natural disposition in all men to insult each other.

I am inclined to think adversely with them on that point. The white man does not insult the white man for a very good reason—the white man wont let him. They sympathize with each other, but there is no such strong sympathy with the black man. That is an instance, then, in which you will perceive that there is a "higher law" which actuates the white man. I am not going to discuss whether it is right or wrong, because it is not in the power of this Convention, or any other deliberative body, by any laws they may pass, to do away with this feeling. Then, as long as there is an equality, as long as there exists that marked distinction between the two races, the one will be degraded in his own estimation, and in the estimation of every body else. You must make them perfectly equal; and that, I say, it is not within the power of this Convention to do; nor is it in the power of any legislative body that ever did or ever will assemble. Thus, then, we have an instance of the recognition and of the authority and the power of a "higher law."

Now, what are we to do? I can tell you what is my opinion, and that is predicated upon what would be best for the benefit of the black race. I agree with the gentleman from Decatur, (Mr. Robinson,) and with the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Clark,) so far as feelings of humanity are concerned; but I say, that, whatever we shall attempt to do, it will be to carry out that theory which they have been advocating, namely: the mutual benefit of both races. I go with no party of men whose object may be to act with feelings of bitterness towards the black race. But I feel a little for the white race, too; because my sympathies have been a thousand times roused up for that race. Then what shall we do? We cannot live with them; that is clear.

There is another consideration, and that consideration goes to the principle of slavery itself. I freely admit here that I am hostile to negro slavery, and that I regard it as a great curse to our country. I believe now, and I fear that it will ever be so hereafter, that negro slavery has done the white race much more harm than it will ever do the black race. For this very thing of negro slavery has a tendency to degrade the white man; for I hold, that, whatever provides for the means of indolence and luxury, has a tendency to effeminate the white man, and consequently to do him harm. Negro slavery does this; and, therefore, negro slavery does harm to the white man.

A MEMBER. That is good logic.

Mr. RARIDEN. Now, in regard to this matter, I would almost go beyond my own convictions of right, and even of humanity, because the circumstances in which the surrounding States are placed have almost forced me into this position. Here is the State of Kentucky, and, indeed, all the slave States in our vicinity, expelling from their borders all the black population that are free. Illinois refuses to receive them; Ohio will undoubtedly do the same; and the whole mass of them, unless we make some stringent provision on the subject, will be driven here, and our State will be inundated with them. Broken-down negroes, and even the young negro population who are free, will be hurried into Indiana; and if we leave the question open, we must receive them on the score of humanity.

Now look at the matter in another point of view—and it is a very important one—one that well deserves the consideration of gentlemen who have so much to say in favor of the negro on the score of humanity, and who are strong in their abolition notions. Let me ask, then, what effect has all this on slavery itself? Do not gentlemen see, that, if the slaveholder can in this way rid himself of his broken-down negroes, and of the troublesome free colored population, that you give value, and interest, and energy to the institution of slavery? Do you not increase the value of the healthy slave to his owner? To leave the question open, and to give him a chance of sending off the worthless negroes, gives additional value to the slaves which are left behind; and thus, while you are seeking to ameliorate the condition of the slave, you are only riveting his chains tenfold faster. It is giving the slave owner an advantage which, no other course of policy could possibly give to him. It is, in fact, almost doubling the value of the slave who can work, because he is getting rid of the expense of maintaining those that yield him no profit. [Cries of "Hear! hear!" and "That's true."]

Well, what other considerations are there? I leave all this fulsome talk about the Anglo-Saxon race and its institutions; and whether I would agree with a government that recognized the right to hold these people in slavery or not, I will not now discuss. I do not believe, however, that many men who denounce slavery now, would have acted much differently if they had had a share in the making of the Constitution of the United States.

When I have heard these outpourings upon the members of this Convention who support this Constitution of the United States, and the bitter denunciations of that instrument itself, I cannot but ask those gentlemen: "What would you have done, if you had been there?" and "what a pity it is for the cause of humanity that you were not there." I am not certain, however, that they would have bettered it much if they had been there.

I am, then, opposed to the immigration of negroes into this State, because it would greatly tend to the interest of the slave owner and tend to rivet still faster the chains which bind the negro; and I am still further opposed to their coming here, because their presence will inevitably create disquiet amongst us. Let gentlemen look around and see what is being done. Let them look even at my own county, and witness the meetings which are there being held, and the treasonable speeches and resolutions which are being made and passed—more treasonable, perhaps, than were ever made and passed with impunity in any country—denouncing the action of Congress in what they call this "nigger catching law." I say nothing about it, right or wrong; but I ask if it is good policy to encourage a population to come into our State which creates such a state of feeling, and which divides and unsettles public sentiment in such a manner? Is it good policy, I ask, to encourage a population whose existence amongst us causes such dissention? I do not know whether it would be inhuman or not; but if this state of feeling is to be the result—if we are to be divided, one against another, and our brightest prospects of the future blasted by the introduction amongst us of these beings—I would say—and I say it in all sincerity, and without any hard feelings towards them—that it would be better to kill them off at once, if there is no other way to get rid of them. We have not come to that point yet with the blacks, but we know how the Puritans did with the Indians, who were infinitely more magnanimous and less impudent than this colored race. Are we, then, to encourage a population which has produced and will continue to produce this state of feeling amongst us? Supposing men to be honest in their sympathies; supposing it be true that they have cultivated this one idea—this one feeling of "humanity"—until it has become, as it were, a disease of the mind, and that they can see nothing else, and hear nothing else, and feel nothing else, and talk of nothing else, and even dream of nothing else, but the oppression and cruelty perpetrated upon this poor, down-trodden, black race. Supposing all this to be perfectly honest, are we to give way to this monomania, to our own ruin and ultimate degradation? I hope not. I know that there are a great many men who make their living by that sort of thing—who go round the country exciting people's sympathies, and telling how much they have suffered for the cause of humanity. They know well the impressibility of the human heart, and the tender spots in human character; and they tell their stories about being ducked in a pond, and tarred and feathered, and "rode upon a rail," [laughter] and all that kind of thing, by which they make the people open both their hearts and their purses. Still, all this could not induce me to act with inhumanity towards the black race. On the contrary, my object is to act towards them with all humanity; and I shall be prepared, on all occasions, to show to these men who profess to monopolize all the humanity of the country, that my views will result in more humanity to the black race than theirs. Why, sir, if they have the feelings of men at all, I say it is inhuman to keep them in the continued presence of their superiors. It is inhuman to keep continually before their eyes their degraded condition. No spirit can ever rise up and be respectable and respected under such circumstances. Now, sir, what are we to do with them? Why, the population that come here from the slave States I would roll back again, every one of them—free and slave—until the masters themselves would get so tired of them that they would run away from them themselves. Sir, I have no hesitation in saying, that, if there had been no new territory acquired since the original thirteen States formed a confederacy, the master would long ago have run away from the slave. That is the only process to which I look for our own protection. Send them all back. Increase the number to be supported by the master, and thus diminish his profits upon their labor. This will do more towards the ultimate abolition of slavery than, perhaps, anything else; for no man would be troubled with slaves unless they can be made profitable.

What are we to do then? I think that we should not act rightly were we to leave this entirely as a subject of future legislation—conferring, merely, by an organic law, all the necessary powers upon the General Assembly to act in the premises. In my section of country, it is true, these poor blacks live a hard and exposed life. They have a thousand hardships to endure, of which the white man knows nothing. Many of them have run away from their masters, and are in constant dread of being apprehended and taken back to slavery. It is impossible, sir, for men to live long under such a state of feeling, and hence we find that, in proportion to their numbers, they die three times as fast as white men. If, then, you arrest the tide of immigration, I do not know that any inconvenience would be experienced by permitting those of them who are now amongst us, to end their days here. Then, as to the few of them who have acquired property,—why, there is not one in a hundred of them that has got property. They are all as poor as Lazarus, and I think we might safely leave the question of property to the future action of the Legislature, and to popular sentiment; and that, I think, would work out the thing in the right way, and without great inhumanity to the black race. But, I would cut off their immigration now; I would not suffer one to be added to the number of those who are already amongst us. I know that, make what laws you will, there are still fanatics who will encourage them to come. They are constantly representing to the negro the danger of going to Liberia—constantly working up his feelings, so as to make him hostile to the white race. Yes, sir, there are fanatics who make it a matter of boast that they can thwart the laws of the whites, and provide means for the immigration of this population. No matter how stringent you make penal enactments, they will still endeavor to bring them into the State, and then they will look you in the face and say, "It is too bad to punish these poor creatures, merely because they are seeking their liberty;" and they calculate upon that as a powerful lever by which to act upon the popular mind.

I will tell you what I would do in such case. If they persisted in coming and remaining amongst us, I would give to the Legislature the power to prescribe by law, that they should be sold or apprenticed, till the amount of their wages should be sufficient to send them to Liberia. That would put a stop to these agitations. Whenever the arm of the law would sanction such a course, this kind of benevolence would soon go down. It would soon wear out, whenever it should be brought to bear upon the pockets of the agitators. I have seen men of this class, who would get more applause in one night, for a bitter denunciatory speech against the "dough-faces," than a decent man would get for everything he might say in all his life; and is not this good pay and pay enough, if it were all these men would ever get? But it would not be right, perhaps, to cherish any feeling of envy against these men.

I am opposed to negro immigration, because it weakens our strength, by dividing us amongst ourselves, where nothing but kindness and benevolence should exist. It divides communities which otherwise would be united and happy—and upon what account? Because one man has more kind feeling toward the blacks than another—because one man thinks his neighbor more tardy in his efforts to deliver the blacks from slavery, and to infold them in the arms of his benevolence.

Allow me to say, sir, that, although I have had a high degree of respect for the benevolence of this feeling,—and these men, in the beginning, I have not much confidence in them now, since their benevolence has become a business. I do not say this in the way of ridicule at all, but I want to show the world how I regard these men; amongst whom I am obliged to class the individual who represents my district in the Congress of the United States. Not long ago, he was published in the city of Boston as solemnly asseverating, in the name of God, and in the presence of angels, (of course,) that he would take delight in tramping that infamous law, (the fugitive slave bill,) under his feet. His speech might have been very good rhetoric, but was it right? I ask this question of all his benevolent and kind-hearted friends and neighbors. What was the necessity that brought forth that law? I am not going to discuss the subject; I am going to leave the question to the decision of common sense and common honesty. For myself, I go so far as to say that I know of nothing which that law requires, so far as masters are concerned, which it was not our duty to yield to them before it was passed. The masters had the consent of the Convention which formed the Federal Government, that they should hold their slaves—that they might recognize them as property; and, if their slaves escaped from service, and come into the free States, it was agreed that the masters should have the right to pursue them, and take them back. This was one of the considerations in that national compact, which has contributed to make us a happy and united people, and which enabled us to triumph in the grandest struggle for independence which the world ever saw.

But, as to this matter, it is in opposition to a higher law; it is contrary to the law of God, to admit the negro race amongst us. I am opposed to such a thing, because it is against the dictates of humanity. I am opposed to it, because it is the product of a fanaticism with which I have no sympathy, and which I can never speak of in any terms of respect. However I may commiserate the condition of the blacks, or however well I may think of the elementary principles which have been wrested and forced into the support of this fanaticism; yet, when I see those men put on the harness, and go into the fight against all men, who do not happen to entertain the same feelings and views with themselves—

The PRESIDENT. The Chair is obliged to remind the gentleman that his half-hour is out. [Cries of "go on," "go on,"]

Mr. RARIDEN. Well, sir, I move to strike out the last clause of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT. The question is upon the adoption of instructions.

Mr. RARIDEN. Then I move to amend the instructions.

A VOICE. Does the half-hour rule take effect to-day?

The PRESIDENT. So the Chair is informed by the Secretary.

A DELEGATE (to Mr. Rariden). And you are the first martyr. [A laugh.]

Several VOICES. Go on, go on.

Mr. BORDEN. I would inquire of the Chair, whether the rule may not be suspended?

The PRESIDENT read the rule.

Mr. RARIDEN. I will move this amendment—

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman's time is out, and he must stop, unless the Convention will change the rule. The question is on the amendment to the instructions proposed by the gentleman from Vanderburgh.

Mr. HOWE. If the Convention will permit me, I will proceed. I have already spoken once upon this question, and I do not know but that it is trespassing upon the patience of the House to offer to speak again. [Cries of "go on."] It is my design, in what I have to say, to confine myself to what I regard as a Constitutional barrier against the validity of this section.

The debate, sir, has assumed a very wide range, since this question has been agitated here, and the discussion seems to me, really, to have very little to do with the merits of the question.

Although I coincide cheerfully, in many respects, with the opinions of the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Rariden,) yet I must say that the question whether the abolitionists, with reference to their political course, are actuated by good or bad motives, or whether their opinions and sentiments have had a good or bad effect, can have but very little weight upon my mind; and, as I think, also, these questions can have but a very remote relation to the merits of the question now before us.

And I confess myself surprised at the statements of some other gentlemen, getting so far aside from the Constitutional and legal merits of the question.

The gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) in the course of a short speech which he made the other day, alluded to an analogy which strikes me with very little force. He affirmed that where one race of people came in conflict with another, as it is impossible for them to remain together upon terms of equality, the stronger will always oppress and overcome, and eventually exterminate, the weaker, and that this principle is right and according to the law of God. What the laws of God are, in this matter, cannot be known, nor is it material that we should know. It behooves us to do right and live conscientiously toward God and toward men; and this is especially incumbent upon us, who understand the force of moral obligations. The gentleman's allusion, unfortunately, has no analogy to the question before the Convention. He alluded to the overthrow of the ancient Canaanites. All that can be made out of this fact is, that this conquest was brought about by the command of God for a particular and special purpose. There is, however, an analogy in some sort, which is to be found in the history of modern times, and which the gentleman did not refer to. I allude to the condition of the unfortunate Irish people in the times of Cromwell. It has been said that if the Protector had lived, the Irish would have been exterminated, and the Anglo-Saxon race transplanted upon their Island. This was a leading policy with the Protector; and that furnishes a slight parallel to the case now before us; but there is no other instance, in ancient or modern times, which can furnish such a parallel.

The gentleman from Monroe, on my right, (Mr. Foster,) is entitled, I think, to some credit for his firmness and boldness in proposing that we should adopt a measure which is the very next thing to the adoption of slavery itself. It is, that if the blacks immigrate to this State, contrary to law, they should be sold to the highest bidder—something like the act of 1831. I consider the gentleman entitled to much credit for his boldness and independence. For his proposition is, to make a decree at once, and not command our servants of the Legislature to carry it out for us. If we are to do this thing, why not perfect it ourselves—perfect it here?

Other gentlemen seem to think that Constitutions are to embody whatever suits the will of the majority; but if my reflections have been of any service to me, a Constitution is made for the benefit of the minority—to protect the rights of the minority against the aggressions and the power of a triumphant majority. Of what use and validity is a Constitution unless the object be to protect the weak? The object of a Constitution should be to guarantee important rights; but a Constitution, it seems, is to be supreme over everything except the passions and head-strong will of a majority. I, sir, have never imbibed that sentiment, and so long as I continue to be friendly to republican government, I never shall.

I proceed now to the discussion of the legal and constitutional questions involved in this case, and I will say, sir, in advance, that I do not deny the power of any State to pass any constitutional law for her own preservation. I shall not dispute the power of the State to pass laws against the immigration or importation of paupers from adjoining States, no matter to what nation they may belong. A discussion of these questions is not necessary to the present issue. I know that a good cause may be ruined or materially injured by a bad argument. And if any argument of mine should be of this class, I hope that there will be found candor enough here to separate the good from the bad. The gentleman from Monroe and Brown (Mr. Read) has very ably discussed the other side of the question, and has urged every available ground.

I shall proceed in answer, to lay down certain fundamental principles, which I think cannot be set aside by any ingenuity or specious argumentation.

I lay down these propositions: there are two distinct rights of domicile—social and political. And there are two kinds of political domicile—the first is that possessed by the citizen of a State, with all the rights and privileges of a citizen of the United States: and under this head. Second, that of a citizen of a State with qualified rights as a citizen of the United States—in other words, a citizen sub modo. Third, the Constitution of the United States, declaring that the citizens of each State shall have all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States—refers to social and not political rights. Fourth, this section ought to receive, not a strict, but a liberal construction. Fifth, the right of political domicile includes the right of social domicile. Sixth, negroes and mulattoes may acquire political and social rights of domicile in the States of New York and Massachusetts; and may therefore become citizens of those States; and under the Constitution of the United States, cannot be debarred of the privilege of entering into any other State of the Union, or of the right of acquiring and holding property there. Seventh, the naturalization laws of the United States confer the right of political domicile as citizens of the United States, and the political capacity, of acquiring a domicile in any of the States for all purposes. Eighth, every citizen of a State is so far a citizen of the United States as to owe it allegiance, and is entitled to its protection, and in this sense every citizen of a State is a citizen of the United States.

These are the fundamental principles which I lay down, and which, I think, cannot be moved either by argument or authority. I do not rely upon any peculiar powers of my own to support these principles, but I rely simply upon the force of truth and conclusions which must be recognized and admitted by all.

And, first: there are two kinds of domicile; social and political. I believe this admits of no dispute. The civilians refer to only one kind of domicile in the time of the Roman Empire, when the Civil Law attained its perfection, because all were citizens, without political rights, having merely rights of domicile. This principle was: that after a man has acquired one domicile, he retains it until he has acquired another. But under our Constitutions there are political as well as social rights, and there are social rights without political rights. As a matter of course then, there must be two kinds of domicile, for example: a man who immigrates to this State, and has not been here one year, has a social domicile. When he first enters the State, as a citizen of another State or the United States, the State is bound to protect him in his person, and in his right to acquire and hold property, and the State must deal with the citizens of other States as with her own. That is the nature of social domicile. But when the individual has resided in the State a year, he acquires a political domicile; and the political right of domicile always includes the social right of domicile; although the social right may exist without the political right.

I remark, upon the next proposition, that there are two kinds of citizenship; there is a citizen of a State with all the rights and privileges of a citizen of the United States: and then secondly, under this head, there is the right of a citizen of a State with qualified rights as a citizen of the United States. This, I think, can be demonstrated with very little difficulty; and first, of the right of domicile as a citizen of the United States. In proof of this proposition, I refer first to the Constitution of the United States:

This Constitution evidently refers to two classes of citizens.

1. Citizens of the United States.
2. Citizens of each State.

Article 2, section 1 requires the President to be a citizen of the United States, or native born.

Article 1 Section 3 requires every Senator to have been a citizen of the United States nine years.

Article 4, Section 2 uses the term "citizens of each State." These expressions, "citizens of the United States," and "citizens of each State," are certainly not convertible terms, otherwise in such an instrument but one of them would have been used. Each term was used in a different sense from the other, as I will endeavor to show.

SEC. 2 ART. 4 uses the term citizens of each State, and why? The Constitution of the United States, is an instrument of government, an irrevocable delegation of power and a solemn league between the original States, binding on those States, which have subsequently entered it, like the Achaean or any other league.

The original States had, at the adoption of this league, and ever since have had, the exclusive right of declaring who might be citizens within their own boundaries, with only one exception—the right of naturalizing aliens—which was conferred on the General Government.

The States contracted this league, as sovereigns, and for the benefit of their respective citizens, without regard to, and without the consideration of, their rights and duties, which might accrue, by the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, and manifestly with full knowledge, that each State with the above exception, possessed and would continue to exercise the exclusive right of declaring who might become its own citizens. It is no answer to say, that the members of the Convention could not have contemplated the contingency of making negroes citizens of a State. The flat answer is that they knew, that the States all and singly retained the power of doing so, whether they should exercise it or not. There are then two kinds of citizenships in the United States, that of citizen of the United States and that of citizen of a State. Let me endeavor further to show their peculiar characteristics.

A citizen of a State in a political sense has the right of voting for all the officers of that State. As for instance, look at the practice existing in the States of New York and Massachusetts, on the subject, as to negroes and mulattoes. But they have not the political capacity of becoming citizens of the United States, in a full and complete sense, or citizens of every other State. To be sure, to a qualified extent and in a social capacity, they may become citizens of every other State, but no further. It is manifest then, that there is and must be a distinction between these species of citizenships, and that is evident not only from the nature and propriety of the difference but from the fact that two kinds of citizenship are, as I have already stated, referred to in the Constitution of the United States.

I now pass, sir, to the consideration of my third proposition in reference to the section declaring that citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States, which is that this section is entitled to a liberal and not a strict construction. My proposition, I would say, has reference to the rights of social domicile, and not to political character or privileges. I will refer to some authorities.

I quote from Sergeant's Constitutional law, page 293, where it is said, that Judges Chase and Duval, in a case decided in Maryland in 1797, held that this section meant, that the citizens of all the States should have the peculiar advantage of acquiring and holding real as well as personal property in each State, and that such property should be protected and secured in like manner with the property of citizens of the State where it is located, and that it secures and protects personal rights. Judge Chase was a very able man, and this opinion is entitled to the greater weight from being delivered so soon after the adoption of the Constitution. Mr. Justice Story—Constitutional law p. 674, § 1800—says, "it is obvious that if the citizens of each State were to be deemed aliens to each other, they could not take or hold real estate, or other privileges except as other aliens. The intention of this clause was to confer on them, if one may so say, a general citizenship; and to communicate all the privileges and immunities which the citizens of the State would be entitled to under like circumstances."

He refers to the cases of Crawford vs. Corryell, 4th Wash. Cir. R. 371, and Livingston vs. Van Ingen, 9 John R. 507.

This section then cannot refer to political rights. It manifestly does not mean that a citizen of one State may exercise political rights—vote for instance—in every other State. But within its scope it is entitled to a liberal construction, because it is a covenant designed for the protection of all social rights—all the great objects for which human society is desirable—and is in opposition to the exercise of tyranny and arbitrary power. The States contracted as equals, and the construction must be as favorable for one as the other, and liberal for all. Moreover, by the principles of every system of judicature founded on natural equity, the construction of every grant is most strong against him who grants, and how much rather then, when the grant embraces social rights to the constituent parts of members of the same confederacy, and is favorable to civilization and humanity.

This is one of the "leges legum," to which the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) referred the other day, in an argument upon another question with so much force.

The States have no right to put their own construction on this clause.

All the writers on public law sustain this position.

The first general maxim of interpretation is, that it is not permitted to interpret what has no need of interpretation. When an act is conceived in clear and precise terms, when the sense is manifest, and leads to nothing absurd, there can be no reason to refuse the sense which a treaty naturally presents. To go elsewhere in search of conjectures in order to restrain or extinguish it, is to endeavor to elude it. If this dangerous method be once admitted, there will be no act which it will not render useless. Let the brightest light shine on all the parts of the piece, let it be expressed in terms the most clear and determinate; all this will be of no use, if it be allowed to search for foreign reasons in order to maintain what can not be found in the sense it naturally presents. The cavilers who dispute the sense of a clear and determinate article, are accustomed to draw their vain subterfuges from the pretended intention and views of the author of the article Vattel, § 263, p. 303-9. Grotius de jure belli ac pacis vol. 2, chapter 16.

Is it necessary, Vattel asks, in an enlightened age, to say that mental reservations cannot be admitted in treaties? Every interpretation, he says, that leads to an absurdity ought to be rejected.

All the things, he states too, which, without too much burthening any one person in particular, are useful and salutary to human society, ought to be reckoned among the favorable things.

The States which have come into the Union since the adoption of the Constitution, have come into the league upon the same footing as did the original thirteen States; and they adopt all the articles of the league.

Mr. READ of Monroe. I would inquire of the gentleman whether there is not an exception where the State is the grantor?

Mr. HOWE. I suppose that the gentleman from Monroe has referenceto the case of the king at common law, and I know that in his case the construction was always in favor of the king who had his chancellors, by whom—except occasionally by the king himself—patents under the great seal issued, and as a necessary principle or very convenient maxim of State, these were always construed most liberally for the king. This league is precisely upon the same footing as a league or covenant between individuals, because the parties are all equals. Here are parties who contract mutually with each other upon certain fixed principles of natural equity, and they are bound by them. I might cite other authorities, but I have not time now to present them. I would merely remark further in this connection that there is the authority of Rawle on Const. ch. 9, p. 87 to 100, in which he holds that a citizen of a State is ipso facto, a citizen of the United States; this has nothing to do with the merits of the controversy, but if it has, it strengthens my position. I take the position, sir, that a “citizen of a State” and a “citizen of the United States” are to some extent, but not altogether, convertible terms. If gentlemen think proper to contend that a negro, if he could become in the sense of the Constitution of the United States, a citizen of New York, must thereby become a citizen of the United States with full rights, I have no objection, although the fact is he is only such under disabilities; but every negro, native born and free, is in a still more general sense a citizen of the United States; but I will refer to this again hereafter.

There is another proposition in regard to the political domicil in a State—that it includes the social domicil. This proposition, however, I will not consider, as its truth necessarily follows from what has been said.

I pass now to the sixth proposition, that negroes and mulattoes who acquire a political and social domicil in New York and Massachusetts have the right as individuals, to pass our boundaries and purchase, and hold real estate, and cannot be debarred from coming into, or going out of the State. The point cannot be disputed, that the States of New York and Massachusetts, may admit negroes, and mulattoes, and Indians if they please, to the rights of citizenship and so far as the gift of this right is concerned, they are to all intents independent and sovereign. In this principle there is established the right of saying who of their native-born citizens, and under what restrictions, shall be entitled to all political rights.

The negro and mulatto are entitled to those rights in these States, and consequently may acquire real estate and a social domicil there, as all citizens may here. It follows then sir, that the negro who has secured a political domicil in New York and Massachusetts has the right to come into this State and acquire, and enjoy property in it.

The gentleman from Monroe and Brown, brought forward as an authority the case of an information against Prudence Crandall, a colored woman, for teaching black children in Connecticut, where it was held by Chief Justice Dagget, that negroes are not citizens within the meaning of this clause in the Constitution of the U. States. But what of this? This decision—if it has any application—simply means that a negro is not presumptively a citizen, that is a citizen of another State with political rights, and as a free negro is in general not entitled to political privileges. I shall not discuss the merits of the decision, because it has no important bearing on the merits of my propositions. Chancellor Kent, with better reason takes different ground, and sums up the discussion of this clause with the opinion, that a negro who has been manumitted, or discharged, or born free, is a citizen, that is a citizen of the United States, under disabilities. He evidently refers to negroes, who are free, but have not acquired any political rights. William Jay, Esq., in a treatise on the character of the American colonization and anti-slavery societies maintains substantially the same doctrine.

This is undoubtedly the weight of authority and reason. But I have only proposed to prove that a citizen of any State, whether black, white, or indian, who enjoys the political as well as social rights appertaining to that character, is entitled to the social rights of a citizen in any other State—the enjoyment of liberty, the acquisition of and complete dominion over property, subject only to the inherent and eminent right of the State.

I have seen proper to undertake to show the truth of this proposition only, because it is directly sustained by many authorities, and so far as I know is contradicted by none, and is moreover fortified by many sound reasons. Definitions of words, although entitled to no great consideration in political questions, have some weight in the scale. Webster in his folio dictionary says that the term "citizen" means "in the United States, a person, native or naturalized, who has the privilege of exercising the elective franchise, or the qualifications, which enable him to vote for rulers, and to purchase and hold real estate." Richardson's definition is broader than this, but is not applicable here, as he applies the term only to its original import—an inhabitant or citizen of a city.

Webster's definition—assuming as before that the exercise of any political right is requisite to the character of a citizen in this country—is correct, as can be readily shown. No other elements than those he states are requisite, for if otherwise, a naturalized foreigner could not be a citizen. If, for instance, to make a citizen it were requisite that he should have the political capacity to hold all offices, the foreigner could not become a citizen, because he can never be a President of the United States. A foreigner then is a citizen of the United States under political disabilities. There is no other element in the political character of a citizen, and therefore Webster's definition is correct. The negro then in New York or Massachusetts who has acquired property and is in possession of all the rights included in the above definition, is a citizen of one of those States, unless we deny to those States the power of conferring upon him that character. He is then to all intents a citizen. Is he such in the meaning of the clause in the Constitution of the United States already referred to? Two, and only two, reasons can be urged to sustain a negative answer:

1. That all free blacks and mulattoes were intended to be excluded.

2. That the term "citizen of a State" means, or rather necessarily includes "citizens of the United States."

No evidence or sound argument can be adduced to sustain the first of these propositions. It amounts to nothing to urge that negroes and indians are distinct races, and not as classes or races looked upon as citizens; for granting this proposition, a State may still admit individuals of the race, or those portions of it within its own borders, to the rights of citizenship, and this manifest right must have been known to the Convention which framed the Constitution of the United States, although negroes, as a class, might be beyond the pale of citizenship.

The second proposition can have no force unless it be also conceded—assuming the proposition as true—that a negro can not be a citizen of the United States. Every person in this country must be either alien, citizen, or slave. Every citizen of a State who has a right to vote for officers of the General Government, owes it allegiance, and is therefore entitled to its protection, and this right and duty are correlative. If these elements do not, in a general sense, constitute citizenship of the United States, pray what do?

A free negro in New York then, who is a voter there, is a citizen of the United States, in a general sense; but whether he be so or not, is not a material question. In a general sense all persons not slaves, born within our territory, are citizens of a State, and of the United States. I have only undertaken, however, to establish that a citizen of New York, or Massachusetts, black or white, invested with full political rights in one of those States, is entitled to all the privileges and immunities of our own citizens within our own boundaries.

I have thus endeavored to show that there are two kinds of domicile—social, and political; that there are two kinds of political domicile:

1st. That of citizens of the United States in the highest sense.

2d. That of citizens of a State.

3d. That the section referred to in the Constitution of the United States refers to social rights only.

4th. That this section is entitled to a liberal construction; and lastly, that a negro or mulatto, who has acquired a political domicile in New York or Massachusetts, may of right pass our boundaries, and purchase and hold property among us. It was a fixed rule with the civililians, and may be considered as incorporated into our law, that a man who has acquired one domicile retains it until he has acquired a new one. How, then without violating a solemn league, to which she is a party can this State meet a citizen of New York or Massachusetts, at her boundaries, declare his stepping over them a crime, confiscate his property, and incarcerate, or otherwise punish him for the exercise of a guaranteed right.

Suppose the citizen of Massachusetts to have acquired a tract of land within your boundaries, by what process will you obtain a lawful seizin and title to it? But it is argued that the State may keep out paupers and all classes of dangerous and disorderly persons. The use of so bad an argument betrays the infirmity of the cause. Granting, for argument's sake, that you may exclude paupers and any disorderly or dangerous persons, who would endanger the public tranquility, you have no right to exclude the individuals of a whole class, merely because they belong to a class. This principle, if carried to its legitimate consequences, would enable you to exclude all the citizens of a particular State, and thus to set at defiance all law and right. Oppression and tyranny, move with regular steps. The most important element in the consideration of this question is that which regards our own liberties, and that of our posterity. A sacred regard to Constitutional rights in the smallest particular, is the only safeguard against the assaults of faction and revolutionary violence. He who violates the rights of others, violates his own. I have been somewhat desultory, perhaps confused, in my arguments, owing to a want of time, and perhaps a confusion of ideas; but I believe the very nature of the case before us is such that any man in arguing it even adversely to me, must bring forward authorities and admit facts, which will palpably condemn him. In other words it is impossible to argue against so clear a truth in such a manner as not to be involved in contradictions and absurdities.

Let it be remembered that all I have undertaken to show is, that a free negro of Massachusetts or New York, who is in a political as well as social sense, a citizen of one of those States, is entitled, within our boundaries, to those very privileges which, by this section, we deny. This proposition is susceptible of almost mathematical demonstration, whether I have succeeded in proving it or not. I leave to others to sustain the proposition, the truth of which ought to be clear to every rational and unprejudiced mind, that the term "citizens of each State" means as well those who have not political franchises as those who have, and includes all who have a social domicile within its boundaries, owe it allegiance, and are entitled to its protection.

In some States a property qualification is requisite to the enjoyment of the elective franchise.

Can you exclude from the benefits of this league the man who had not the requisite qualifications as a voter in Virginia or South Carolina? Can you exclude women and young men under twenty-one years of age? Thus absurdity follows absurdity, and tyranny and injustice follow close after, from the propositions of gentlemen of the majority. They are demonstrating the truth of John Randolph's remark, that "no Constitution ever accomplished the object of its founders." They are aiding, unconsciously, to bring about the truth of that awful prophecy made more than sixty years ago by our enemies, that slavery would ultimately dismember our country and prostrate our liberties. They are fulfilling the unhappy truth, that written Constitutions are only made to be violated, and in the hands of a triumphant majority are but as the flaxen cord in the hands of a giant.

We ourselves have assembled in Convention without regard to the provisions of that Constitution which gave birth to the State, under, as I believe, a mistaken idea of right, the just inference from that heresy broached some years since, that a majority, without regard to Constitutions, can alter them at pleasure. The next legitimate step is to dispense with Constitutions, and to issue edicts and send forth codes fresh from conventions of the people.

Parties in this country now occupy false positions. There are really but two parties; the radical and the conservative. Now is the time for every true friend of liberty to take the conservative side. It is a certain truth, that the same spirit which would prompt the friends of liberty in Russia, to aid every measure which would bring about liberal principles, or constitutional government in a despotism, will induce them, in a democracy, to stand in the way of despotic majorities, and the tyranny of unbridled popular license. But no more of this.

Have gentlemen, indeed, reflected on the manifest impropriety of placing such a section in our Constitution, aside from all other considerations? If such a measure is demanded by the people, and it is to be brought about in defiance of all other considerations, leave it for the General Assembly, and, if it pass there, it can be quietly repealed, after the popular blast shall have blown by; but, if you place it in your Constitution, there it will remain long after the supposed exigency which called it forth, shall have passed away—a monument of infamy more durable than brass to the character of the State?

But, by what rule will you determine the character of a part of the persons who come within the provisions of the clause? It is a vexed question in some States, and in others it is only ascertained by judicial decision or positive law, what degree of taint, by negro blood, shall make a mulatto. But you have left this matter undetermined. Complete your decree, and leave none of its details unfinished.

But the whole subject is surrounded with difficulties. The measure is certainly tyrannical—probably impracticable; and if the latter, you will reap all the fruits of tyranny, which will be your only reward.

MR. OWEN. I would inquire of the Chair whether the resolution adopted on Saturday, restricting members to half an hour in debate, is not a simple resolution of the Convention, which may be rescinded at any time by a vote of the majority?

THE PRESIDENT. If the gentleman from Posey wishes the rule rescinded, he can give one day's previous notice of a motion to that effect.

MR. READ of Monroe. As the gentleman from Lagrange is in the midst of a legal argument, as able as it is interesting, might not the rule be suspended in order to allow him to finish?

Objection being made, the motion was not pressed.

MR. FARROW then rose and addressed the Convention, but his first remarks were in so low a tone as to be inaudible at the reporter's desk. When heard, he was understood to speak as follows:

I have hitherto, Mr. President, been a silent member of this body, and I have no desire to make any lengthened remarks at this time, but will offer a few thoughts, and trust that the reporter will write out a good speech for me.

[The reports of the debates of this Convention are published literally as they are taken down from the lips of the speaker, with but slight verbal alterations. The sentiments are never, and the words very rarely, changed. No speeches are ever "written out" by the reporters, except from the words of the speaker as used on the floor.—REPORTER.]

I understand the gentleman who preceded me to ask, whether it will be policy, or the best policy, for the people of Indiana to suffer the further immigration of free people of color into the State? Connected with this there is a proposition not to interfere with the rights and privileges of the blacks now in the State.

It does seem to me, Mr. President, that those who are willing to allow the immigration of the negroes of other States within our borders, take upon themselves a greater sympathy for a population out of the State, a class that has not yet arrived within our borders, than is called for. They appear to be disposed to invite them to come over, rather than otherwise. I confess, sir, that I can see no good reason for the exercise of so much sympathy over a population over which we have no control. I do not, for my part, desire to hold this language to the negroes of other States; I do not desire to say to them, "we have a sympathy for you that is so strong that when you fail to receive the sympathies of your masters, when you fail to receive kindness, support, and protection from those who have had your labor, come to us, come to Indiana, and place yourselves under our control and protection." I can see no necessity or good reason for extending our sympathies so far in this direction.

Many of the people of this State immigrated here from the slave States, and have friends there who would like also to remove to this State and live by us. They say to us, we like the soil and climate of your State, and we should like to come and live by you; now, if you will allow us to bring our property in negroes with us, if you will permit us to bring our slaves with us to cut down the forests and improve the tracts of wild land we should be disposed to buy, we will gladly come, and we cannot come without this privilege. But, sir, we say to our friends: no, you cannot come and bring your slaves with you. We have sympathy for the negroes of your State, for whom we will make provision, and will protect in certain rights and privileges, but cannot extend that sympathy to you. Now I cannot account for this. I think that humanity, of which so much has been said, requires of us that we should protect ourselves; that we should take care of ourselves first, and that we should have an eye directed to a class of population already among us, who demand our sympathies far more than those who are beyond the State.

Sir, I pity the negro; I pity the race. They are degraded, and it is not altogether their fault that they are so. And because they are degraded, I am not disposed to aid in passing measures that are stringent and that will oppress them still more. Therefore, I am disposed to support the proposition to prohibit, by a provision in the new Constitution, those not among us now, those residing in other States, from hereafter immigrating into and taking up their residence in this State. I am disposed to shut down the gate upon them. At the same time, I would exercise all the benevolence and mercy possible towards those already here.

I am astonished to hear gentlemen discuss the provisions of the Constitution of the United States as they do. I make no pretensions to legal learning, nor should I presume to endeavor to make a Constitutional argument; but, sir, I must say, that I do not think the Constitution of the United States will bear the construction put upon it by gentlemen who have taken ground against this section of the report of the committee on the bill of rights. The construction that I allude to is upon that clause which speaks of the rights of citizens of one State going into another State. What is the general government except the powers delegated by the several States, and delegated for specific purposes? Read the preamble to the Constitution of the United States and you will see what those specific purposes were:

"We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

We see that the first purpose was to form a more perfect union; and the second object to be secured by this Constitution was to secure domestic tranquility; another, to promote the general welfare, &c.; and the last is, "to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity."

In delegating powers to the general government, it will be remembered that that government has also granted certain powers to the States. Among the powers which the States have relinquished, is the right to coin money, to make war, or conclude peace as individual States, all these rights have been relinquished by the several States to the general government. The general government, acting upon this power thus conferred, say, "no State shall coin money, levy war, or conclude a peace." The Constitution also says, in the second section of the fourth article: "The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." What other construction can be given to that section than this: if a citizen of Kentucky, if he comes here and submits himself to the laws of Indiana, or if a citizen of this State should go to Kentucky, the Indianian would be entitled to all the privileges and rights of the citizen of Kentucky, and so would it be with the Kentuckian coming into this State. But I believe the gentleman who has just taken his seat is mistaken in thinking his construction will apply to the extent he supposes. He might, with much plausibility, claim that a black man in New York who is a citizen there, who has risen so high in the social and political scale as to exercise the right of suffrage there, may come here and acquire and possess property, yet my friend would not go so far as to say that the negro could vote here with us. But suppose for a moment, that the entire rights and privileges of citizenship could be extended to him here in Indiana, I would like to see him go to Kentucky, Virginia, or North Carolina, and attempt to vote with the people there, under this construction of the second section of the fourth article of the Constitution!

Mr. HOWE. I did not assume that the negro who was a citizen and entitled to vote under the laws of Massachusetts and New York, would be entitled to exercise the right of suffrage in another State.

Mr. FARROW. I now understand his position.

It does seem to me that the principle of self defence and self protection requires that we should look first to our own interests and the interests of our posterity in regard to the free immigration of the negroes of other States. The principle of humanity dictates that we should deal as kindly as possible with those already in the State, and I should be opposed to depriving them of any of the few rights they now enjoy. For that reason I shall deem it right to vote for a proposition to prohibit the future immigrations of blacks in the State, while at the same time I could not support a proposition to deprive those now here of their rights of property and their privileges as inhabitants of the State.

Believing this would be right, I shall vote accordingly, when the question comes upon the adoption of the section. I have no doubt of the Constitutional right to prohibit the immigration of negroes and mulattoes, and I am satisfied that it is both right and a matter of policy.

Mr. KINDLEY. Mr. PRESIDENT: In a large body, constituted as this is, of men chosen from every part of the State, it is to be expected that, not only every interest will be represented here, but that every opinion will have its advocate. If I, on one subject, entertain opinions at variance with those of a majority, I do nothing more than is done, by every other gentleman here, on some other subject, and I claim, for myself, what I cheerfully concede to him, even the most ultra, the freedom of debate. The half hour rule, under which we act, must not only cut speeches short, but, under the terrorism of the rule, the attention is necessarily drawn away from the subject, to the dial plate over the President's chair, so it will not only be impossible to notice the subject in all its bearings, but it will be difficult to preserve that logical connection, which all are desirous should characterize their speeches.

Before entering on the discussion of the main question, I propose to notice some of the positions of the gentlemen on the other side.

The gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Foster) tells us, that our State will be overrun by free negroes, unless we adopt a constitutional provision like the one provided in the section under consideration. As that gentleman refutes his own positions much more successful than I can, I shall read from his own speeches, so that the force of his argument may be manifest. In his printed speech of last Tuesday, I find the following:

"Now, speaking of the organic law of Kentucky, what would be the effect of that law were it enforced? Our State would be inundated with free negroes and mulattoes. The State of Illinois has forbidden them to enter her borders. Ohio will unquestionably do the same; and, unless we protect ourselves, the result will be, that Indiana will be the great refuge of all the worthless, the halt, the maimed, and the blind negroes that are to be found in the Southern States."

This, sir, is his strong position. He argues, that inasmuch as Illinois has forbidden the free negroes to come within her limits, therefore Indiana will become the receptacle of all the free negroes and mulattoes of the country. Or, in the forcible language of the gentleman from Clark—"become the Liberia of the Southern States."

Now mark how he refutes his own position:

"If the matter is left in that way, you may rely upon it, that there never will be any law passed at all upon the subject, and this section reported by the committee, will be as nugatory in its operations as the law of the State of Illinois. The chairman of that committee, I believe, told me that this section was an exact transcript of the section provided in the Constitution of the State of Illinois. That provision of the Constitution was referred to the people, and they rejected it. And why did they reject it? Simply because it was not sufficiently stringent."

Here we have an admission that this law is inoperative in Illinois. With one breath, he tells us that Indiana will be inundated with negroes, because they are driven out of Illinois; with the next, that the Constitution of that State is inoperative on the subject. But I am not done with him. In another place, he calls the negroes "vermin," "descendants of monkeys," &c. Hear him:

"Indeed, sir, I have seen the negro race in such low stages of development, with such inferior mental and physical organizations, that I have been tempted to give credence to the theory of Lord Monbodo, that man originated from a monkey [laughter]. I do not know but that man is the highest order of a species originating from the Ape, and connected therewith by a regular gradation of races. It may not generally be known that a celebrated philosopher, Professor Agassiz, has promulgated a theory, which, though new, is attracting much attention. He thinks that the negro does not belong to the same race with ourselves. Be that as it may, I do know from Holy Writ that the negro race, whether they belong to the same race we do or to a higher order of animals, are under the ban of Heaven—a curse that was pronounced upon them by Almighty God still remains upon them. The race was cursed, and it was declared that they should be the servants of servants. That curse has never been removed. We cannot, therefore, be charged with inhumanity in preventing our State from being overrun with these vermin—for I say they are vermin, and I know it."

Without commenting on this singular language, I will read a part of the closing remarks of the same speech:

"There is no scheme of philanthropy, no project better adapted to the amelioration of the condition of the African race, than African colonization. In Liberia they can enjoy equal rights and privileges, and live free from the depressing influences of a national prejudice. The climate and the soil is that naturally adapted to them by nature, and there they may yet rise to be a powerful and a civilized nation."

What a glorious nation of Baboons!

What exalted conceptions of civilization; I think I can follow out the soaring imagination of the gentleman, and contemplate this brilliant republic of Monkeys, in the full tide of successful operation, as an independent and certainly as a distinct government!

When these human monkeys get to be the great and powerful nation he has described, I sincerely trust they may not be vindictive and revengeful enough to invade our weaker country, and visit upon us a terrible, and, what they may consider, a just retribution for the outrages committed upon their ancestors!

Mr. President, I have quoted from this singular speech, not so much for the purpose of refuting his argument, (for the simple statement of it refutes itself,) as to establish this other position, that error is always inconsistent.

The constitutionality of this provision is too important to be overlooked.

Article 4, section 2, of the Constitution of the U. S., says:

"The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges of the citizens of the several States."

Sir, I am no constitutional lawyer. I claim no peculiar ability to discuss constitutional questions. But I do profess to know something of the meaning of my mother tongue; and here the meaning is so unmistakably plain, that "the way-faring man, tho' but a fool, may understand."

This article of the Constitution, is a repetition of a similar provision, in the original articles of confederation. In article 4 of the articles of confederation, we find this language:

"The better to secure and perpetuate mutual friendship and intercourse among the people of the different States in this Union, the free inhabitants of each of these States, paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice, excepted, shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several States, and the people of each State shall have free ingress and egress, to and from any other State."

Although the articles of confederation are not binding upon us now, the fact of this provision occurring in both instruments, gives it an authority which gentlemen should not disregard. So sacred has this right of citizenship been regarded, that on two different times, have the patriots and statesmen, representing the several States of this confederacy, declared the principle, and as often, have several States ratified their decisions.

If the argument of the gentlemen on the other side prove anything, it is that the article in the Constitution of the U. S., to which I have alluded, means nothing at all. That, if it is competent for this State to exclude the colored citizens of other States, it may also exclude Dutchmen, Quakers, Methodists, or any other class of people.

What is a citizen? The gentleman from Posey, in his able speech on the rights of woman, in which he characterizes her according to the theory of our law, as a slave, calls her, and I think justly, a citizen. "One half the citizens of the State," says he, alluding to the women.

But, if you say they must possess all the rights and privileges of the white people, to constitute them citizens, go to Massachusetts, and you will find them in precisely this situation. Are they not citizens? But, gentlemen say they are not citizens of the U. S. That is not the reading of the Constitution. It says, the citizens of each State.

But, if you say they must have all the privileges of citizens of the U. S., in order to constitute them citizens; then where are you. I mean no disrespect to the honorable chairman of this committee. But there are certain privileges, to which, under our Constitution, he cannot aspire. He cannot be President of the U. S.; yet does any gentleman say that he is not a citizen of Indiana? or, that the State of Kentucky or Ohio could exclude him from coming within her borders? Yet, sir, he possesses no privileges, under our Constitution and laws, which a negro in Massachusetts does not possess under hers.

But, suppose you succeed in engraving into the amended Constitution the provisions of this section, and that a colored citizen of Massachusetts, or New York, should come to reside in Indiana, which shall prevail; the spirit and letter of the Constitution of the U. S., or our own organic law, plainly contravening both?

In the States of Massachusetts and New York, the negro is a citizen, and so recognized by their laws. How then, under the Constitution of the nation, can you prohibit him, from coming here and acquiring and holding property? Let the question go before our own courts, and if I had a legal reputation to hazard, I should not fear to stake it, on the result.

When South Carolina kidnapped and imprisoned the colored seamen of Massachusetts, this latter State claiming the protection of her citizens under the Constitution, sent Hon. Samuel Hoar, to contest the legality of the proceedings, in the courts of South Carolina. But, sir, South Carolina, not daring to submit the question to their own tribunals, appealed to the higher law mentioned by the gentleman from Clark, (Mr. Gibson,) raised a mob and drove the agent of Massachusetts, from her borders.

I cannot follow out this view of the subject as I should like to have done. I can only ask the serious attention of gentlemen to this view of the subject.

Gentlemen exclaim, "why, sir, will you put us on a level with the darkey?" That is not proposed. But, sir, we may degrade ourselves by perpetrating this unconstitutional outrage on a poor, and defenceless class.

Every act of justice, elevates the true dignity of its author. Every act of injustice, degrades it. This proposition applies as well to sovereign States, as to individuals, and Indiana furnishes no exception to the principle.

Sir, in old Massachusetts, that land consecrated in the memories of the world, for its achievements in every field of glorious enterprise; that land at once the child and mother of civilization; that land where human rights are best defined and best protected; the negro possesses every privilege, civil, political, and religious, with the white man. And if gentlemen, by a simple act of justice, should degrade themselves to the level of such men as Webster, Everett, Winthrop, Mann, Adams, and Channing, I hope the sympathies of mankind will be a sufficient compensation! There, sir, the negro helps to make the law which protects him. But did it ever occur to gentlemen, that for this triumph of knowledge over ignorance, of reason over prejudice, of right over wrong, that this old Commonwealth is degraded? The civilized world has passed a very different verdict.

But if gentlemen fear being degraded to an equality with the negro, are they not satisfied with the vast distance which the law already places between him and them? While the law protects neither his life nor his property, while it refuses to educate his children, or to guard the honor of his wife, or his daughter, can not gentlemen find enough in this circumstance, seeing the negro, in the eye of the law so far below them, to satisfy every feeling of self gratulation? "Righteousness exalteth a nation; but sin is a reproach to any people." I repeat again we must have an eye to justice. We must watch, that in our efforts to degrade lower and lower the negro race, we do not degrade ourselves.

One of the ministers of the Gospel in this place, proposed that there should be a clause in the amended Constitution, recognizing the existence of a God. If I had known at the time that it would be seriously proposed to legislate out of existence all his divine attributes, and to set at nought his providences, I should have received the proposition with more favor.

Sir, there is a certain old book, which children read at their Sabbath Schools, and some old fashioned matrons, around their firesides, which teaches some antiquated notions concerning our duties to our fellow beings. And as we learn many things in our childhood, which, if remembered, might be of use to us, I hope to be excused for recurring to this book. If gentlemen should doubt the correctness of my quotations, and should wish to see the book itself, they may find it in the hands of some of the children of this city as they attend Sabbath School. The children may also be of use to them, in finding the passage, to which I allude. The book is entitled The Bible, and the passage runs in this wise: "In all things, whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so unto them."

Now, sir, it strikes me, that there is a great deal of sense in this; that it is one of those self-evident truths, which require no argument to prove. But is any man so mad as to believe, if his case were reversed, he would desire the treatment he is about to inflict? Sir, if I did not see it seriously proposed to be carried into effect, I could not believe myself in earnest, in trying to convince gentlemen that it is wrong to rob, wrong to enslave.

But gentlemen tell us it is policy; it is self-defence. Policy! That varying shadow of a shade! That ignis-fatuus light that has so often lighted nations to their ruin! Has the word so much magic about it, as to silence every sense of justice, and lead us, spell bound, wherever prejudice, caprice, or self-interest, shall dictate?

It was the policy of Julius Cesar that overthrew the liberties of Rome. And if America follows in the wake, some future Volney, meditating among the "ruins of a mighty empire," will exclaim: "Her sentiments of justice, were subservient to her notions of policy, and she fell."

Sir, I have no confidence in any policy, but that of immutable justice. Every departure from this is shortsightedness. It may subserve a temporary purpose, but certain disaster will follow. History, that "philosophy which teaches by example," furnishes a continual ex-emphlication of this truth, that justice is the true policy of nations. Sir, shall we pander to a paltry prejudice, a temporary excitement, produced by a nugatory law of a sister State, when we know the sober second thought of the people will spurn the idea? We are framing organic law. The next year cannot undo what we do now amiss. Let us not then, inflict a lasting stain on the character of the State, nor insult its sense of justice.

Self defence! against whom? The old and worn out slave! You already have a law against paupers; enforce it. This you may legally, constitutionally, and with justice, do. But in doing a justifiable act for one purpose, you should not violate the laws of God, and the rights of man, for another.

If it was infamous in Kentucky, to pass the law which has been alluded to with such bitter epithets, if it is a "stain upon her otherwise fair character," as was asserted by the gentleman from Clark, (Mr. Gibson,) are we quite sure that we are entirely excusable in affirming the report of the committee? Kentucky is a slave State; and it is said that free negroes are dangerous to the stability of her "peculiar institution." She had some shadow of a pretext for her law. To this, it may be added, the constant practice of wrong necessarily blunts the sense of justice. Having always had slaves in her midst, she cannot appreciate the value of liberty, nor feel sufficiently the unmitigated sin of reducing a freeman into slavery. But, sir, we of Indiana, can plead none of these excuses. The reason for it does not exist. It is a cold calculating policy, unsupported by a single argument. A policy which, if adopted, will bring down upon this Convention, an odium, which no time can remove, no ablution wash away.

One gentleman urges, in defense, the dignity of labor. The gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) thinks every man is a natural tyrant. Though I cannot consent to the proposition in such general terms, I know, and regret, that it applies to individual cases. But, sir, that spirit which would crush the negro because he is degraded, would oppress the degraded white man. Hence we should legislate for man as man, not as a caste. Sir, it is the condition of labor that is aimed at, and is ultimately to be degraded by the tendency of this doctrine.

Mr. President, I was passing the street the other evening, and heard a moaning which I supposed proceeded from some drunken man, and did not stop to inquire. Feeling some misgivings about it, however, I returned, and found a man in severe convulsions of delirium tremens. If, sir, instead of carrying that man into the house and procuring him medical aid, I had carried him further from the street, where his complaints could not be heard, I should have acted on a parity with the provisions you propose to insert in the Constitution.

Instead of encouraging the man to rise, you lay heavier burdens upon him, and then insult him because he is degraded.

Sir, I may be an enthusiast. As "a candid confession is said to be good for the soul," I believe that I am. I know, indeed, that I love what I believe to be right, and to follow out my own convictions. And no circumstances, over which I have control, can make me shrink from the discharge of my duty.

I have no hope that anything that I have said, or can say, will change the action of this Convention on a subject, on which, a majority, seem already determined. If gentlemen are determined that the provisions of this report shall be the law of the land, let them not shuffle the responsibility. The Convention of Illinois enjoined the next succeeding Legislature, to enact such a law as is here proposed. But that Legislature, believing it more commendable to obey God, than the State Constitution, refused to enact the law. The result is, that the clause, like our own Black Laws, is not only a disgrace on the book, but a dead letter in fact. I repeat, then, if gentlemen have the courage, in contravention of the Constitution of the nation, to say to the citizens of other States, they shall not settle in this State, and to those here, that they shall be divested of the property which they have acquired according to law, say it here, and on their own responsibility. Sir, this very dodging of the question, this shrinking from the responsibility, evinces some misgivings on this subject; that somewhere in the corners of the soul, there is a feeling, which even politics cannot entirely smother, which tells them all is not right.

Sir, I love my native State, and am willing to make any sacrifice for her advancement, but I cannot perpetrate this wrong. I beg gentlemen to deliberate well before they act.

In the name of that justice you trample under foot; in the name of the Constitution you have sworn to defend; in the name of the people of Indiana, whose morals you corrupt; in the name of the State, whose reputation you tarnish; in the name of humanity, whose sentiments you outrage; in the name of the living God, in whose presence you act, I protest against this barbarism, this flagrant violation of the rights of man.

Mr. NAVE. Mr. PRESIDENT: It might be supposed that the speech of the gentleman who has just taken his seat, would deter any member of the Convention from taking the floor to sustain the proposition of the section in debate. The gentleman (Mr. Kinley) has denounced all who support this proposition as recreant to the principles of justice and humanity; but, sir, denunciation proves nothing—it satisfies no one of the error of the position assumed by those who are denounced.

Mr. President, I take the position, in debating this question, that this Convention has the constitutional power to prevent, by a provision in the organic law of the State, the immigration of negroes and mulattoes into and from settling within the State, and also to prevent them from acquiring or possessing real estate.

I also take the ground that it is consistent with right and justice, and that it is a good policy for the blacks as well as the whites, that such a constitutional provision should be adopted.

I have listened attentively and patiently to the gentleman from Lagrange, (Mr. Howe,) in his argument to prove that it is inconsistent with the provision of the Constitution of the United States to adopt the proposition of this section, and I will say that he has exhibited a signal ability in the advocacy of his position, and considerable skill in the construction of his argument. But, in my opinion, he has placed the constitutional question upon a false issue. He has endeavored to sustain his position by the strength of abstract questions, settled by the courts of the United States.

At the time of the formation of the Constitution of the United States, the framers of that instrument were surrounded by circumstances which it would be well for us to take into consideration. When the framers spoke of the rights of citizens of one State migrating to another, they unquestionably meant something. In the fourth article and second section of the Constitution, we find the following:

"The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

Did our fathers, when they penned this language, mean that it should bear any construction by which the slaves—for, sir, all the negroes of this country, with hardly an exception, were at that time slaves, and recognized only as slaves—did they mean that the slaves of the several States should have the privileges of a citizen of the United States? I take the position that they meant no such thing; and the gentleman from Lagrange is mistaken in his construction of that language. But how do I arrive at that conclusion? By reading this clause of the second section of the first article:

"Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons."

What was meant by the term "including those bound to service for a term of years?" It refers to foreigners, who, in order to emigrate to this country, had sold themselves or bound themselves to service for a term of years to pay their passage across the Atlantic. When they speak of "three-fifths of all other persons" not enumerated by name in the Constitution, they meant the negroes of the country, who were then slaves. This shows that negroes were not then considered as citizens of this confederacy, for any purposes whatever, but were only regarded as slaves.

The gentleman from Lagrange quotes the opinion of courts, that any person who has the rights of citizenship in one State, has the rights and privileges of citizens of any other State. Let us examine the reasoning of this dictum. If the laws of Massachusetts confer upon a negro all the rights and immunities of a citizen of that commonwealth, that negro has the right, under the Constitution of the United States, to remove to Indiana and here possess and enjoy all the rights of a citizen of this State. He can give testimony here, he can vote here—

Mr. HOWE. The gentleman misunderstands my position. I say that any person recognized as a citizen, with all the rights and privileges thereunto appertaining, by the Constitution and laws of New York, is entitled to the rights of social domicil in this or any other State of the Union.

Mr. NAVE. Well, then, if a negro lives in the State of Massachusetts, where he enjoys all the rights of any other citizen of the commonwealth, except the single one of being eligible to the office of Governor of the State, he has the right to remove to Indiana, to acquire and possess property, and that any law of ours, in contravention of that right, is unconstitutional.

Now, I take the ground that we have the constitutional right to interdict negroes and mulattoes from coming into or settling within this State from any other part of the world—from any of the States, whether he is or is not a citizen in those States. And for this reason; it is not denied that we have the constitutional right to exclude the emigration of idiots and paupers into the State; and for the same reason, and on the same ground, we may prohibit the emigration of negroes.

I ask gentlemen, by what process of reasoning they make a citizen out of persons who were not recognized as citizens at the time of the adoption of the federal Constitution? No act of Congress has ever been passed conferring upon negroes or upon Indians the right of citizenship. No States, except those of New York and Massachusetts, have given to free colored persons the rights and privileges of citizens—the right to vote, and to be eligible to public offices. And are we in Indiana to be controlled or affected by the unconstitutional acts of those two States? I call them unconstitutional acts, because, as will be seen by a careful examination of the section I have read, the Constitution of the United States does not recognize negroes, mulattoes, and Indians as citizens, under any circumstances whatever. Because they have gone beyond the intentions and express declarations of the framers of that instrument, to which we all owe allegiance and strict observance, shall we also transgress on the one hand, or shrink from vindicating our rights, because of the transgression of organic law by other States?

Mr. President, on account of the restriction in debate to half an hour, I cannot carry out this view of the case at the length and with the clearness that I should otherwise endeavor to; but I venture to say that what I have stated is good law, and in conformity with the spirit of the Constitution of the United States.

The gentleman says that a contract is always to be construed most strongly against the contracting party. This may be true as to individuals, but it is not true when applied to the case of a sovereign power; when a government is formed the people surrender certain individual rights which naturally belong to them for the sake of the security and protection afforded by the combined strength of that government. And when the people assembled by their representatives adopt a rule of action in the shape of a Constitution, that Constitution is not to be construed most strongly against the government.

Mr. President, for one moment let us regard this question in a different light, and in regard to its policy and practicability. I have no desire farther to oppress or punish the negroes of this country—they are most unfortunate, morally, intellectually, socially, and physically. On the contrary, there is no man on this floor or among the people who will go farther than I will in practicable efforts for the amelioration of their condition, and the bettering of their prospects as a class, for the future. I do most sincerely commiserate their position of political and social degradation in the States of this Union, surrounded by a more powerful, as well as a more intellectual, race; and it is for that very reason that I would aid in efforts to colonize them, where they could all be equal, one negro with another, and enjoy all the rights and privileges of a distinct community. I do not believe it is possible for them ever to be a happy or a prosperous class in this country; and believing this, I am in favor of colonizing them in the Republic of Liberia, on the shores of their native continent, where the climate and the soil are by nature adapted to them, and where, withdrawn from the presence of a superior race who would naturally absorb their rights and privileges, they may grow up into a civilized and prosperous nation, respected, it may be, among the nations of the earth. And there is no man of equal means who would pay more for the purpose of thus colonizing the free negroes of this country than myself. But when I look to the interests of Indiana, future and present, I see and am convinced that it is not well for him to stay among us. A large and respectable portion of the people of this State emigrated from the slave States, and for the express purpose of getting rid of the cursing and blighting influences of slavery. They have contributed to the growth of the State, and are among the most useful of its citizens, and now I ask, if after they have moved out from a slave State to rid themselves of the influences and results of slavery, if this State, by allowing the unchecked emigration of all the worn out, aged, and pauper slaves of the Southern States, they and we are still to suffer all the real evils of slavery with none of its benefits. The slaveholders of Kentucky get the services of the negro during youth and manhood, and when he is worked out and worn down so that he is only an object of sympathy instead of profit, they drive him from the State, and we oppose no barriers—no obstacles to his coming here. It is only an act of self-protection to exclude negro emigration and to say to Kentucky and other slaveholding States, "if you will keep slaves, if you are convinced that it is a blessing and a good, keep all its blessings and all its benefits—if you will work a slave in youth and manhood, support him when worn out in your service, take care of him—we will not in this free State." And yet, sir, for advocating this act of self-defense, we are denounced as uncharitable and inhuman, and called upon in the name of God and humanity to abandon every proposition of this kind.

I admire the sympathy of the gentleman who has just spoken, (Mr. Kinley,) but they will do neither him or the negroes any good—they will serve no valuable purpose—will have no practical effect in benefitting the class whose degraded and unfortunate condition he can deplore no more deeply than myself. As was well remarked by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) the two races can never live together; they must either be separated in the best and most humane manner possible, or one must be annihilated. This, sir, is the plain state of the question and there is no avoiding it. The Anglo-Saxon race will never live on terms of equality with another race in the domestic and political relations of life. Look, sir, at the history of the indian tribes of this country in proof of my position. They are gradually being exterminated from the face of the earth; another century and they will be known only in history. The same thing will be true of the negroes if they and their professed friends contend for their remaining among the whites. Therefore, as a real friend to the negro, I desire to see him colonized in his native country for his own good as well as of the people of this country.

I am satisfied that it is a bad policy for this State to encourage the immigration of negroes and mulattoes within her borders. Here we are standing passively by when Kentucky is driving her worn out negroes by hundreds across the Ohio to fill our jails and poor houses, and to become a permanent burden upon our people. The Constitution which has just been adopted in Kentucky provides that any emancipated slave, or any free negro coming into the State and remaining thirty days, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and liable to confinement in the State's Prison. Shall Kentucky openly pass such a law—shall South Carolina notify us that she will send Northward her surplus population of negroes—shall the whole South be allowed to import their worn out slaves to our State with impunity, with no act of self-protection on our part? For my own part, I believe that I am justified in seeking to protect myself and my posterity against this growing and alarming evil by the support of the proposition before the Convention. I will do no act of oppression to those now in the State; I will not interfere with their rights of property, or any of the privileges they now possess; my only object is to prevent the future emigration into the State of this class. I believe that their interest is to migrate to Liberia, but I will never endeavor to drive them out of the State by a Constitutional provision.

Mr. HELM. I have no intention, Mr. President, to enter at any length upon the discussion of this question, but it is a subject in which the people which I have the honor to represent upon this floor, take a great interest, and a question, the decision of which they look for with much anxiety, and for this reason I feel called upon to express my views and what I believe to be their sentiments upon a subject which is regarded as so important. The section in debate proposes that:

"The General Assembly at its first session under the amended Constitution, shall pass laws prohibiting negroes and mulattoes from coming into or settling in this State; and prohibiting any negro or mulatto from purchasing or otherwise acquiring real estate hereafter."

This, sir, is a proposition which interests every voter of our common State. It deeply concerns the whites as well as the blacks who are within our borders. The section prohibits the emigration of the latter class into the State, and that feature of the provision interests negroes and mulattoes in other States who may desire to come into this.

I conceive, sir, that the section before us embodies a compound question, a portion of which, if the question were separated into two distinct propositions, I should be willing to support, but there is another portion to which I am directly and most decidedly opposed. We acted this morning upon a compound question, or upon two propositions embodied in one section. In giving my vote this forenoon upon the adoption of the following section of the bill of rights:

"No man's services shall be demanded without just compensation."

So far, Mr. President, I was willing to support the section. But it goes on to provide that:

"No man's property shall be taken by law without just compensation first assessed by a jury of freeholders, and tendered, together with the expense of the proceeding, to the owner by the person to be benefited. But such tender if rejected, shall not bar the right of appeal."

Now, sir, to this latter part I could not give my vote, and the question being taken upon both propositions, I was obliged to vote against the whole section, while I should have been glad to support the first clause. And I voted against some other sections because, while I was in favor of one principle contained in them, there was another that I could not support, and being obliged to vote upon the sections as a whole, I voted against them; and, sir, if this section comes up on its final passage in such a shape that I shall be obliged to vote upon it as a whole, to vote upon the two distinct propositions which I contend it contains, I shall most assuredly vote against the whole section. But if it is divided, I shall support one proposition and vote against the other.

I am in favor of the first clause of this section:

The General Assembly at its first session under the amended Constitution shall pass laws prohibiting negroes and mulattoes from coming into or settling in this State.

So far, sir, I am in favor of the section and shall vote for it. I conceive that we have the right to provide in the new Constitution that the Legislature shall pass laws prohibiting negroes and mulattoes from immigrating into the State, and that by so doing we are not materially infringing upon their rights or violating any important principle. Perhaps the slave States have adopted such severe measures to force their free negroes and emancipated slaves to emigrate to the free States, that we are justified in passing stringent laws to prevent the influx of thousands of their slaves, emancipated because they are old and worthless and only a public burthen.

I shall therefore, vote for the first part of this section. But there is another clause which follows, which I cannot and will not vote for, it reads:

"And (the General Assembly shall pass laws) prohibiting any negro or mulatto from purchasing or otherwise acquiring real estate hereafter."

Mr. President, this I conceive to be nothing more nor less than a species of robbery upon one portion of the people of this State; they may be and they doubtless are a very small portion, and a weak and inferior class, but notwithstanding this they are human beings, they have settled in this State in contravention of no laws or Constitutional prohibition, and they have rights in which they should be protected. They have, I know, but few rights and fewer privileges, but I can never lend my aid, however much I may be opposed to the future immigration of the surplus black population of the slave holding States, into this State, and I will never lend it to deprive them of those few rights now allowed them. They have settled in this State under the laws thereof, they have acquired property, many of them are industrious and intelligent, and have purchased land and built themselves permanent homes. This latter clause of the section proposes ultimately to rob them of this property, or perhaps as I should say, to use a milder term and one more agreeable to the friends of this section, it proposes to "divest" them of the result of years of honest labor.

As I remarked when I rose, I have no disposition to consume time in a lengthy discussion, I desired only to state my position and briefly to give the reasons which actuate me to the course which I deem it my duty, under all the circumstances, to pursue.

I wish my position to be distinctly understood. I am in favor of the first portion of the section which I have read, and directly opposed to the latter clause, which I have separated from the rest of the section.

If I am called upon to vote for the section as it now stands, as a whole, I shall record my vote against it, but if a vote can be taken on the first clause separately, I shall vote for it and against the other.

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. President, I shall not attempt to discuss this matter at all with relation to its legal bearings or its Constitutional points: I shall leave that to other gentlemen who are learned in the law, who are thoroughly conversant with those features of the case, and are able to argue it with reference to those features.

It is upon the question as a practical matter alone, that I propose to say a few words, before the question is taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Gibson (Mr. Hall) and I shall endeavor not to trespass against the rule of limitations adopted on Saturday.

I am aware, sir, that the section as it came originally from the committee wears a harsh appearance. As one member of that committee, I was willing it should do so. I was not only willing, but desirous, to present a practical remedy for the evil complained of.

I am sorry, that the force and effect of the committee's proposition, was more than half neutralized by the amendment, proposed by the honorable gentleman from Floyd, (Mr. Thornton,) and adopted without hesitation by the Convention.

I honor to the fullest extent, the motives by which that gentleman was influenced. But you could not fail to perceive from his remarks in favor of his amendment, that he was governed by views, partial in stead of general, in their application. Hence flows nearly all the evils of legislation, and of all government.

I am fully sensible, sir, of the great difficulty of establishing general rules, without exception as to their application to individuals under all circumstances. In this, I apprehend, consists the chief difficulty in the formation of Constitutional laws.

But it must be plain to every reflecting man, that if we adopt a Constitutional rule at all, it must be general, unexceptional, and unequivocal, to be effective.

The section, as amended upon the motion of the gentleman from Floyd, (Mr. Thornton,) is partial. It creates classes among negroes, and is therefore wrong. No man would think of applying a similar rule to white men. There can be no good reason for adopting a different rule in relation to blacks, from that which would be applicable to any class of whites or indians, under similar circumstances.

I know that strong objections have been made to the latter clause of the section, but sir, allow me to say, without it, I would not give a "pinch of snuff" for the provision. It has been charged by the opponents of this latter clause, that it proposes nothing more nor less than to steal the property of the negroes now resident in the State. The whole section under consideration reads:

"The General Assembly at its first session under the amended Constitution, shall pass laws prohibiting negroes and mulattoes from coming into or settling in the State."

And now sir, comes the latter clause which was characterized by the gentleman who proposed the first amendment as a proposition to steal the property of negroes.

"And prohibiting any negro or mulatto from purchasing or otherwise acquiring real estate hereafter."

It must be obvious that it does not touch negroes now in the State and owning property. It does not affect that property until after the death of the negro possessing it at the time of the adoption of this new Constitution. And here allow me to read the proposition which I at first offered in Committee for adoption in place of the section reported from that committee. It is as follows:

Resolved, That the following provisions, in substance and effect, shall be incorporated in the Constitution of this State, to wit:

"From and after one year after the ratification of this Constitution by the people, no negro shall ever be privileged to own or possess real estate in this State, either in his own right, or in trust for any other person whatever.

"In all cases in which negroes are now the owners or possessors of real estate, upon their decease, the real estate of which they may have been the owners or possessors shall escheat to and become vested in the State: Provided, however, that the General Assembly shall make provision by law, for the equitable payment of the cash value of the same in money, (to be fixed by impartial appraisers,) to any negro claiming real estate rights under existing laws or to their heirs or legal representatives."

I may be permitted to say that upon that proposition the latter part of the reported section was based.

I consider that the whole virtue of the section before the Convention, lies in the latter clause in the simple sentence prohibiting negroes from acquiring or possessing real estate in Indiana. Suppose we should reject this latter clause and adopt only the first part of the section, what laws will the Legislature pass to prohibit the emigration of negroes into the State? Will gentlemen take the proposition of the gentleman from Monroe, (Mr. Foster) arrest and imprison them, or sell them out for a limited period of time, the proceeds to be donated to the colonization society in trust for the purpose of assisting them to colonize in Liberia? [laughter] Such a law would be more unpopular and a thousand times more difficult to enforce than the fugitive slave law.

There is, Mr. President, but one way to prevent the emigration into the State of this class of persons, and that is, to divest them of the right of acquiring and possessing property—no other effective scheme can be devised. So long as you tolerate the enjoyment of those rights by negroes, so long will the emigration of blacks from other States continue, because those who enjoy the rights of citizenship here, will afford protection and facilities to those who desire to come, and you cannot keep them out. And I repeat that the only practical and effective course to pursue in the matter is to divest the negro population of this State, individually of all social and political rights; then, and not till then, will those here see that it is to their interest to leave, and others be prevented from coming.

I was willing, as one member of the committee, in this matter to give "the hot end of the poker," to the Convention. I am sick—sick to death of seeing men run for office—every office in the State, from Constable to Congressman, upon the backs of negroes. [Great laughter.] I believe candidates should have some other qualifications to recommend them for Congress—some other mode of getting there than by kicking "a nigger" all the way to Washington! [renewed merriment.]

I have another idea relative to the policy of taking the responsibility of settling this question ourselves. By so doing I believe we shall make the pressure so strong upon Congress, that they will have no alternative, but will be forced to the settlement of the whole question of the negro population. Talk about Liberia, with regard to the settlement of this question! It is utterly impracticable; in the first place, for the very good reason that negroes won't go there. I would not go there myself if I was a black. But we may force the General Government to adopt a policy of colonizing them on some part of this continent, and thereby gradually relieve the States from the evil of the two races living or attempting to live together. The same policy may be pursued toward the African race in this country, that was pursued towards the Indians. That is the only practical scheme of colonization—the only effectual way to rid ourselves of this evil. Liberia has been tried for thirty years and with what result? You may get up a line of naval steamships from New York to the African coast at an expense, perhaps, of ten millions of dollars annually, with a view to transport the colored people of this country to Liberia, at the national expense, and yet the negroes will never go there. Personally I should not be injured by the establishment of such a line of national steamers, for I have a son in the Navy, who may be prepared to officer one of those national ships, but upon principle I deprecate the whole scheme as monstrously expensive and utterly ineffective for the accomplishment of the end proposed.

But, sir, a more practicable plan, in my opinion, would be to procure and give them a country of their own, perhaps in the neighborhood of Mexico, where they will be superior to, and will aid in civilizing the Mexicans. [A laugh.] Yucatan might be a favorable part of the continent in which to locate them. This will be comparatively humane, and would prove to be far superior to the almost exploded notion of African colonization.

Mr. President, I am speaking with all the trepidation and haste natural to a man who in his last moments, momentarily expects to fall under the speakers hammer, announcing the expiration of "the half hour;" but I will make one other remark, and take my seat, although, there are many things pressing for utterance—many points to which I should be glad to call attention.

As to this sympathy which is manifest for the negroes of this State. On the one hand, I cannot share in this excessive but false sympathy of some, while on the other, I do not admire the habit which many politicians feel bound to cultivate, of going out of their way—in public, to kick "a nigger." [Laughter.] I neither wish to sleep with a negro, nor to cowhide him continually—but I wish to treat him as a white man ought to treat a negro. [Applause.]

I am convinced that the only practical plan of ridding the State of a population of negroes and mulattoes is presented in the section before the Convention. The adoption of the first clause of that section alone, or any thing short of its last provision, is only mischief making, and so you will find by experiment.

Gentlemen who make such an outcry against the clause of the section proposing, in the future, to divest the negroes in Indiana, of the right to acquire and possess property and who have expressed their sympathy in such strong terms upon this floor, are inconsistent in the course they are pursuing. Negroes are already divested of other rights of which nothing is said—they are taxed without being represented, they are deprived of the right to testify in our courts, they have extended to them none of the privileges and advantages of public schools, they cannot exercise the elective franchise, they are ineligible to the pettiest office; we deprive them now, of all rights but the one of acquiring and possessing property.

If, upon the principle of the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) we should grant them some rights, why not grant them all?

MR. PETTIT. It is for our own protection, it is for our own interest, to allow them the rights of which I spoke.

MR. CHAPMAN. Would they not, by a parity of reasoning, have more cause to protect us against injury, if we granted them all the rights and privileges of citizens?

MR. President, in conclusion, let me say that if the motion to commit this section and pending amendments to a committee, should prevail, I trust that the Convention will re-consider the vote by which the amendment of the gentleman from Floyd (Mr. Thornton), was adopted and by which, I conceive that the virtue of the section was neutralized. That amendment was adopted in great haste, under the influence of a generous, but mistaken notion.

I trust that the Convention will do nothing at all in this matter, or else make the action it proposes, practical and effectual, by instructing the committee to re-insert the words stricken out from the last clause of the section. Let the Legislature, when it comes to the passage of specific laws on the subject, act with all the humanity and generosity towards the unfortunate negro that the magnanimity of a kind hearted people will most assuredly approve of; but, sir, in this matter, let us not dodge responsibility, let us have the virtue and power of the section as originally reported, or let us do nothing at all.

On motion, the Convention adjourned until nine o'clock to-morrow morning.

REMARKS OF MR. GREGG, of Jefferson,

MADE IN CONVENTION NOVEMBER 11, 1850.

The following proposition, reported by the committee on rights and privileges, was before the Convention, to-wit:

"The General Assembly, at its first session under the amended Constitution, shall pass laws prohibiting free negroes and mulattoes from coming into or settling in this State, and prohibiting any negro or mulatto from purchasing or otherwise acquiring real estate hereafter."

MR. GREGG said: I offer the following amendment to the section now under consideration:

"Strike out all after the word "section," and insert—

"That the general, great, and essential principles of liberty and free government may be recognized, and unalterably established: We DECLARE, That all men are born equally free and independent, and have certain natural, inherent, and unalienable rights: among which are, the enjoying and defending life and liberty, and of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property, and pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety."

MR. President, were I actuated on this occasion by prudential motives, I might, perhaps, be content with giving a silent vote upon the question now before the Convention. Or I might evade the responsibility of my position, by withdrawing to the lobby when the vote should be taken, as certain distinguished Senators have recently done, on a kindred subject in the Congress of the United States. But I desire to shrink from no responsibility upon this or any other subject that may be mooted in this body. Again, sir: were I disposed to pander to the popular prejudices of the day, that I might the more surely advance my own personal and political interests with the people, I might, perhaps, be inclined to fall in with what now appears to be the popular current here, and join in the popular clamor, against the rights and privileges, the peace and the happiness of the poor, oppressed, and down-trodden negro. But, sir, as I have no political aspirations now, and never expect to have, I may afford to brave public opinion in regard to this matter, if perchance it may be so; which, by the way, is very questionable, when the people come to take their sober, second thought upon the subject. Be this, however, as it may, I feel very much inclined at this time to cast aside all personal considerations, and make this question a matter of conscience, and act in the premises according to the honest impulses of the heart. I desire to impugn no man's motives; but upon this subject I would rather be right than politic.

And what do we propose to do? Why, sir, it is proposed by the committee on rights and privileges, of which the honorable gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) is chairman:

"That the General Assembly shall, at its first session under the amended Constitution, pass laws prohibiting negroes and mulattoes from coming into or settling in the State, and prohibiting any negro or mulatto from purchasing or otherwise acquiring real estate hereafter."

Now, sir, after such a report as this, emanating from so respectable and intelligent a source, I was prepared to find the chairman of that committee taking still one other step in the great work of radicalism, by striking from our bill of rights that section which declares "that all men are born equally free and independent, and have certain natural, inherent, and unalienable rights: among which are, the enjoying and defending life and liberty, and of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property, and pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety."

Yes, sir, I was prepared for such an innovation as this upon our sacred bill of rights, for I supposed the committee would seek to preserve some degree of consistency, at least, about the matter. Nor was I mistaken, as will be seen by reference to a subsequent report from the same committee, now upon our tables.

And is it possible, Mr. President, that this Convention is prepared to sanction the monstrous doctrine that all men have not the natural and inherent right of defending life and liberty, and of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property? For such we virtually do, if we sanction this innovation, not only upon the Declaration of Independence itself, but upon our good old Constitution, under which we have lived and prospered for so many years.

And why was it necessary to expunge this article from our bill of rights—an article which has stood in the fore-ground of the Constitution ever since we were a State, and which may be found in the Constitution of nearly every State in this Union, even in the slave-holding and slave-breeding Commonwealth of Old Virginia? Why, sir, it was absolutely necessary to expunge this article in order to enable them to incorporate a provision prohibiting persons of color from coming into the State, and prohibiting those already here, many of whom were to the manor born, from purchasing or otherwise acquiring real estate hereafter; the one so utterly repugnant to the other, that the two could not stand together in harmony in the same instrument. Yes, sir, it became necessary to over-ride the great doctrine of human rights, in order to introduce this provision, the like of which, to its full extent, I venture to say, cannot be found in the fundamental law of any civilized and Christian nation under the canopy of Heaven, and I trust in God it may never gain a foot-hold in ours. This doctrine may perhaps find favor in certain localities, and with men entertaining peculiar notions with regard to property. It may, for aught I know, be part and parcel of the social system; but to my mind it is so utterly at war with all the principles of refined and rational liberty, that I will not entertain the proposition for a moment; nor can I believe that it will find favor with a majority of this enlightened, humane, and philanthropic body.

Sir, I hold this to be the true American doctrine, on this subject, that all men, without regard to birth or color, have an inherent right to acquire and enjoy the possession of property, independent of any Constitutional sanction whatever; and that any Constitutional provision or statutory law which we may make, impairing that right, or attempting to do so, would be but a dead letter upon the Statute book. It is one of those rights which no man is called upon to surrender in entering into a state of society. It is one guaranteed to him by the Great Law-giver of the Universe, when he sent him forth, and commanded him to occupy, to subdue, and to replenish the earth. It is true, sir, the rights of the weak may be trampled upon by the strong; he may be divested of his property by mere brute force; but the principle of immutable justice remains unchanged, and must ultimately vindicate itself. Yes, sir, I hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men, over whom the Constitution of our national government throws the broad mantle of its protection, whether he be Anglo-Saxon or African, whether he be Turk or Christian, whether he be Jew or Gentile, has a certain and indefeasable right to acquire property by all honest and legitimate means, and any attempt on our part to impair or abridge that right, would but subject ourselves to the merited ridicule of an enlightened world.

But suppose, Mr. President, that we had the right, that we had the power thus to immolate and crush to earth the rights and the privileges of the poor, degraded African, whose lot has been cast among us, would it be politic for us to do so? With due deference to the opinion of others, I am constrained to think otherwise.

You take away from any man, whether he be white or black, the power to acquire and possess property, and you destroy that principle which buoys, and animates, and sustains him, through all the busy and conflicting scenes and vicissitudes of life. You remove from him all hope of ever acquiring a little spot of earth that he can call his own, and upon which he can erect his hut, to protect his wife and his little ones from the peltings of the pitiless storm. I say you remove from him this hope which animates and impels him to labor and toil for their sustenance and comfort, and he sinks at once into utter despondency—becomes a perfect drone in society—and his wife and children paupers and pensioners upon public bounty. The necessary result of your policy would be to legislate the colored population among us into pauperism and crime, instead of making of them good and useful members of the community in which they live. For, I undertake to say, sir, that however the curse of the Almighty may be upon the colored man, he may become eminently useful in his proper sphere, if the proper degree of encouragement be given to him. Why, sir, in the city of Madison, where I reside, I know a great many of them, whose sober and industrious habits are worthy of all praise, whose moral characters stand above reproach, whose regard for truth and veracity might well serve as models for others in higher life. They are found actively engaged in the various pursuits of life—acquiring property by honest industry—building churches—erecting school houses, and contributing their mite to sustain many of the benevolent and charitable institutions of the day. And shall we paralyze the efforts of these men to do good? Shall we arrest them in their career of usefulness, by saying to them you shall not acquire property hereafter, nor transmit that which you have now to your children? Sir, whatever others may do, I for one, will never consent to the perpetration of so great an act of injustice towards that weak and proscribed race, now lying at our feet, shorn and powerless, and looking up to us with imploring eyes, for justice and for mercy. In view of the manifest injustice of the project now in contemplation should it be consummated, I could well join in the sentiments of Thomas Jefferson and say, "that I tremble for my country when I reflect that God is just, and that his justice cannot sleep forever."

But, sir, not only are we called upon to divest the poor negro of the right to acquire and hold property, but he is also to be restrained from setting foot upon our soil, under the penalty of incarceration in the penitentiary—for the prohibition without such a penalty would be perfectly nugatory, as we have no power to carry him beyond the limits of our own State, and within the limits and jurisdiction of another.

And what are the reasons assigned for such stringent measures as those proposed by the committee? Why, it is said, that the late Kentucky Convention provided in their Constitution that any free negro or mulatto emigrating to that State, or any slave being emancipated and refusing to leave the State, shall be deemed guilty of a felony and confined in the penitentiary thereof; and that it is necessary for us to adopt like stringent measures as a matter of self-defense, to prevent our State from being flooded with the manumitted and broken down slaves of Kentucky, who would be driven thence to take shelter among us. Now I admit, sir, that this would be a great evil, and greatly to be deprecated; and I would regret to see this class of population multiplying among us, beyond the natural increase, as much as any gentleman upon this floor. But then I hold to the doctrine that two wrongs never make one right. It was wrong in the people of Kentucky to incorporate a provision in their Constitution fraught with so palpable inhumanity and manifest injustice, and it would be equally wrong in us to follow their pernicious example.

Why, sir, what would you think of that man, who, having a faithful old horse, that had served him for many years in raising bread for his family, would now turn him out upon the common to famish and die, because, forsooth, he had become old and unprofitable as a work-horse? You would say of such an one, that he was a man devoid of all the finer feelings of the heart, and was justly entitled to the execration of all his neighbors for his cruelty towards the noble beast. Well, sir, here is a reasoning creature, whom God has made, differing from us mainly in the color of his skin. The vigor of his youth, and the strength of his manhood, have been expended in pampering the pride and cupidity of his master. His toil and his sweat have been freely dispensed for the benefit of that master and his family—in educating them, and raising them to circumstances of ease and affluence. And now, when his labor is found no longer profitable, and it is feared he may become a charge upon him who has hitherto been the recipient of his services, his manumission papers are made out and tendered to him, and he is mocked with the phantom—ah, sir, with the mere shadow of freedom, without the substance. And what is he required to do? Why, sir, he is told that he must leave the State where, perhaps, he was born, and to which he is attached by many endearing associations. He must tear himself away from a wife who is still in bondage—from the graves of his children—from all that is near and dear to him. For although his skin be dark, he has a heart that feels as others feel. He has tender affections that cluster around his heart, to rend which is painful to him as the pangs of death itself. But from all these tender associations he must fly—for the avenger is behind him, and the walls of the penitentiary are already frowning upon him.

Why, sir, this act of banishment on the part of Kentucky of the poor negro, is the very refinement of cruelty, and I blush for the honor of our noble sister, that she should have done so. Aye, sir, it is a foul blot upon the bright escutcheon of her otherwise untarnished fame, that time itself will scarcely ever obliterate. Would to Heaven, that the Recording Angel who keeps cognizance of our national sins, would drop a tear of pity upon that foul record of her infamy, and blot it out forever.

And are we prepared to follow in the footsteps of Kentucky in regard to this matter, by adopting the report of the committee now under consideration? For one, sir, I can say that the proposition is too repugnant to all my notions of humanity, to receive the sanction of my vote, and I shall be constrained to go against it now and always.

But there is another view of this question to which I will advert for a moment, and that is the unconstitutionality of the measure. Now, sir, I am not prepared to affirm, nor will I undertake to prove, that this section which I propose shall be stricken out, is in direct violation of the Constitution of the United States—but such at least is my opinion. And when I say that I will not undertake to prove this proposition, I mean not to say that it is unsusceptible of proof, but that I only distrust my own ability to do that justice to the subject which its great importance demands, and that I prefer to leave the discussion of this particular point with the gentlemen of the legal profession in this body. The elucidation of such nice questions of Constitutional law, are altogether without the range of my ability, and I would not dare to elaborate them, or attempt to do so, in the presence of so many learned judges and gentlemen of the bar.

But this much I may be permitted to say, without presumption, that to my mind the proposition is very clear, that if free negroes and mulattoes are citizens of the State—and if citizens of the State, are they not necessarily citizens of the United States? I say, sir, if they are esteemed citizens in the eye of the law, then this inhibitory clause must of necessity contravene the spirit, if not the very letter of the supreme fundamental law of the land.

And was not this question virtually settled in the case of the admission of Missouri into the Union, in 1821, at least so far as it is competent for Congress to settle any mere question of Constitutional law? It seems, sir, that the Convention which formed the Constitution of Missouri, had incorporated a provision similar to the one now proposed to be embodied in ours, prohibiting free negroes the right of immigration. But I will read the clause itself, for the better understanding of the Convention. I hold in my hand the Revised Statutes of Missouri, and I take this occasion to thank my honorable colleague (Mr. Bright) for bringing these documents into the Convention, hoping he may make a good use of them when he comes to argue the question on the other side, should he conceive it his duty to do so. The fourth clause of the twenty-sixth section of the third article of the Constitution of Missouri, reads as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the General Assembly, as soon as may be, to pass such laws as may be necessary, to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to, and settling in this State, under any pretext whatsoever."

With such a clause as this in their Constitution, the people of Missouri applied to the Congress of the United States for admission into the Union. And what was the action of that body in regard to this particular question? And again I am indebted to the courtesy of my colleague for authorities on this subject. I hold in my hand the twentieth volume of Niles' Weekly Register, which I believe is recognised as good authority by all intelligent politicians, if not by constitutional conventions and courts of judicature. Under date of the 26th of February, 1821, I find the following Congressional proceedings reported, with reference to the admission of Missouri into the Union, and with special reference to this particular clause in her Constitution.

"Mr. Clay, from the joint committee appointed on the Missouri subject, reported the following resolution:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Missouri shall be admitted into this Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, upon the fundamental condition, that the fourth clause of the twenty-sixth section, of the third article of the Constitution, submitted on the part of said State to Congress, shall never be construed to authorise the passage of any law, and that no law shall be passed in conformity thereto, by which any citizen of either of the States of this Union shall be excluded from the enjoyment of any of the privileges and immunities to which such citizen is entitled under the Constitution of the United States: Provided, That the Legislature of the said State, by a solemn public act, shall declare the assent of the said State to the said fundamental condition, and shall transmit to the President of the United States, on or before the fourth Monday in November next, an authentic copy of said act; upon receipt whereof the President, by proclamation, shall announce the fact; whereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of the said State into this Union shall be considered as complete.

"The said resolution was twice read, and ordered to lie on the table, on motion of Mr. Clay, with the avowed intention of calling for its consideration in the course of this day."

The question afterwards coming up for consideration,

"Mr. Clay briefly explained the views of the committee, and the considerations that induced them to report the resolution. He considered this resolution as being the same in effect as that which had been previously reported by the former committee of thirteen members; and stated that the committee on the part of the Senate was unanimous, and that on the part of this House nearly so, in favor of this resolution.

"Mr. Allen of Massachusetts next obtained the floor, and delivered his sentiments with much earnestness. * * * He concluded by moving to amend the resolution by striking out the word citizen wherever it occurs in the resolution as above presented, and insert in lieu thereof, free negro or mulatto.

"Mr. R. Moore of Pennsylvania then required the previous question. Ninety-five members having risen to second this motion, and the yeas and nays having been required thereon by Mr. Randolph, there were,

For the previous question, - - 109

Against, - - - - - 50

"The main question was then accordingly put, viz.: Shall the resolution be engrossed and read the third time? and decided in the affirmative. Yeas 86, Nays 82.

"The final question was then taken on the resolution, and decided in the affirmative. Yeas 87, Nays 81."

Now, Mr. President, in these proceedings of Congress which I have just read, it is very clear to my mind, that they intended to affirm two things. First, that free negroes and mulattoes were citizens within the meaning of the second section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States, which is substantially recited in the resolution reported by Mr. Clay, just read. And secondly, that being citizens of the United States, the Legislature of Missouri had no power or rightful authority to prohibit them from emigrating to, and settling within her jurisdiction. I say, sir, they intended to affirm the truth of these propositions, or I cannot understand the force and effect of the English language. The people of Missouri so understand it, for the General Assembly of that State, from that day to this, a period of near thirty years, have never dared to place upon their statute book, any law in conformity with that provision of their Constitution. Indeed it was made a sine qua non in her admission into the Union, that no such law should ever be enacted. And she was required, and did signify her assent to this fundamental condition, by a solemn act of her Legislature, before she was permitted to come in as one of the great family of States.

Yes, sir, the State of Missouri did assent to this fundamental condition imposed by Congress, before she was admitted, and here is the solemn public act of her Legislature, a copy of which was transmitted to President Monroe:

"Be it enacted and declared, by the General Assembly of the State of Missouri, and it is hereby solemnly and publicly enacted and declared, That this State has assented and does assent, that the fourth clause of the twenty-sixth section, of the third article of the Constitution of this State, shall never be construed to authorise the passage of any law, and that no law shall be passed in conformity thereto, by which any citizen of either of the United States shall be excluded from the enjoyment of any of the privileges and immunities, to which such citizens are entitled, under the Constitution of the United States.*"

I remarked, sir, that the Legislature of Missouri had never presumed to pass a law in compliance with that provision of her Constitution, prohibiting the immigration of free negroes to the State. It is true, however, that they went as far as they dared to go towards accomplishing this object. They passed a law providing that no free negro or mulatto should be permitted to reside within the State, without first obtaining a license permitting him to do so. And they further provided that such license should not be granted to any free negro or mulatto except in certain specified cases; and among these cases of exception were such free negroes and mulattoes as might produce a certificate of citizenship from some one of the United States.

Now, sir, under the operation of this statute of Missouri, I should like to know how they would go about excluding any free negro or mulatto from acquiring a right of domicile in that State, provided he carried with him the proper vouchers. Suppose, for example, that one of the very respectable colored barbers of this city should take it into his head to remove to St. Louis, and should procure from the Clerk of the Circuit Court of Marion county, a certificate, setting forth that he was a free citizen of Indiana, and as such had demeaned himself as a good, orderly, and peaceable citizen; and he should carry this certificate with him to Missouri, and present it to the proper officer, demanding a license or permit to settle there. In such a case, I apprehend that the constituted authorities of Missouri would be bound to recognize him as a citizen of the United States, and as such entitled to remain within her sovereign jurisdiction, provided he gave the necessary security for his future good behavior.

But what are we to understand by the term "citizen," as used in the Constitution of the United States? And here, as I have already intimated, I am not going to hunt up legal authorities on this subject, preferring to leave this with the lawyers of this Convention.

Old Hezekiah Niles, who was confessedly one of the clearest-headed writers of his day, if not the most impartial and unprejudiced editor our country has ever known, says, in the volume from which I have quoted, that "free blacks and mulattoes are citizens in all the States east of the State of Delaware, as well as in the States North-West of the river Ohio; and they cannot be dispossessed of their right to locate themselves where they please."

Now, this opinion of Mr. Niles, I am aware, is not law; but it is common sense, and law is said to be founded upon the principles of common sense, or in other words, that law is the perfection of human reason.

But what says Chancellor Kent upon this subject?

He says that "citizens, under our Constitutions and laws, mean free inhabitants, born within the United States, or naturalized under the law of Congress. If a slave, born in the United States, be manumitted, or otherwise lawfully discharged from bondage; or if a black man be born within the United States, and born free he becomes a citizen, but under such disabilities as the laws of the States, respectively, may deem it expedient to prescribe to free persons of color." Enough, however, on this point.

But, sir, there is another clause in the Constitution of the United States, which declares that "excessive fines shall not be imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted." The same provision may be found in the Constitution of this State, together with another, which declares that "penalties shall be proportioned to the nature of the offense."

Now, I ask you, sir, if the bare fact of a person of color coming into our State, and demean-

* This "solemn public act" of Missouri was referred to in debate, but not read. And it is introduced now in my remarks, because its existence was denied by the gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Foster) who followed me, and who refused to correct his error when publicly apprised of it.

ing himself in an orderly and peaceable manner, is an offense against society, of so heinous a character as to deserve confinement in the penitentiary, or in the county jail? Would not the punishment in such a case be altogether disproportioned to the nature of the offense? Considering the nature of the crime—if, indeed, it may be called a crime—the punishment proposed would be cruel and unusual, and as such, a manifest infraction of the fundamental law of the land.

Now, sir, if the poor negro, whose presence has all at once become so hateful to us, had migrated to this country of his own free will and accord, and if we still found him voluntarily forsaking his own foreign home, to seek an asylum in this boasted land of liberty and free government, we might with the more propriety close our doors against him, and bid him go back to the shores of Africa from whence he came. But, sir, in all the vast tide of foreign emigration that has been pouring into our country for the last half century, I venture to affirm that you never heard of an African emigrant landing upon our shores of his own volition. Such a case would be a perfect anomaly—such an instance was never known. And in this he differs from my friend from Posey—and I make this allusion in no offensive sense, and hope no offense will be taken—I say, in this particular he differs from the gentleman from Posey; for the one came as a matter of choice—the other as a matter of necessity. The one came voluntarily—the other came in chains. The one came in hope—the other in despair. And shall we mete out to the one all the blessings of civil, social, political, and religious liberty; while we deny to the other the enjoyment of any one of these? Sir, to the cupidity of that country, to which the gentleman from Posey first owed allegiance, as well as to the inordinate avarice of some of our puritanical slave dealers of New England, who now turn up their eyes with a sort of holy horror at the monstrous iniquity of slavery, are we indebted for the presence of the colored race among us, to a very great extent. And shall we now turn upon these wretched victims of their cupidity, and visit them with the utmost rigor of the law, by consigning them to the gloomy walls of a penitentiary, or perpetual banishment from the State, for daring to come into the presence of their superiors? In the name of justice and humanity, I answer, no! We brought them here against their will, by the strong arm of power, and we are bound by all the dictates of humanity, to afford them shelter and protection, or furnish the means to carry them back to their own native home in Africa. I speak, sir, of our duty as a nation, as well as individuals.

Now, Mr. President, let me not be misunderstood here. Let no one infer from my remarks that I desire to place the white and the colored emigrant upon the same degree of social and political equality—that I would exclude the one as well as the other, or admit them both upon the same footing. No, sir, far from it; for had I the power, I would raise a wall as high as heaven, between this country and the shores of Africa; and I would punish with death, every American citizen who might be found engaged in the infernal slave traffic, by which these miserable creatures are forced from their native home, and sold into involuntary servitude in this country. Nor would I extend to those already here any political privileges from which they are now excluded by the laws of our country. In short, sir, I desire to leave them just where they are, in regard to all political rights, and without any addition or abatement as to their rights of property, their rights of domicile, and their rights of locomotion. Yes, sir, had I the power—and it is well, perhaps, I have not—I would raise a wall of fire between us and Africa, the more effectually to cut off all further influx of the colored race among us. While, on the other hand, I would throw open wide the portals of our country, and bid the oppressed and downtrodden of all the earth a hearty welcome. I would say to the honest German, come; to the open-hearted Irishman, come; to the burley Englishman and staid Scotchman, come; to the impulsive Frenchman and jealous Spaniard, come; of whatever name or nation, kindred, or tongue, upon the broad surface of God's footstool, let him come—come freely—nothing doubting—and enjoy with us all the blessings of civil and religious liberty. And when they shall have served out their day of probation, according to the true intent and meaning of the constitution and laws of our country with reference to aliens, I would elevate them all to the dignity of American citizens, and to the full enjoyment of all the rights and privileges of native born subjects. Such, sir, are my views in regard to the foreign population among us, without evasion or qualification; and let gentlemen make what they can of it.

But, Mr. President, there is another view of this question, that I deem worthy of particular notice. And that is this: If you incorporate a provision in the Constitution so utterly at war with every principle of philanthropy and christian benevolence, you will at once excite the indignation and arouse the opposition of a large portion of our fellow-citizens, and thereby greatly endanger the rejection of the Constitution by the people. And you will find, sir, that this feeling of opposition and just resentment is not confined alone to that portion of our citizens known as abolitionists; but that it pervades, more or less, the great body of the people, many of whom, like myself, have never fraternized with that, perhaps honest, but certainly misguided party. But this is not all. By adopting such harsh and restrictive measures, you virtually increase the power of the abolitionists to do evil. You strengthen their cords, by driving men into their ranks, who have heretofore never entertained a feeling or sentiment in common with them. And instead of allaying you increase the excitement upon this question, ten-fold beyond what it is now, or ever has been. Shall we do this?—or shall we not rather pour oil upon the troubled waters, and endeavor to calm the raging elements? Surely, sir, there is enough of disquietude throughout the country connected with this dark and exciting subject of niggerology, without our unnecessarily increasing it by the passage of this act of expatriation, and confiscation.

Sir, as a nation we are now passing through a crisis, big with the future destiny of this Republic; and it behooves every true patriot to act with the utmost prudence—for one false step may plunge us into the yawning gulf that now opens at our feet. The time was, sir, and surely within the recollection of the oldest inhabitant here, when it was considered treasonable for any man to talk about a dissolution of the Union, even as a remote probability, or uncertain contingency. But now it is come to be talked about daily, as a fixed fact, unless this or that real or imaginary evil shall be speedily removed or abated. Why, sir, you can scarcely open a paper from Maine to Mississippi, but you will find them teeming with dark and ominous presages of impending evil, growing out of the action of the last session of Congress on the different phases of this negro question. The South are perfectly outraged at the admission of California as a free State, and the abolition of the slave trade in the District of Columbia, and threaten at once to withdraw from the Union. While the North is equally incensed at the passage of the Fugitive Slave bill, and swear by all that is sacred to resist the operations of the law, by all the means within their power.

But suffer me to trespass upon your patience for a few moments, while I read a few extracts which I have gathered up within the last day or two, and which I now present to you as a fair sample of that wild fanaticism pervading the country, on both sides of Mason and Dixon's line.

The Charleston (S. C.) Mercury, the leading Democratic paper of that State says:

"The Union cannot be saved. It is not worth the saving, though it could be done by turning on one's heel. It is a confederacy of sections, not of States,—their bonds of affection are all burnt away, and the passions that have swept on this consuming course, now form an impassable gulf between them. No earthly power can save this confederacy from dissolution."

At an enthusiastac Disunionist Demonstration at Abbeyville, Henry county, Alabama, resolutions were unanimously adopted declaring it the firm conviction of those there assembled,

"That a secession by the Southern States from the confederacy is the rightful and efficient remedy, unless our constitutional rights of equality in the Union are restored, and in future properly respected."

And the assembling of the next Nashville Convention was hailed as the first step towards the "Withdrawal of their delegated authority and rights from the Union which has ceased to answer the ends for which it was established, and become an engine of robbery and oppression."

Mississippi.—The Free Trader published at Natchez, Miss., says, the people there are ready for secession—come what may. "Let a majority vote for us," the Editor exclaims, "and then we will see who will fight."

The Republican, a paper published at Woodville, Mississippi, says:

"We must and will secede from this Union. Either we must submit to disgrace and soon to Abolition, with all its horrors, or we must prevent it. There is but one way to prevent it, and that is by secession."

"The North have a magazine of combustibles among themselves. The Southern slaveholders have the torch. Fire the train. "Fight not HANNIBAL on the plains of Italy, but carry the war into Africa."

The Rev. Mr. Colquitt, of Georgia, recommends that the people of the South march "with coffins on their backs," up to the line of 36-30 and there resist, even unto death the further encroachments of Free-Soilism.

So much, Mr. President, for the Southern view of the picture. And now let us for a moment contemplate the other side:

"At Cleveland, Ohio, for instance, a large public meeting was held last week, at which three Rev'd Clergymen made speeches. One denounced the law in strong terms, and said that 'no force could ever compel him to obey it'—and another Rev'd Doctor of Divinity is reported as saying, that 'the sufferings complained of by the American colonies, of which 4th of July orators talked so much, were mint juleps, compared with this melted lead, which Congress now attempts to force down our throats. He would go to the stake sooner than to obey this law."

Among the resolutions, which this public meeting swallowed with the relish of 'mint juleps,' are the following:

Resolved, That 'resistance to Tyrants is obedience to God,' and that we will obey God by resisting, even unto prison and death if it need be, the operation of this latest born of despotism and tyranny, the infamous fugitive law. That we will not obey its mandates, because, 1st, they are unconstitutional, being not only unauthorized by that instrument, but a flagrant violation of all the privileges and immunities guaranteed to us by it: 2d, that law is unjust, wicked, and oppressive, and in violation of that 'higher law' which is above all human constitutions.

Resolved, That said law is the crowning act of infamy, and cannot be equalled by any previous legislation of our country, and we brand all those who had any agency in its passage, who shall assist in its execution, or who counsel obedience to its mandates, as traitors to God and humanity.

And finally it was unanimously

Resolved, That in case any fugitive Slaves should be captured in this city, that the alarm shall be given by cries in the streets and the ringing of the bells.

A large public meeting, called by the Free Soilers, was recently held at Faneuil Hall, in Boston, to denounce the Fugitive Law and those that support it. Violent and denunciatory speeches were made, and resolutions were adopted by acclamation, of which the following, the last of the series, is a fair specimen:

Resolved, That, law or no law, constitution or no constitution, no man, who once sets his foot on the sacred soil of Massachusetts, shall be carried away from it a slave."

And is it possible, sir, that such treasonable doctrines as this can emanate from Faneuil Hall, that time-honored cradle of liberty, to which we are wont to look for a noble and patriotic devotion to the honor and interests of our country.

But enough of this. I have not patience to read more—although I have plenty of the same sort left. Such manifestations of hostility to the existing laws and institutions of our country are hurtful in the extreme. They are disloyal in their character, and revolutionary in their tendency; and whether emanating from the North or the South, deserve alike our severest reprehension.

And now, Mr. President, in view of these conflicting and discordant elements, which seem to portend disaster to this Republic, what is our duty as patriots—as lovers of our country? Shall we not say to our brethren of the South, that we desire to cultivate with them the most friendly and amicable relations, instead of seeking to irritate existing sores by manifesting towards them a spirit of retaliation? Shall we not say to them that we will stand by the compromises of the Constitution, which guaranties to them the right of property in their slaves, wherever they may be found, and properly identified and proven? Shall we not say to them in our conventional capacity, that the integrity of this Union shall be maintained at all hazards? And, although there is much in the fugitive slave bill that is obnoxious to public censure, still, as good citizens, we will yield a cheerful obedience to all its requirements, and render all needful facilities to our southern friends, in reclaiming their property according to the forms and requisitions of the law. Let us do this, and much will be done to allay the present feverish excitement at the South. On the other hand, let us deal kindly with the poor colored freeman, who may come among us for shelter and protection. Let us manifest to the world, that we are disposed to respect his rights, and to commiserate his wrongs—and much will be done to disarm the power of political abolitionism at the North, which is now threatening the integrity and peace of this Union, by a reckless opposition to the existing laws and institutions of our country.

Sir, I may be over solicitous in regard to this matter, but methinks I see in the signs of the times, much that is calculated to excite alarm. My fears may be the result of a morbid sensibility, but I verily believe that, unless something be done to arrest the evil, this eternal agitation of the slave question, North and South, will ultimately lead to a dissolution of the Union. It has already done, and is still doing more to disturb the fraternal and amicable relations subsisting between the different members of this confederacy, than all other questions which have from time to time agitated the public mind. I verily believe that it has more of the elements of dissolution in it than any other question which has ever been sprung upon the country. It has already gone far in alienating the affections and sympathies of the people of the two extremes—overturning and disrupting the church of God—poisoning the pure fountains of social intercourse, and sapping the very foundations of our glorious Republic. Sir, we are treading upon a volcano, and it behooves us to look well to our ways before we are overwhelmed with the burning lava. You may talk about the strength and the power of this mighty government of ours; but let one of those little sisters that now form the great family of States, secede from the Union, and the whole body politic will be convulsed to its very centre. Break but one link in the grand chain that now binds us together as a confederated government, and the whole will fall asunder, like a rope of sand. Remove but one of those beautiful Corinthian pillars that now sustain and uphold our grand Constitutional edifice, and the whole superstructure will tumble into ruin. Aye, sir, whenever the destroying angel shall take his pencil, dipped in blood, and strike from the bright emblazonry of our country's banner, one single star that now twinkles in the bright constellation, he will not cease from his work of desolation, until the whole shall be obliterated, and we have nothing left but the torn and tattered fragments of our once glorious ensign.

But what shall we say of that insidious miner, that may be found at work beneath the glorious fabric reared and embellished by our forefathers? What shall we say of that damned and double traitor; who could seek to circumvent and overthrow the noble work of their hands? I remarked awhile ago, sir, that it was one of the fundamental principles of our government, that punishment should be proportioned to the nature of the offense. In England it is high treason, and punishable with death, to imagine the death of the king. With us, to afford aid and comfort to the common enemy, is treason against the State, and punishable with death. But, what shall be the meed of punishment to that arch-traitor who could rudely lay his unholy hands upon the pillars of the Constitution, to tear it down? Who could wickedly seek to uproot the foundations of this government, and rend asunder the ligature that now binds us together as a free, a happy, and a prosperous nation? Sir, had he a thousand lives to lose, and a thousand deaths to suffer—and for each he should suffer as much as when a thousand giants die, the whole together would be a poor atonement, a miserable expiatory sacrifice, compared with the immeasurable turpitude of his crime. Ah! sir, a thousand deaths to him would be sheer mercy—and I would not thus seek to mitigate his sufferings. But rather would I let him suffer the fate of that unfortunate Jew, who was cursed with a perpetual existence. I would let him be a lone wanderer in the earth: always seeking death, but never finding it. I would have him driven out from the abode of civilization, by the indignant frowns of his countrymen—and should he seek to take refuge in the deep recesses of the forest, may he be driven thence by beasts of prey. Should he seek to bury himself in the dark caverns of the earth, may he be driven thence by the hissing of serpents. Should he seek to plunge himself beneath the bosom of the mighty deep, may his angry billow cast him back upon some barren and inhospitable shore. And when years and ages shall have rolled away, and he is still a lone wanderer in the earth, calling in vain upon the rocks and the mountains to fall upon and hide him—when the lightning of heaven shall continue to play around him, searing his eye-balls with its lurid glare, and yet consume him not—when the thunder-bolts shall break upon him, and crush him not—when the undying worm shall continue to prey upon his vitals, and yet he still lives on!—when the earth shall still refuse him a home—the sun his light—the dust a grave—and Heaven her God—then may he feel—then may he know, what it is to bear the bitter and undying curse due to his perfidy!

Mr. President, I dislike to leave this subject with the horrid drapery I have thrown around it, and fain would I present you with a more bright and cheerful picture of our country and her ultimate destiny. Would to Heaven that I could cast the horoscope of the future—that I could lift the veil, and looking down through the dim vista of coming time, present to your view this bright, "this smiling land, that freedom calls her own," teeming with its countless and happy millions, and still going on in her career of greatness and renown, like a giant rejoicing to run his course.—Happy in all her associations, prosperous in all her relations, and free in all the essential elements of liberty. I would fain spread out before you the grand panorama of a country, swelling and expanding into one of the mightiest Republics that ever shook the earth; mighty in extent—mightier in numbers—but mightier far in the moral excellence and grandeur of her political and civil institutions. I would throw out in the perspective, her broad map, chequered with a thousand channels of intercommunication, tending to cement the different members of this grand confederacy, in a holy bond of brotherhood, that the malign spirit of faction might not be able to sever. I would present you with a view of her mighty commerce, extending to the ends of the earth—while her broad stripes and bright stars are honored and respected in every sea and on every continent. But superior to all, and infinitely above all, I would point you to the proud structure of a noble and beneficent Government, deriving its power from the will of the people, and seeking alone to promote their good—throwing the panoply of its protection over all the industrial interests of the country, and extending the arms of its benevolence to all its subjects; upholding, securing, and protecting, the rights and privileges of the weak, as well of the dusky sons of Africa, whose unhappy lot has been cast among us, as of the tawny savage who roams at will his native forest.

Such is the picture which I would fain present to your minds on this occasion. But it is not given to me to do so—for clouds and thick darkness still hover around our political horizon. But may I not hope, sir, in conclusion, that when you and I shall have numbered our days, and are about to penetrate the dark arcana of that unknown existence that lies beyond this narrow bound; when our eyes shall be turned for the last time to behold the setting sun, and our thoughts may be permitted to reach forward to the future destiny of our beloved country, O, then, may we be enabled to tear away the phantasy of disunion and desolation that now stamps its horrid impress on the brain, and dream alone of a future, glad with the sunlight of glory and of freedom.

TUESDAY, Nov. 19, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. HULL.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

There being no reports from committees,

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The PRESIDENT announced the first business in order to be the consideration of the section prohibiting negroes from coming into the State and holding property.

The pending question being upon the motion of the gentleman from Vanderburgh (Mr. Lockhart) to amend the instructions,

Mr. MAGUIRE. I desire to make a few remarks upon this subject, because it was one of considerable excitement during the last season in this county, as well as in other parts of the State. Early in the canvass it became a subject of debate among some of the candidates, and of considerable apparent interest to the people. It was a new question to me, and at first I declined saying anything about it, (my sentiments not being specially demanded,) desiring to consider it maturely. I finally, in my public addresses, took the ground that, as in my judgment the Legislature had as much power over the question as the Convention could have, it did not seem to be necessary to insert anything in the Constitution in relation to it. Among other reasons for this I stated, that, as there would undoubtedly be much opposition to the measure in many portions of the State, where the apprehended evil had not been felt, it would greatly increase the vote against the adoption of the new Constitution; and besides, that if the necessity of the measure was so urgent as was represented, the remedy could be applied much earlier by the Legislature, which would meet in December, than under a provision of the new Constitution, which would not be adopted until next summer, and under which, if biennial sessions should be established, measures might not be taken, probably, until the winter of 1852.

But, sir, I am so well satisfied that a large majority of the people of Marion county are opposed to the further immigration of free people of color, and desire a prohibitory clause in the Constitution, that I feel compelled to vote for that part of the proposition which has reference to their immigration. I was sent here to act for them, and I regard it my duty to act on all questions of policy as I suppose or know they would act if they were here. When I know their will, it is the same to me as if I had written instructions.

The excitement to which I have referred arose, in part, from the common report that a large company of colored men had just arrived from North Carolina, some of them said to be old and infirm, and that many more were expected from the same quarter; and apprehensions were entertained that the county was likely to be overrun by that class of people. About the same time, it became known that the State of Kentucky, in her new Constitution, just adopted, had inserted a provision absolutely forbidding the owner of a slave from setting him free unless he would send him without the borders of the State, and making it a penal offense for any free colored man to be found there. Of this act I purpose to speak further after a while. It also became known that a provision was inserted in the new Constitution of Illinois, requiring the Legislature, at its first session, to pass such laws as would prevent them going there. It was moreover believed that the State of Ohio, whose Convention was then in session, would insert in her Constitution a similar provision.

On these accounts it became, in the estimation of the people, a necessary act of self-defense to adopt similar measures in the State of Indiana; and although it may seem to involve a degree of harshness which it were desirable if possible to avoid, yet the blame cannot justly rest upon us. Our people are opposed to slavery; they believe it in every respect an evil; they are opposed to its further extension; and they are in no wise responsible for any of the consequences growing out of it. They, however, demand that proper and efficient steps be taken to compel our sister States where slavery exists to take care of, and provide for, their own free colored people, in their own States, in Liberia, or somewhere else.

Sir, having said thus much in regard to the first clause of the section under consideration, which proposes to prohibit immigration, I desire now to say, that I cannot, unless my opinion shall change on the subject, support a clause to prevent the free people of color now among us from holding or acquiring property. I think we have not the power to do so, and that if we had, it would be alike impolitic, unjust, and inhumane to exercise it. It certainly cannot be sound policy to compel them to become paupers, by destroying all the incentives to industry. I cannot but think that the evils complained of by gentlemen, growing out of their residence amongst us, would be much enhanced by a measure of that sort. I have had no instructions from those whom I represent to go any further than is proposed in the first clause of the section, and, so far as I know their opinions, they concur with me that it would be unjust and impolitic to rob the negro of his property either directly or indirectly. Entertaining this opinion, I voted, a few days ago, against laying on the table a proposition made by the gentleman from Gibson, (Mr. Hall,) to amend the section so as not to interfere with the property of the negroes now in the State, and it is my purpose to vote for its adoption.

Mr. President, I have said that I would speak further in regard to the clause in relation to free negroes in the Constitution of Kentucky. Kentucky is the land of my birth and education—the land where reposes the dust of my ancestors, where almost all my near relations still reside, and the land of many early and fondly cherished recollections. I admire Kentucky as the adopted State of that illustrious Statesman, whose fame, co-extensive with the boundaries of civilization, and the knowledge of human freedom, will be as imperishable and undying as the love of liberty. I admire her as the native land of that other less distinguished but accomplished

Statesman whose public career has shed a lustre upon our country's history. I admire her as the land of Daviess, and Owen, and Allen, and Shelby, and Scott, and Hardin—as the land familiarly known as the “dark and bloody ground,” which, by the valor, self-denial, and suffering of Daniel Boone and his associates, was rescued from the savage, and has become the dwelling-place of a generous, hospitable, chivalric, and prosperous people. I admire her, sir, for all these and other things, but I am bound to say that in my opinion the act of her recent Convention, in relation to free negroes, places a deep stain upon her hitherto bright and glorious character, which nothing can wipe out except measures to provide, in some effectual way, for the comfort and support of that unfortunate race. Sir, what has she done? Why sir in the middle of the 19th century, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-nine—when the whole country was looking to her with confidence that she would set an example of liberality and humanity worthy of imitation by her sister States of the south—when from her peculiar position the friends of humanity every where looked to her for the commencement of a gradual system of emancipation, coupled with provisions for colonization—that hitherto patriotic commonwealth inserts in her organic law, a law which cannot be altered or repealed without the calling of a Convention, the following section:

“The General Assembly shall pass laws providing that any free negro or mulatto hereafter immigrating to, or being emancipated in, and refusing to leave this State, or having left shall return and settle within this State, shall be deemed guilty of felony, and punished by confinement in the Penitentiary thereof.”

Sir, the State of Kentucky cannot enforce such a provision. Public sentiment will revolt at its execution, and it must remain forever a dead letter if the free States shut them up to the necessity of taking care of their own colored people. In what light would the enforcement of such a provision place them before the world? Can it be tolerated, that the people of that or any other State shall wear out the colored man in servitude, and then set him free when he is unable to make a living by labor, and compel him to leave the State, or be subjected to confinement in the Penitentiary? The object and intent of the provision was undoubtedly to compel the free colored man, when liberated from slavery, to take refuge in the free States; and hence arose the excitement in this State on the subject. Is it at all surprising then that some alarm should be felt under the prospect of an extensive immigration from Kentucky and other slave States of that kind of a population, and that some measures should be demanded for its remedy?

Virginia too, Mr. President, has been recently moving in this matter. Her State Convention recently adopted several resolutions of inquiry in relation to negroes and mulattoes, and among others the following:

Resolved, That a committee of — members be appointed to inquire into the expediency of inserting a clause in the constitution, declaring void all laws now in force, by which slaves who may hereafter be emancipated, and their descendants, may be permitted to remain within the limits of this Commonwealth—to restrain the legislative department of the government from passing any law granting permission to any such emancipated slave, or his or her descendants to remain within the Commonwealth—and to provide that it shall be competent to the Legislature to pass laws for the removal of free negroes and mulattoes beyond the limits of this Commonwealth, either with or without the consent of said free negroes or mulattoes.

This resolution was adopted by 100, to 20, and proposes, if carried out in the Constitution, most effectually to drive out the free people of color.

The gentleman from Lagrange, (Mr. Howe,) to whom I always listen with great pleasure, made an ingenious and able argument the other day, to show that we had not the constitutional power to prohibit such immigration into the State. His argument, however, if I understood him correctly, applied only to those States whose free colored people are recognized as citizens, and whom he contended we could not prohibit from settling among us without a violation of the Constitution of the U. S., which provides that “the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.” I believe he did not contend that the power did not exist to prevent the emigration of those who are not recognized as citizens in the States from which they immigrate. If that be a correct distinction it makes but little difference practically, whether the argument be sound or not, as it is not probable that we shall be much troubled with immigrants of this description from those States where they have the immunities of citizenship. The main object, unquestionably, of those who drafted and reported the section under consideration was to have effect upon such as reside in slave States, and whom those States, by their stringently laws, are endeavoring to force upon us.

My view of the question under consideration then, Mr. President, is that we are justified, by the conduct of other States, both slave and free, in adopting proper and constitutional measures to protect ourselves against the influx of a colored population worn out in slavery, and if possible, to compel those who have had the benefit of their toil and labor, to take care of and provide for them, either at home or in Liberia; but that beyond this, I am not satisfied it would be proper to go in our organic law. Beyond this I believe no State has yet gone. I suppose it to be sound doctrine that the people, through the Legislature, can exercise any power not forbidden by the State Constitution, and not in violation of the Constitution of the United States. If I am correct in this, the Legislature will have as much power as this Convention possesses to take such further steps in relation to this matter, as, in the calm and deliberate judgment of the people, may be demanded by further exigencies, and consistent with humanity and justice. If one Legislature should do wrong, the next or some subsequent one may remedy it, but whatever is placed in the Constitution is permanent and can only be changed by the call of a Convention.

Mr. President, permit me to say in conclusion, that it is certainly very desirable that this Convention, whose session will have been so long continued, whose labors will have been so arduous, and whose expenses will necessarily have been so considerable, should send forth a Constitution which shall be adopted by the people of Indiana. In order to this it is surely advisable not to crowd into that instrument questions of doubtful policy, over which the Legislature has complete control. There are various reforms called for by the people, in relation to some of which there is almost entire unanimity, and in reference to others there is but little difference of opinion. Among these are the election of Supreme and Circuit Judges, State officers, &c., by the people; the application of fines and forfeitures to common school education; biennial sessions of the Legislature; the prevention of special and hasty Legislation; a reform in the judicial system; a limitation in the length of terms of offices, &c. Shall the adoption of the new Constitution, and all these reforms be jeopardized by the insertion of provisions which are fit subjects of legislation, and which will compel large masses of the people to vote against it, when otherwise they would have been pleased to give it their support. I think, sir, that this suggestion is worthy of the deliberate consideration of the Convention.

Mr. MORRISON of Washington then rose and said—

Mr. PRESIDENT: If I could justify myself before my constituents and this Convention, I would not depart from the rule which I had prescribed for myself: that is, to cast a silent vote on all subjects; but it appears to me that the question now before us has assumed such a shape as to compel me, in this instance, to ask the indulgence of the Convention for a very few moments, while I give the reasons why I shall vote to exclude the negroes from further immigration into this State, and also to divest them of the right of acquiring real property hereafter.

We all profess to be the friends of humanity, yet we differ, honestly, I presume, as to the plan by which we would secure our title to this distinguished appellation. Those who favor the immigration of free persons of color to this

State, and contend for their right to hold real estate, seem to forget that the negro's home is in the land of his fathers, where he may enjoy all the rights and immunities of a free man, which he can never hope to attain in this country, unless the two races are permitted to amalgamate.

Sympathy is diverse. There is a sympathy of the head as well as a sympathy of the heart. The former is the dictate of reason and judgment; the latter, of feeling and passion. In all grave questions like the present, it behooves every man to determine for himself how far his judgment and his votes may be influenced by the one or by the other. For my own part, if I could persuade myself that it is the will of Heaven that the two races should amalgamate, then would I be willing to hold out every inducement to the blacks to sojourn amongst us. I would advocate their right, not only to political, but social equality. But I do not thus interpret the indications of Providence. Ethiopia is stretching out her arms, and Africa's sable sons are to be regenerated, and civilized, and Christianized, through the instrumentality of their oppressed and down-trodden brethren in this boasted land of freedom and independence. And so surely as the selling of Joseph by his brethren to Egyptian merchants, though intended for evil, was overruled for good, just so surely will the bondage and oppression of the African race in this country be overruled for the benefit of the entire race in their native country. Already a voice from Africa comes to us, and calls upon us for knowledge and civilization. The beacon lights are now seen all along the western coast, and the unutterable enormities of the inhuman slave trade stand unveiled before the whole civilized world.

Who that has paid any attention to the signs of the times, does not see that these United States are to be employed in the great work of diffusing the blessings of liberty and equal laws throughout the habitable globe? Can it be possible that the arm of the oppressor is never to be stayed? that the countless millions that inhabit Africa are forever to remain in ignorance and slavery, and idolatry? that the benign influences of Christianity are never, never to be felt in all the length and breadth of that dark and savage land?

Mr. President, for my part I can see in the determination of the questions before us, the mysterious workings of an overruling Providence.

Through the instrumentality and persevering efforts of the Colonization Society, organized more than thirty years ago, a flourishing colony of free blacks has been established in Liberia, and an independent government has been formed, which has been recognised by France, England, and Prussia. This colony has, at this very moment, not less than eighty thousand of the natives enrolled as citizens of the Republic, and all this has been accomplished in the face of the most bitter opposition from the abolitionists, who claim to be the only true friends of the poor African in this country. You, sir, have not forgotten the lamentations which were uttered in certain quarters in behalf of the poor Indians, when this Government, a few years ago, recommended the policy of securing for them a permanent home west of the Mississippi, where they might be permitted to pursue the arts of peace, unmolested by the encroachments of the white man. And so it has been in the case of the negro. He has been urged to turn a deaf ear to the invitations to remove to the land from whence he was torn. He has been made to believe that certain death awaited him as soon as he set foot upon his native shores. He has been told that here he had a right to stay—that this was the land of freedom,—and that here and here only he might expect, one day, to be admitted to all the rights and immunities of a freeman. It is not contended, I believe, by those who take the opposite side of this question, that the negro can ever attain, in this country, to a social equality with the whites, though he may be invested with certain political rights, and yet there is no good reason you why should withhold from him the former if you confer upon him the latter. Then, sir, if you do not intend to admit them to full citizenship, why do you induce them to remain in your midst, when you have determined that they shall never be anything more than hewers of wood and drawers of water? Why deceive them by false promises which you do not intend to fulfil? Why not tell them the plain and naked truth, that the rights of citizenship will never be extended to them here, and if they conclude to remain, let them understand clearly the full extent of their disabilities; and whenever they incline to remove, be ready with the means to assist them in uniting with their brethren in the Republic of Liberia. Depend upon it, the people of this State, whenever called upon, will contribute cheerfully and liberally to restore them to their own native land.

Mr. President, I shall favor that proposition which tends to increase their disabilities, with the confident hope that the results will be most advantageous to themselves. When they discover that they never can be elevated to the rank of citizens amongst us, then, and not until then, will they feel that their own welfare, as well as the redemption of their race, are involved in accepting the proffered bounty of their friends. The Colonization Society, with an annual income which has seldom exceeded fifty thousand dollars, has enabled seven thousand free blacks to emigrate to Liberia, and has purchased from the natives a vast amount of territory extending along the coast not less than seven hundred miles, throughout which the slave trade has been arrested and well nigh destroyed. But if the General Government, aided by the State Governments, should establish the line of steamships which has been recommended to the late Congress by the naval committee, an impulse would be given to the cause of colonization which will put to silence the croakings of those misguided friends of the negro who have, from the very beginning, avowed open hostility to all the plans of this benevolent institution, and thrown every obstacle in the way of its philanthropic operations. This effort of the friends of humanity should be seconded by every well-wisher of the African race—and if it meets with that favor which it certainly merits—the day is not far distant when the oppressed in this land shall be set free, and sent home to enjoy in their own country the blessings and privileges of freemen, and to unite with their brethren in establishing a free and independent government, under the benign protection of which they will be permitted to enjoy life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

Mr. President, I will say in conclusion, lest I should be misunderstood, that I disclaim any intention on my part to compel the free negroes in this State to emigrate to Liberia. Far from it. If they are willing to go, I would aid and encourage them to go, but if they are determined to remain, I would have them understand distinctly that they can never be admitted to a political and social equality with the citizens of this State.

With a view to fortify these positions, I ask the further indulgence of the Convention to read a few short extracts from the report of the naval committee, made to the House of Representatives of the United States, August, 1850.

“The committee here beg leave to present some interesting facts which satisfy them that the territory of Liberia is eminently adapted to colored emigrants from the United States; that the establishment of this line of steamships by the Government will be a powerful stimulus to the cause of colonization, and will be the means of securing the emigration of great numbers of free blacks; that the slave trade will be substituted by a peaceful, legitimate, and valuable commerce, opening new sources of enterprise and wealth to our people; and that the civilization and christianization of the whole continent of Africa may be expected eventually to follow. The facts presented are collected chiefly from the publications of the Colonization Society.

“That portion of the western coast of Africa, called Liberia, embraces a tract of country included between the parallels of 4 deg. 21 min., and 7 deg. north latitude, extending about 400 miles along the coast. The first settlement was made by free negroes from the United States, under the auspices of the American Colonization Society, in the year 1820. The objects of that society were—

"1st. To rescue the free colored people of the United States from their political and social disadvantages.

"2d. To place them in a country where they may enjoy the benefits of a free government, with all the blessings which it brings in its train.

"3d. To spread civilization, sound morals, and true religion throughout the continent of Africa.

"4th. To arrest and destroy the slave trade.

"5th. To afford slave owners, who wish, or are willing, to liberate their slaves, an asylum for their reception."

"The funds of this society have seldom exceeded $50,000 per year, but they have purchased territory, enabled nearly 7,000 free people of color to emigrate to Liberia, and have made provision, for such of them as required it, for six months after their arrival. In July, 1847, an independent government was formed, which has been recognised by France, England, and Prussia. Upwards of 80,000 of the natives have become civilized, and enrolled themselves as citizens of the Republic. The Liberians have a flourishing commerce. They have not only succeeded in suppressing the slave trade along their own coast, but have also made treaties with several tribes, numbering over 200,000 souls, for the discontinuance of the traffic. They have purchased their territory from time to time of the natives, and are gradually extending themselves up to the British settlement of Seirra Leone and down to the Gold Coast.

The interior settlements of the purchased tracts usually extend from about ten to thirty miles from the coast, and can easily be enlarged by purchase in that direction at a moderate amount. In no instance have the natives from whom the land was purchased been required to remove their residences. The land in the immediate vicinity of the ocean in Liberia is generally low, and in some places marshy; but there are some elevated spots.

The land generally becomes more elevated towards the interior; and in some places within fifty miles of the coast, it is quite mountainous. It is desirable for the colony to become possessed of this back country as it is much healthier than the coast, and when the emigration from the United States becomes extensive, the mountain region will soon be occupied. The natives are a fine, healthy, athletic race; and even the emigrants to the lands on the coast have enjoyed better health than the emigrants to some of our western States in the first few years of settlement.

Liberia is on the "grain coast," and is protected from the scorching winds of the north and east by ranges of mountains. The soil is fertile, and produces an abundance of Indian corn, yams, plantains, coffee, arrow-root, indigo, dyewoods, &c.

Every emigrant is welcomed to the colony and receives a grant of five acres of land, besides which he can purchase as much more as he pleases at one dollar per acre.

The climate is not suited to the whites. The President and all the officials are colored men. There are flourishing towns, churches, schools, and printing presses. According to the statement of the Rev. R. R. Gurley, who has recently visited the colony, the people are highly moral, well conducted, and prosperous; and the value of the exports of the Republic is at present $500,000 per annum, and is increasing at the rate of fifty per cent annually.

Not only will the slave trade be abolished by the establishment of colonies of free colored people on the coast of Africa, but, as already intimated, these colonies will be the means, at no distant period, of disseminating civilization and Christianity throughout the whole of that continent. Already, a great many of the natives have placed themselves under the protection of the Liberians, whose knowledge of agriculture and the arts inspires confidence and respect.

As a missionary enterprise, therefore, the colonization of Africa by the descendants of Africans on this continent, deserves, and no doubt will receive, the countenance and support of the whole Christian world.

(2.) The establishment of prosperous colonies on the western coast of Africa will, doubtless, tend greatly, in the course of time, to the augmentation of the commerce of this country. It appears that British commerce with Africa amounts to no less than five millions sterling, or about $25,000,000 per annum. The belief is now confidently entertained in Great Britain, that an immense commerce may be opened up with that continent, by putting an end to the slave trade, and stimulating the natives to the arts of peace.

The commerce of Africa is certainly capable of great extension, and it is worthy of observation, that the proposed steamers will open entirely new sources of trade.

On this subject, the committee beg leave to submit the following particulars, from which the future resources of this vast undeveloped region may be, to some extent, anticipated.

Palm oil is produced by the nut of the Palm tree, which grows in the greatest abundance throughout Western Africa. The demand for it, both in Europe and America, is daily increasing. The average import into Liverpool of palm oil for some years past has been at least 15,000 tons, valued at £400,000 sterling.

Gold is found at various points of the coast. It is obtained by the natives by washing the sand which is brought down by the rivers from the mountains. An exploration of the mountains will probably result in the discovery of large quantities of the metal. It is calculated that England has received, altogether, $200,-

000,000 of gold from Africa. Liberia is adjacent to the "Gold Coast."

Ivory is procurable at all points, and constitutes an important staple of commerce.

Coffee, of a quality superior to the best Java or Mocha, is raised in Liberia, and can be cultivated with great ease to any extent. The coffee tree bears fruit from thirty to forty years; and yields an average of ten pounds to the shrub yearly.

Cam wood and other dye woods are found in great quantities in many parts of the country. About thirty miles east of Bassa Cove is the commencement of a region of unknown extent, where scarcely any tree is seen except the cam wood.

Gums of different kinds enter largely into commercial transactions.

Dyes of all shades and hues are abundant, and they have been proved to resist both acids and light.

Pepper, ginger, arrow root, indigo, tamarinds, oranges, lemons, limes, and many other articles which are brought from tropical countries to this, may be added to the list. Indeed, there is nothing in the fertile countries of the East or West Indies which may not be produced in equal excellence in Western Africa.

The soil is amazingly fertile. Two crops of corn, sweet potatoes, and several other vegetables, can be raised in a year. It yields a larger crop than the best soil in the United States. One acre of rich land well tilled, says Governor Ashman, will produce three hundred dollar's worth of indigo. Half an acre may be made to grow half a ton of arrow root.

"An immense market may be opened for the exchange and sale of the innumerable products of the skill and manufactures of our people. Africa is estimated to contain one hundred and sixty millions of inhabitants. Liberia enjoys a favorable geographical position. She is protected by the great Powers of Europe. The Liberians have constitutions adapted to the climate, and a similarity of color with the natives. They will penetrate the interior with safety, and prosecute their trade in the bays and rivers of the coast, without suffering from the diseases which are so fatal to the white man. Liberia is the door of Africa, and is destined to develop the agricultural and commercial resources of that continent, besides being the means of regenerating her benighted millions."

I also beg leave to refer to a few extracts from letters of individuals who have interested themselves in this subject, to the executive committee of the Colonization Society.

Letter from Hon. Elisha Whittlesey, one of the Vice Presidents of the American Colonization Society.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Comptroller's Office, July 20th, 1850.
MATTHEW ST. CLAIR CLARKE, Esq.,
Member of the Ex. Com. Col. Society, Washington.

My attention was first drawn to the subject of African colonization at the annual meeting of the Society in 1823, when listening to the remarks of the Hon. Robert Goodloe Harper, and others. From that time to the present, my belief has been, and now is, that an "all-wise Providence" will accomplish, through the institution of slavery in this country, the civilization and Christianization of Africa, by the agency of this Society and its kindred associations. The Republic of Liberia invites those who wish to give freedom to the human beings they hold in bondage to do so, without any excitement, commotion, or opposition. An acceptance of the invitation violates no right, alarms no fear, wounds no feeling, awakens no jealousy. One party is relieved from a heavy responsibility, and the other enjoys, in the land of their fathers, civil and religious freedom. Every intelligent emigrant from this country is a missionary to, and an instructor of, his brethren. Africa will be Christianized when parts of Asia will be in heathen darkness.

The plan ranks with the most important of those of the interesting age in which we live; and, if patronized by Congress, will richly bless two continents. There has been no colony so prosperous, or that has achieved so much within the same space of time, as the colony of Liberia; and it is a remarkable fact, that during a period of thirty years, since the first expedition was fitted out to Africa, not a life has been lost by shipwreck.

If this Congress shall co-operate in this great national interest, it will stand immortalized on the page of history.

Most sincerely yours,
ELISHA WHITTLESEY.

Letter from the Hon. R. J. Walker, one of the Vice Presidents of the American Colonization Society.

WASHINGTON CITY, July 23, 1850.

I have had no time to examine the details of the plan, but as regards the main question, I most fully concur in the policy of a removal of our free blacks to Liberia, through the instrumentality of steamships, and with the aid of the Government of the United States. The plan presented seems to me free from all constitutional objections. It seems, also, to be perfectly practicable, and its successful execution would confer incalculable blessings upon our country. Indeed, I have ever regarded colonization and abolition as antagonist measures, and that the success of the first would overthrow the latter, and thus rescue our beloved country from the danger of disunion.

Very truly your friend,

R. J. WALKER.

Extract of a letter from Gov. Wright, of Indiana.

INDIANAPOLIS, Ind., July 3d, 1850.

To the Executive Committee of the Col. Society:

GENTLEMEN: Your circular, containing a copy of Mr. Bryan's memorial, came to hand a few days ago, and I have no hesitation in saying that Mr. B's plan, or any other good plan, of forming a line, or lines, of transport to draw off our free people of color, will meet with general favor in our State.

And some movement of the kind is much needed; for the youth of the free States are growing up ignorant of the merits of colonization, and very sceptical as to its final success. This has been produced by the labors of men in the North who have never investigated the subject, and who have poured contempt on all your attempts to colonize—they have been too successful in indoctrinating the youth of the North. A want of faith in the enterprise, or confidence in its final success, will soon paralyze all your efforts in the North; for in a few years the unbelief of our young men will become confirmed, and when they grasp the reins of government, which they will do in the course of time, African colonization will be discarded by the North.

The best remedy that can be devised for the above ignorance and scepticism, among Northern men, will be a bold and decided movement on the part of the General Government, which will look directly toward the separation of the colored race from the white race, and the erection of the colored people into an independent commonwealth.

This movement will confound the opponents of colonization in the North; it will send a thrill of confidence through the hearts of all our friends; it will compel the people to think and talk on the subject of a national colonization enterprise, and it will compel each newspaper in the land to speak out on the subject. Discussion is all we want, for then we can make thousands of friends; in short, we can indoctrinate the nation with our opinions, "and opinion rules the world."

As to Mr. B's plan, we are willing that he and his friends shall have the monopoly of the African trade for a time; but that monopoly should be so guarded as to make it a source of wealth to Liberia, and not a drain on the wealth of that republic, or be calculated to retard her progress. The East India Company has been a stupendous leech on British India, from which it has drawn untold millions, and under whose management India must become impoverished, and made dependent on England.

I know of no enterprise of this age that we, as Americans, should be so willing to take hold of as one man, with nerve and energy, as that of the settlement of Liberia.

As one citizen of this nation, I would be willing to make all my contributions, and devote the last dollar of my means, to the colonization of the black man of this country to Liberia.

I have the honor to be,

Yours, most respectfully,

JOS. A. WRIGHT.

REV. WILLIAM McLAIN,
Sec. Am. Col. Soc., Washington City.

MR. COOKERLY. I desire to make a remark or two upon this question, and I hope the Convention will indulge me in doing so. I think, sir, the time has come when it will be necessary for us to act upon this question. In my opinion, sir, the people of Indiana are looking for action upon this subject on the part of the Convention—decisive action; and I hope, sir, with the gentleman last upon the floor, (Mr. ———,) that no member will be deterred from doing his duty fearlessly and promptly.

Sir, it was charged by the gentleman from St. Joseph (Mr. Colfax) that there was a pro-slavery party in this Convention—

MR. COLFAX (interrupting and Mr. C. giving way). I did not say so, Mr. President. I said there was a pro-slavery sentiment in the State, which pandered to the pro-slavery party.

MR. COOKERLY. The gentleman's explanation does not better the matter.

MR. COLFAX (in his seat). It is the truth, however.

MR. COOKERLY (continuing). Sir, in my opinion, there is no such feeling in this body. In my opinion, we can have no occasion here to pander for the pro-slavery sentiment. There is no more occasion for such a thing in this State than there is for a feeling in favor of slavery itself. No man here would pander to the slave power, nor have anything else to do with it, unless it were for the sake of the preservation of this Union.

The gentleman from St. Joseph has asked, with a sneer upon his face: Is this a South Carolina Convention? I answer: It is not; but it is a Convention composed of the freemen of Indiana, convened here to alter and amend the Constitution of the State, and re-arrange the organic law.

And now, Mr. President, supposing that we adopt a section to read in this way: That the General Assembly, at their first session under the amended Constitution, shall pass a law to prohibit negroes and mulattoes from coming into this State. Do you think the General Assembly would regard such an injunction. Sir, if we pass upon anything with reference to this matter, I say, let us adopt something that will be effective. Let us not say that the General Assembly shall prohibit negroes; for I tell you, sir, they will not do it; and it is my judgment that we ought either to adopt something stringent upon this subject, or nothing at all.

Gentlemen seem to be surprised that we should think to declare that negroes and mulattoes shall not acquire property in the State. They look upon it as a horrible idea—an outrage upon common justice, and an infringement of vested rights. But I contend that it is not. I contend that we have a right to prohibit them from coming in, in self defense; and to prohibit them from acquiring property under the law. The object of such a course of legislation is not to oppress the black race. Not at all; but to induce them not to remain amongst us; to show them at once that they never can acquire any more rights than they have, so long as they may remain here, and that those rights which they now have shall be abridged.

Even those gentlemen who oppose this measure, admit that the blacks and whites cannot live together in the same community to the advantage of both races. They admit this, while, at the same time, they are opposed to the adoption of any measure which would induce the blacks to go to their native Africa; and it is plain, that, so long as we have this eternal outcry that we legislate against the rights of negroes, we never shall get rid of them. There are some gentlemen, who, instead of adopting measures by which we might get rid of this race, would do almost anything in their power to prevent such a desirable result, and induce them to remain amongst us.

The gentleman from St. Joseph asserted that there was a party in this State who were pandering to the power of the slavery sentiment. I might in reply charge that gentleman with pandering here to the power of the free soil sentiment. But I shall not do it, because I will not so far impugn the motives of any gentleman.

Sir, I am in favor of the section as originally reported by the committee. I go the whole hog in this matter. I want no child's play; and I call upon the friends of this measure to hang together, and if they intend to do anything, to do it at once, and do it right. Let us not permit ourselves to be drawn away from our duty by such sermons as that delivered yesterday by the gentleman from Hendricks (Mr. Nave). Now, it is contended that this clause will deprive the children of negroes and mulattoes, already amongst us, from the right to inherit real estate by descent. But I contend that it does not. If it did, I would go against it; because it would destroy vested rights. But it cannot have that effect.

I would ask gentlemen: How are we to prohibit negroes from coming into the State? Should the Legislature pass a law to put a free negro or mulatto in the jail of the county, or confine him in the penitentiary, for the offense of coming into the State, the moment such a law were attempted to be put in force, that very moment, the freemen of Indiana would rise up in arms against it. What, then, shall we do? Should we say to them that they shall never be able to acquire real estate here? It will probably be as much as two years before the amended Constitution can go into effect, and by that time, in all probability, the State will be flooded with this class of people, and the object intended to be effected by the provision will be entirely obviated.

There are many gentlemen, probably, who do not feel the same interest in this question which I do, and which I know to be the feeling of my county. We have, I suppose, some twenty-three hundred negroes in our county who have not proved themselves to be very good citizens and neighbors, and we want to get rid of them; not by any act of oppression, but by fair and honorable means.

The gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) says, if we permit these people to come in amongst us, we should also allow them the right to acquire and hold real estate, and by this means raise up more men, who would become defenders of the country in war. But, sir, are the holders of real estate exclusively the defenders of the country? No, sir, it is to the poor men who are not very often capable of acquiring real estate, to whom we are to look chiefly as the defenders of our country and our country's rights; so that this argument against the section must fall to the ground.

I will say then, sir—defining my position—that I am in favor of the section as reported by the committee, and if I cannot get that, then I shall be in favor of making as fair a compromise as possible. I do not know at this time that I would object to submitting this section as a separate proposition to the people, to say whether or not it shall be adopted into the Constitution. For I believe that a majority of the people are not only in favor of prohibiting negro immigration, but that they would prohibit that class of people from the enjoyment of many other rights which are claimed for them.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley next obtained the floor, but he yielded immediately for—

EXPLANATION.

Mr. RARIDEN. I have not the least disposition to steal the thunder or the arguments of any individual in this body. I find, sir, in today's Journal, under my name, and credited to me by the printer or some body else, a speech which I never delivered. I believe the speech was made by the gentleman from Wells (Mr. Bascom). I do not want to borrow the speech of any gentleman for I always make enough of my own.

Mr. BASCOM. I called upon the Reporter and requested him to make the necessary corrections. I certainly have no desire that the gentleman from Wayne should be represented as making that speech.

Mr. RARIDEN. No, sir, I do not impute any such desire to the gentleman.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark that when gentlemen find themselves misrepresented, it is a matter between them and the Reporter, over whom the Convention has no control. The time of the Convention, therefore, should not be occupied with corrections of the reports. The gentleman from Ripley will proceed with his remarks:

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I do not rise for the purpose of defining my position and making a speech, but for the purpose of talking about what I understand to be the question before us; the question of reference. I believe the first question is upon the motion to refer the entire proposition to a select committee of one from each Congressional District, with a view of bringing the subject back again sometime during the course of the session, in some shape which might be more acceptable to its friends.

I would remark, however, that this question is one upon which every gentleman would wish to set himself right before the country, and therefore, I am not surprised to see gentlemen rising in every quarter of the house for this purpose. The proposition involves the settlement of a great principle, affecting not only our own interests, but the interests of those who are to come after us; therefore it becomes important, and should be duly weighed and considered. I confess, myself, that I have scarcely made up my mind with regard to the course which I shall pursue. The subject was not canvassed in my county. It was spoken of by a single individual who was a candidate in the field with me, and who obtained some few votes, but I did not canvass the question, and I have been listening here to the speeches of gentlemen for the purpose of learning something about it, but I discover that the confusion in their mind is becoming more confused—the further gentlemen pursue their investigations the greater the difficulty in my mind. For this reason, I am in favor of the motion to refer the subject to a committee. And when I say that I believe this question should be again referred, I mean no disrespect whatever to the committee whence the section came originally, for I believe that committee to be a very able and judicious one. But allow me to make this remark: that the section has come to us from a most inappropriate committee; for can any man doubt that if we adopt this section it must, to some extent, infringe the natural and inherent rights of men, if they happen to be black. I understand that it is the peculiar province of this committee to ascertain what are the natural and inherent rights of the inhabitants of the State of Indiana, and not to infringe upon those rights. This section, then, has come from a very inappropriate committee, and therefore I would change the reference. But if it cannot go to a select committee, I would give it to the committee on miscellaneous provisions, so that if it must come in to the Constitution, it would come in under its appropriate head, and where it would not be the first thing to meet the eye. I would not prefer to place such a provision as this upon the very first page of the Constitution. But further, as to the propriety of this reference. We perceive that there are still very serious difficulties rising up in the minds of gentlemen, in connection with this subject. The remark of the gentleman last up is certainly true—that you must do something that will be efficient. You must take the lion by the beard. You must take care to apply the penalty for the infraction of your laws. The simple declaration that negroes and mulattoes shall not come into the State, will never prevent them from coming, so long as they shall be hunted down for their lives and their liberties in the adjoining States. What has been done with reference to the rights of this class of people in the State of Kentucky? Why, sir, the enjoyment of liberty by this class of people has been made a felony there; and if you say merely, in your Constitution, that these people shall not come into the State of Indiana, do you think that the mere declaration will prevent them? I tell you it will not, so long as they come here to prevent themselves from being sold again into slavery, or incarcerated in the penitentiary. Therefore, adopting the language of the gentleman, I say to you that you must take the "bull by the horns"—you must affix a penalty to your law which shall be dreaded and more horrid than the oppression which these people suffer elsewhere. Not only that they shall not hold land—not only that they shall not have the right of domicile—but you must say to them that they shall not breathe the air of our State and live. That will be the only sufficient penalty which will keep them away; and why? Because to keep them out of the State you must inflict a penalty more to be dreaded than the oppression which drives them here. You need not think to keep them out by confinement in the jail or penitentiary, or by taking away from them the right to hold land. What do the negroes care for land? You find them generally clustering about your cities and towns. They do not come here after land. Therefore you must make your penalty stronger than the oppression which is designed to drive them out of the slave States.

For this reason, also, I am in favor of giving ourselves some respite from the consideration of this subject, to give ourselves time to think of it and look the proposition fairly in the face. I would say, take the subject away from the committee on the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of the State, and give it into the hands of a select committee of its friends, if it has any, and let them look over the whole ground, and let them look especially at the appropriate penalty. For if you merely give authority to the Legislature to pass a law on this subject, you will throw out the most exciting and dangerous matter of strife and contention that was ever cast before any community. Why, sir, there are hundreds of men in this State, who would stand up before the country, and discuss and denounce such a proposition, week after week, telling the people that they never should swear to support a Constitution, which contains it. If you require the Legislature to pass a law prohibiting this people from coming amongst us, such a requisition implies the power to impose such a penalty as will keep them away. I say, therefore, that the Convention themselves should look this matter in the face; they should propose the law, and affix the penalty, and not leave for those who are to come after us, to do the foul deed, if foul it be. For I assure you, that though you may direct this to be done, the Legislature will not do it, without imperative instructions from the people, and by it you will throw such a question before the people as will convulse the whole State, and greatly endanger, if not defeat the adoption of the Constitution. For that reason I insist that the question should be referred. Not on account of what we propose to do in the premises, for we propose to do right when the question comes up in a tangible form, but in order that we may do what we can, without infringing upon the laws of humanity, towards preventing these people from coming amongst us.

For myself, if I could speak, so as to keep them all out of the State, I would say, they should never come in amongst us; and I would say it now. But a great deal more is to be done, than has been thought of here. You must inflict stronger penalties. You must say to the people, you shall not rent your land to these people, you shall not harbor them nor feed them. These will be some of the laws which it will be necessary to enforce against these people; and I say to you now, that, whenever you invade any right, belonging to the people, you will strike a cord of sympathy, which will be felt throughout the State. Whenever you make a law that we shall not feed these unfortunate people, under the penalty of presentment, or indictment and fine; and whenever a man shall be brought into court, under a presentment, or indictment, of this kind, and shall stand up and plead his cause and say, "This man came to my house. He was starving! He begged of me bread; I gave it to him, and he did eat." How then under such circumstances, could you enforce a penalty of this kind upon any man? You cannot do it. I tell you, sir, I would feed the starving man, if black as Pluto. The dog does not live, that I would not feed, if I knew he were starving. Your penalties would never quench these irresistible sympathies of the people of Indiana. [Applause.] I have too much confidence in their humanity, to believe they would suffer even a black man to die at their door for want of food.

But, sir, if you will do this thing, I must conjure you again, not to call in the aid of the General Assembly, which is to come after you; but take the lion by the beard; bring up your penalties, and let us look them in the face; and know precisely what we have to do. Let the whole matter be referred again to a committee of its friends; let them make the best they can of it. And if, they have outraged humanity in Kentucky; if they have declared the enjoyment of liberty to be a felony; and if it is proposed that their example be followed here; let every thing be fairly proposed, and let us look the matter full in the face.

I hope the subject may be referred; and then, if gentlemen are willing to look over the whole ground, I will go with them as far as possible in the premises; but I cannot consent to outrage the laws of humanity, of nature, and of God, "until we have time to make better."

Mr. GOOTEE said: It has been very justly remarked by the gentleman who has just taken his seat, that this is a very important and delicate question, upon which every man is desirous of defining his position before the Convention. I propose now to define my position; and in doing so, I hope the Convention will indulge, if I should go to some extent into an examination of the question; for it was a matter discussed at great length during the canvass last summer, in the county where I reside. But, at this late stage of the debate, when the subject has been discussed until it is worn out—when it has been examined in so many aspects—when it has been so often turned over and back again—it seems to me that very little should be said beyond what is necessary to set ourselves right before the people; and this is all I shall endeavor to do. I am perfectly willing that those who have heretofore dwelt so loud and long upon this subject, should have full credit for all they may have said, whilst I claim for myself the credit of having been a most attentive listener.

In the first place, Mr. President, I can have no doubt but that public opinion, to some extent, will censure the Convention for the time which they have already consumed in debate; but I shall not be charged with contributing to this delay; for I have barely done my part of the voting and listening—but scarcely the latter.

I am in agreement with my friend, the gentleman who was up a few minutes ago, (Mr. Cook-erly,) in one respect. I think we want action in this body. I think gentlemen were ready for action long ago. I think most of the members of this body came here ready for action upon this subject. For my part, I have listened to this discussion with a great deal of earnestness, up to this very hour, because I am desirous of getting all the information I can upon this subject: but, Mr. President, I must confess that I came into this body at the first, just as well prepared to vote upon this subject, as I am now. The fact is, I brought my instructions with me. I told the people what I was coming here for, and how I would vote upon this question; and I cannot be drawn away from my adherence to the principles which I laid down before them, by any specious argumentation. Hence it seems to me, that all the learned reasoning and long speeches which we have had upon this subject, will not take very well with the people.

My position with regard to the pending question, is this: I stand pledged before the people, to go for any humane measure by which we may get rid of the blacks, and as soon as possible. If there is any course that can be proposed, by which we can get rid of those we have already amongst us, and prevent further immigration of the blacks, without public dishonor, I am ready to vote for it.

I am decidedly opposed to referring the subject again to a committee. Nothing could be further from my wishes than to agitate this subject any longer. If the matter is to be again reported upon by a committee, it would involve another discussion, and so we would have investigation upon investigation of the same subject, over and over again.

Mr. OWEN. I rise to speak to the question of reference. It did not occur to me, until it was suggested by my friend from Ripley, that it could, in any sense, be construed into a lack of courtesy, toward the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman, and from which this proposition was originally reported,—to refer the whole subject connected with negroes and mulattoes, to a select committee composed of one member from each Congressional district. The gentleman from Floyd, (Mr. Kent), before he presented the resolution for the reference, showed it to me, and told me his object. I cordially approved it. I considered that a committee so constituted would be likely to embody a fair representation of the public opinion of the State. I differ with my friend from Martin, the gentleman who last took his seat, (Mr. Gootee,) who seemed to think that we might save time by refusing to make this reference. The Convention will observe that some five or six different sections have been reported in connection with the subject of negroes and mulattoes, and that these are scattered all over our reports, not standing in one article, in connection. Now, any one who has had experience in legislative bodies, must feel assured that a separate debate will spring up upon every one of these sections, unless we can get them all into one article. We have for the subjects of these several sections, first, the prohibition of negro immigration; next, the question as to their right to hold real estate. Then the question as to their competency as witnesses in courts of justice: then the question as to negro suffrage: and lastly, as connected with all these, the great question of African colonization. Now, sir, these various questions, as the matter now stands, will present themselves, probably, on separate days, and be considered one after another, until we shall dispose of them. I am satisfied, that, in order to save time, (and whatever may be thought of my vote on the half hour rule, there is no gentleman in this Hall, who is more disposed than I to save time, whenever it is not saved at the expense of principle,) this matter ought to be referred to a committee, to be constituted of members taken from different portions of the State; men who will give to so great and grave a question as this, the careful deliberation which it deserves.

The gentleman from Martin, (Mr. Gootee,) has said, (and no doubt with the utmost sincerity,) that he considers himself prepared to vote upon every question that may come up here, without further reflection, and without discussion. All I can say in reply, is, that that is not my case. Whenever I approach a subject like this, connected as it is, with great measures of public policy, and with a subject which now agitates the minds of the people, not merely of this State—not merely of the United States, but throughout the world—whenever I approach the policy of the separation of the two races,—the question of a homo-geneous race—I feel the difficult character of the questions: how may we best attain this object?—by what means, yet not too harsh, can we effect this separation? It is a great and a grave inquiry, how shall all this be done in the best manner? Other gentlemen may say that they are prepared to decide it; and that they know exactly what these means ought to be.

For myself, I am not yet prepared. On the policy of separation, I made up my mind long ago: but the means, the details, the penalties, if any; these are the practical difficulties. I desire to have the subject referred to a select committee, and to see their report; for everything connected with the subject of negroes and mulattoes, in the present state of public opinion in our State, is beset with difficulty, let us decide it as we may.

There is another consideration, connected with this subject—the Constitutional question, to which I hope the committee will give their best judgment. I regretted seriously, yesterday, to see the observations of the gentleman from Lagrange, (Mr. Howe,) cut short by the half hour rule. It seemed to me like cutting in two a demonstration of one of the problems of Euclid: and, if I had been disposed then, and there, to have replied to that gentleman, I should have felt myself utterly embarrassed in so doing, on account of the imperfect state in which the fall of your hammer, at the close of the half hour, left his argument.

There is one thing which I hope the committee will avoid—a matter which has been before complained of—I mean the error of getting two or more subjects into one section. In the arrangement of the article to be reported, every distinct subject should have a separate section, so that any gentleman, by demanding a separate vote upon each section, may have a chance of voting on a single proposition at a time.

I shall not, on this occasion, enter further into consideration of the subject; but, at the proper time, if the reference is carried, when the report shall come in from the select committee, so that we can have something tangible and definite before us—may know exactly what we are debating, and upon what question we have to vote aye or no;—I hope then, to have an opportunity of addressing the Convention.

I have said, with regard to another subject—the subject of the rights of married women—which has recently occupied our attention, that no one of greater importance would be likely to come up for consideration. I might say the same now. Of more importance than a question involving the rights to property, of one-half of our citizens, no other subject can well be. But of equal importance, I believe this subject is; equal in its influence on the prosperity of the State of Indiana, and her destiny through a long future, for good or for evil.

Mr. FOSTER. A few days since, Mr. President, I submitted a few remarks upon the section still in debate. I had no intention to speak further during the pendency of this question. The views that I then expressed and the course which I declared that I was prepared to take, and should take, were in conformity with my views of what was my duty to my constituents, as well as my own individual opinions in the matter. I believed it good policy, and I still contend that the best policy that, as a State, we can adopt in regard to the negro population within our borders is, to divest them of the right of acquiring and possessing property in the future—the best policy, to those in other States was to forbid and prohibit their emigration here, and finally, the most practicable, and, at the same time, the most humane course to take with the race generally was, to colonize them upon the shores of their native Africa.

On the present occasion, I intend to make a few remarks on my own account, and notice some occurrences in debate, as a duty which I owe to myself. And if there should be time, after a few brief words of personal explanation, I shall endeavor still further to fortify the position which I occupy in reference to this question.

I am not in the habit of writing my speeches, nor do I even correct and revise them after they are written out by the Reporter. I leave my speeches to the Reporters, just as I speak them in the hurry of the moment, without any effort to do more than make the Convention understand my course, and to give such of my reasons and general views as happen to be uppermost in my mind. The Reporters will bear me witness that I do not prepare or revise my speeches. If I was jealous of my reputation I should correct them; but I am not.

I have no objection against the pending motion to commit this section and the amendments to a select committee, and that all propositions in relation to the subject should be referred to the committee, and let them report.

It has been often repeated in this chamber that all men are born free and equal. This is an eloquent declaration, and it is true in theory; but, sir, it is not susceptible of practical application to all men in the circumstances by which the people of this country are surrounded. It is true, practically, neither in the slave States or the free States. All men have not equal rights and privileges. I know how popular the phrase, borrowed from the Declaration of Independence, is; but practically, sir, it is a solecism.

Gentlemen who profess the greatest sympathy for the negro, have, in their admiration of his character, compared him and his struggles for freedom to the Hungarians and Poles, who fought against desperate odds for their political rights. But, sir, there is this great difference between the two: The Hungarians fought as a nation, and were recognized as a nation—not as isolated individuals; the case of the negroes cannot be compared to this, for they have no name or existence as a nation; even on their native continent they live in barbarian tribes of the lowest scale of sentient being; in this country, they exist only in two classes—the slave and the nominally free—and no one expects that we shall be engaged in a civil war with them. There is a vast difference, sir, between the moral spectacle of a national army, arrayed against the armies of another empire seeking to subjugate them, as was the case with Hungary, and here and there a straggling “nigger” absconding from the cotton field or kitchen of his master! [Laughter.] No, sir, there will never be a civil war between the two races in this country, unless, indeed, through the misguided sympathy of certain gentlemen, known as Abolitionists.

The gentleman from Tippecanoe has remarked, with great truth, that the two races can never amalgamate—that they must eternally remain two separate and distinct races. We know, on the other hand, that races which are homogeneous in their character, can and do amalgamate. The Saxons and the Normans were homogeneous, and, commencing at the time of William the Conqueror, they did amalgamate, and out of the union has sprung the most enlightened and the most powerful race on the globe. There are other instances, and they are apparent to all, in which similar races have united. But the Anglo-Saxon and the African race are not homogeneous, and they never can amalgamate. There is no way to save both races from the accumulating evils of a mixed population, if living in the same country, but the scheme of African colonization.

It has been said that I was not going to vote for the latter clause of the section in debate, which declares that the Legislature shall pass laws prohibiting negroes or mulattoes from purchasing or otherwise acquiring real estate in this State hereafter; and it was urged that herein I showed a great inconsistency. Sir, while I will vote for the most stringent and effective measures to prohibit the immigration of negroes into the State, I shall not go to rob those already in the State of their rightfully acquire property. I claim to desire the good of the black race as well as of the white, and therefore I would do nothing to oppress the negroes now living in this State; on the contrary, I desire the amelioration of their condition. We do not propose to harm them by passing any ex post facto laws. Therefore, it will be seen that there is no inconsistency in my voting for the amendment to the section which was adopted, as proposed by the gentleman from Floyd (Mr. Thornton) this morning.

Gentlemen have remarked that the example of Rome should warn us from having too oppressive laws in relation to the blacks; the rabble of Rome had no property and no interest in the State. I am sure that if the negroes in the State already are allowed the undisturbed possession and use of their property, it will be better for the tranquillity and security of the people of the State.

Another gentleman, the member from Henry, (Mr. Kindley,) has alluded, at considerable length, to the positions taken in the debate on this question a few days since, and which were printed exactly as reported, in yesterday's city papers. I jocularly remarked that it was not a settled thing among learned men, whether or not, strictly speaking, the negro belonged to the human family, and mentioned that the celebrated Professor Agassiz, of Harvard College, had put forth a theory, and supported it in a learned disquisition, that the negro did belong to an entirely different race from ourselves. The gentleman (Mr. Kindley) quoted from this part of my remarks, and then compared it with another, in which I ventured the opinion, that, if the blacks of this country were all colonized in Liberia, they might grow up into a prosperous and a happy nation, and endeavored to ridicule the idea that a race which I had placed so low in the scale of being, could ever become a great nation.

Now, sir, when I jocularly remarked, that, according to Lord Monboddo and others, it was not yet quite settled whether or not man was not descended from the ape family, and that the negro might be nearer the original race than the white race, I spoke of man, not of the negroes exclusively, and the report of my remarks will bear me out. So the gentleman has no foundation for that portion of his remarks.

The gentleman explained the difference in color between the African and the Anglo-Saxon as the result of climate.

Now here again, he is mistaken, for he will find upon research and inquiry, that the Esquimaux, who live in the frozen regions towards the north pole, are as black as the Congo negro. If the gentleman's theory of climate producing the difference in color be true, the Esquimaux would be white.

The gentleman also ridiculed my position, or rather the statement of my belief, that the curse of God pronounced upon the descendants of Ham was not yet removed. I still say, that that curse, pronounced ages since by the Almighty, has never yet been repealed.

The gentleman from Henry (Mr. Kindley) honored me with a lengthy notice on yesterday, and I wish to return the compliment by paying him my respects in person this morning [laughter]. Had the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) or the gentleman from Steuben, (Mr. May,) condescended to take so much notice of my remarks, my constituents would have thought nothing of it; but now, sir, I shall stand higher when it shall be noised abroad that I have been noticed by the distinguished gentleman from Henry, and the people will exclaim, "who would have thought it!" [Laughter.]

MR. KINDLEY. Perhaps the rules of courtesy would demand that I should ask the pardon of the refined and intellectual gentleman from Monroe?

MR. FOSTER. I did allude to the State of Illinois, as having, in her amended Constitution, declared that the Legislature should pass laws prohibiting the immigration of negroes into the State, and I did give it as one of the reasons, in addition to the fact that Kentucky and other of the slave States were driving their surplus negro population into our State, why we should protect ourselves against this flood of black paupers, by a stringent Constitutional provision against their future immigration into Indiana. And, sir, if the statement of the gentleman from Henry be true, that the provision of the Illinois Constitution was never complied with, it neither proves my inconsistency, nor is it an argument against the adoption of the section in debate.

The gentleman from Henry has cited us to the example of Massachusetts in making citizens of negroes and mulattoes, as worthy of our emulation. He tells us of the glory and prosperity of Massachusetts, and her superiority among the States. He speaks of her as "the child and mother of civilization."

Sir, I will detract nothing from the deserved fame of that State. I know that the Mayflower first anchored off her rock-bound coast;

I know that the "Pilgrim Fathers" landed on her shores, and I shall never forget the proud position she occupied in the war of the Revolution. But, sir, there is a reverse side to that glowing picture.

Federal old Massachusetts has often gone astray from the right paths. I recollect that her people, headed by her Quincys and her Parishes, met and passed resolutions against the declaration and prosecution of the war of 1812, and denounced it as a disgraceful act that this nation should go to war against the country from which we derived our laws and religion; and I have had little respect for Massachusetts since that time. I also recollect that her General Court refused to pass any resolutions of commendation of the heroic deeds of Commodore Perry, after his brilliant naval victory on Lake Erie.

And, sir, at this day, look at the meetings held all over that State, from desecrated Faneuil Hall to the smallest school house within her borders, in open opposition to the laws passed by the last Congress for the settlement of the Slavery question. I am as much opposed to the fanaticism of the North as I am to the ultraism of the South. I shall always go for upholding the laws as they are. I will rebuke the nullification of Charleston and the Garrisonism of Boston. Look at the condition of things in Massachusetts to-day. There are Garrison, and Abby Kelley, or Foster, as is her married name, and Thompson, an English abolitionist, who was mobbed out of the country a few years since.

A MEMBER. George Thompson is a member of the British Parliament.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, there is that band of worthies, preaching disunion, resistance to the laws, and all the incendiaries of the day, all over the State which the gentleman from Henry holds up for our example.

Mr. President, I have no hesitation in saying that I would assist to tar and feather such mischievous incendiaries. And particularly would I go for ridding the country of this English missionary. Why, sir, is the English peasant anything to compare, as to intelligence and the possession of the comforts of life, with the Southern slave? Why, sir, the laboring poor of England, and especially in the manufacturing districts, has not a tithe of the privileges and the necessities of life which the negro of this country enjoys. I say that such men who come here to lecture us in this way, ought to be driven out of the country, and so had all who will preach such incendiary sentiments.

The gentleman from Henry (Mr. Kindley) tells us that he is a benevolent man. He told us we must do unto others as we would have others do unto us, that we should give the negroes the privileges we would like to have them grant us if the position of the races was reversed. But I would inform the gentleman that there is another passage of Scripture which I commend to his study. It is, in substance, that when we perform an act of charity, we should not let the right hand know what the left doeth. The gentleman told us how kind he had been to a drunken man whom he had found in the street, and who, he says, he took care of. I suppose the application of the story was that we must take care of the negroes instead of leaving them to perish. But the gentleman was not so self-sacrificing in his benevolence as he would insinuate. He took the drunken man to a tavern, not to his own home; he committed him to the care of strangers without provision for his wants.

Mr. KINDLEY. My boarding place was a mile from the spot where I found him, and it was out of the question as well as unnecessary to get him so far. I did not leave him till I was assured he should be cared for.

Mr. FOSTER. But the gentleman cannot get the credit of playing the good Samaritan. Did he give the innkeeper money, and tell him to take care of the unfortunate stranger, and say, "when I return I will give thee more?" [Laughter.] No; but he left him in a public house unprovided for, and then came here and boasted of his good deeds!

It was also brought up in judgment against me that I spoke of the negroes as "vermin." When I used that expression, I spoke of the negroes of Saint Domingo, whose moral and mental condition is so low, so degraded, that, if the gentleman could see them for himself, he, too, might describe them as "vermin" on society.

But, Mr. President, there are other vermin beside the Saint Domingo negroes. The abolitionists are worse than the negroes.

Now, sir, before I take my seat, I will, in order to fortify my position as to the prohibition of negro immigration, quote the appropriate remarks of a distinguished Judge, upon the subject. It will be seen that I have high authority for the constitutionality of the course I have urged.

"And the first inquiry is, whether, under the Constitution of the United States, the Federal Government has the power to compel the several States to receive and suffer to remain in association with its citizens, every person or class of persons whom it may be the policy or pleasure of the United States to admit. In my judgment, this question lies at the foundation of the controversy in this case. I do not mean to say that the General Government have, by treaty or act of Congress, required the State of Massachusetts to permit the aliens in question to land. I think there is no treaty or act of Congress, which can justly be so construed. But it is not necessary to examine that question until we have first inquired whether Congress can lawfully exercise such a power, and whether the States are bound to submit to it.

For if the people of the several States of this Union reserved to themselves the power of expelling from their borders any person, or class of persons, whom it might deem dangerous to its peace, or likely to produce a physical or moral evil among its citizens, then any treaty or law of Congress invading this right, and authorizing the introduction of any person or description of persons against the consent of the State, would be an usurpation of power which this court could neither recognize nor enforce.

I had supposed this question not now open to dispute. It was distinctly decided in Holmes vs. Jennison, 14 Pet., 540; in Groves vs. Slaughter, 15 Pet., 449; and in Prigg vs. the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, 16, 539.

If these cases are to stand, the right of the State is undoubted. And it is equally clear, that if it may remove from among its citizens any person or description of persons, which it regards as injurious to its welfare, it follows that it may meet them at the threshold and prevent them from entering; for it will hardly be said that the United States may permit them to enter, and compel the State to receive them, and that the State may immediately afterwards expel them. There could be no reason of policy or humanity for compelling the States, by the power of Congress, to imbibe the poison, and then leaving them to find a remedy for it by their own exertions and at their own expense. Certainly no such distinction can be found in the Constitution; and such a division of power would be an inconsistency, not to say an absurdity, for which I presume no one will contend. If the State has the power to determine whether the persons objected to shall remain in the State in association with its citizens, it must, as an incident inseparably connected with it, have the right also to determine who shall enter. Indeed, in the case of Groves vs. Slaughter, the Mississippi Constitution prohibited the entry of the objectionable persons, and the opinions of the court throughout treat the exercise of this power as being the same with that of expelling them after they have entered.

Neither can this be a concurrent power; and whether it belongs to the General or to the State Government, the sovereignty which possesses the right, must in its exercise be altogether independent of the other. If the United States have the power, then any legislation by the State in conflict with a treaty or act of Congress would be void. And if the State possesses it, then any act on the subject by the General Government, in conflict with the State law, would also be void, and this court bound to disregard it. It must be paramount and absolute in the sovereignty which possesses it. A concurrent and equal power in the United States and the States as to who should and who should not be permitted to reside in a State, would be a direct conflict of powers repugnant to each other, continually thwarting and defeating its exercise by either, and could result in nothing but disorder and confusion.

Again: if the State has the right to exclude from its borders any person or persons whom it may regard as dangerous to the safety of its citizens, it must necessarily have the right to decide when and towards whom this power is to be exercised. It is in its nature a discretionary power, to be exercised according to the judgement of the party which possesses it. And it must, therefore, rest with the State to determine whether any particular class or description of persons are likely to produce discontents or insurrection in its territory, or to taint the morals of its citizens, or to bring among them contagious diseases, or the evils and burdens of a numerous pauper population. For if the General Government can in any respect, or by any form of legislation, control or restrain a State in the exercise of this power, or decide whether it has been exercised with proper discretion and towards proper persons, and on proper occasions, then the real and substantial power would be in Congress, and not in the States. In the cases decided in this court, and hereinbefore referred to, the power of determining who is or is not dangerous to the interests and well being of the people of the State has been uniformly admitted to reside in the State."

It is to the last paragraph that I wish to call the particular attention of members:

"I think it, therefore, to be very clear, both upon principle and the authority of adjudged cases, that the several States have a right to remove from among their people, and to prevent from entering the State, any person, or class or description of persons, whom it may deem dangerous or injurious to the interests and welfare of its citizens; and that the State has the exclusive right to determine, in its sound discretion, whether the danger does or does not exist, free from the control of the General Government."

With this quotation, and with the remarks I have made, I will, so far as I am concerned, submit the question.

Mr. COLFAX. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words upon the section in debate; not, however, touching the legal and Constitutional bearings of the question, for that branch of the discussion will be better conducted by gentlemen learned in the law. I shall speak solely and exclusively of the expediency of the adoption of this section as a part of the Constitution of the State. It proposes that—

"The General Assembly at its first session under the amended Constitution, shall pass laws prohibiting negroes and mulattoes from coming into, or settling in, this State, and prohibiting any negro or mulatto from purchasing or otherwise acquiring real estate hereafter."

That, Mr. President, is the provision which we are here and now called upon to engraft in the organic law of Indiana!

It is a lesson, sir, which we learn from history, that all wrongs, however great, however flagrant, are always justified by those whose interest it is to support and defend them, by the plea of a seeming expediency. It is thus that all injustice, all crimes, have ever been covered over and gilded. The first murderers, the brothers of Joseph, the royal criminal who robbed Naboth of his vineyard, all wrong-doers; down to the perpetrators of that awful judicial murder of the Saviour, all plead expediency in justification of their crimes.

Secular history tells us also the same thing. The records of the past are full of cases illustrating the Universal Apology for wrong. The executions of Algernon Sidney, and of the peerless Mary, Queen of Scotland, the bloody trials of the bloody Jeffries, all were attempted to be justified by the "peculiar circumstances" of the time; it was policy—it was expedient. And so too when the streets of Paris ran with the blood of the best and the fairest of France, in the terrible era of her Revolution—it was "expedient" for the safety of the people, and the guillotine was therefore permitted to swell the vast hecatomb of victims.

Mr. President, in this day wrongs are still advocated on the ground of policy, and the individual or State that is about to commit a great wrong will seek so to cover it over that before the gaze of the present, they can hold up the declaration that its necessity or its expediency impelled to the commission.

I shall not compare the proposition in the section before the Convention to the crimes in the past which I have cited. It is not so palpable in its enormity. The victims of this provision do not occupy that elevated position in the world's eye that challenges its sympathy with their sufferings or its indignation at their oppression; for they are of a race which it is popular to deride and revile. But, sir, it stands on the same platform of wrongs, some greater and some of less magnitude, as the light of the future brings this act into bolder relief or throws another into a darker shade.

What is the main reason, what is the strongest argument most frequently urged and mainly relied upon, for the adoption of this section? It is that the State of Kentucky, in her Constitution, adopted last summer, has prohibited a free negro from coming into the State, and an emancipated slave from remaining in the State over thirty days, upon pain of being arrested for a misdemeanor, and sentenced to confinement in the State penitentiary. In the truthful, earnest language of the gentleman from Ripley, (Mr. Smith,) "Kentucky has made freedom a crime," and, sir, she has affixed a severe penalty to that crime. And while gentlemen denounce this clause in the Constitution of Kentucky in the strong terms of manly indignation; while they say there is no palliation for the act, neither here nor at the bar of Eternal Justice, they turn and commend to us the example of that State in the adoption of that Constitutional provision—they ask us to adopt a similar section, and to bring upon ourselves the infamy which they say it has fastened on Kentucky. They propose that this extreme act of a slave State shall be followed by a free State which has not even so good an excuse for it as had Kentucky. What was the excuse for that act rendered by the Delegates in the Convention of that State? It has not yet been noticed in debate. But it was simply and solely this: that there were two classes of negroes in Kentucky—the slaves and the free blacks—and that the presence of this class of free negroes among the "chattles," rendered that description of property insecure. Hence the slaveholders demanded that the free blacks should be expelled, in order that they might be secured in the quiet possession and enjoyment of their property in slaves. This, sir, was the excuse for the adoption of the provision, so often alluded to in the Kentucky Constitution. Is it of the least validity or weight here?

Have we an excuse or an apology like this for the adoption of a provision similar in character but more heinous in its injustice? We live in a State which, for a third of a century, has proclaimed that all men are naturally possessed of certain rights, of which the section under consideration proposes to divest a class of men.

The right of ALL men to acquire and possess property, which was solemnly declared in 1816 to be inherent and inalienable, is now as solemnly to be denied by a declaration in the organic law of this free State. If the framers of the present Constitution uttered a truth—if this right of ALL men, without limitation of color or of race, to acquire and possess property, declared by them in 1816 to be inalienable, was really so, how can it be alienated now? If it was a natural right then, as they proclaimed, how can it be repealed now? If it was a right inherent in all men in 1816, how can it be violated and trampled on in 1850? Does progress learn us to alienate in one generation what was inalienable previously?

When I was upon the floor the other day I cited for the consideration of this Convention the Constitution of the slave State of Delaware, which solemnly recognizes the same great truth, that upholds it yet; and, sir, I have farther to say that that State, and Maryland, and the District of Columbia authorizes and tolerates the residence of free blacks within their borders and among their people, while to-day it is proposed to exclude them from Indiana. Why, sir, if we make haste we may outstrip slaveholding Virginia in adopting provisions of most unexampled severity and wanton injustice against the negro. The Convention of that State met a few weeks since, and a proposition to exclude free negroes, heretofore allowed a residence, was introduced, but the Convention has temporarily adjourned without acting upon it. Virginia has not yet committed this great wrong, and if gentlemen make speed in their action, there is a probability that they may out-strip Virginia in its consummation. When the Convention of that State re-assembles it may find that Indiana, though she was made a free State by the ordinance of one of her own slaveholders, has borne off the palm from her, in the race of oppression.

The gentleman from Ripley (Mr. Smith) "hit the nail on the head" when he pressed upon this Convention the question, "What remedy do you propose effectually to prevent negroes from coming into the State?" Driven from Kentucky under pain of confinement at hard labor in her State Prison, you must make the pains and penalties severer—the punishment more dreadful and intense here, or you will not prevent their immigration, or, what this section will also prevent, their passing through the State on their way to Canada or Liberia. And we demand of gentlemen on the other side, that they come out boldly and frankly, like men, secure from fear in the consciousness of right, and tell the people plainly and openly what penalties shall be affixed for this new misdemeanor of their criminal code. How do you intend to carry this matter, so boldly begun, into execution? Let us, upon the same page that declares it a crime for a black man to come into Indiana, declare and enact the penalty attached to the commission of that crime.

Mr. President, we have often spoken with pride of this union of States, of the privileges secured by this republican form of government, of the priceless value of the liberties wrested from the gripe of throned despotism, which we have received from our ancestors. And with feelings of self-gratification we have pointed to the condition of the people of that Isle of the ocean, that England—whose name has become a synonym of power and national grandeur, as subjects of monarchical power, and far below us in the enjoyment of liberty and free institutions. But, sir, there is a glorious truth recognized, affirmed, proclaimed by England, and which I hope to live yet to see re-affirmed, re-proclaimed in my own country—the truth that man as man is free—the declaration that when a slave sets his foot on England's Isle, that moment the chains fall forever from his limbs, that moment he becomes forever free.

It will be long, long years before the slave States of our confederacy, who alone have control over their own institutions, will banish slavery from their borders, and before we shall, in this respect, stand free from stain in the eyes of mankind. But, sir, whether that time be far or near, let us act wisely in the present, and pause long before we adopt this section, which, when that time arrives, if ever it is destined to come, we shall blush with shame to remember that we placed it in our constitutional law.

We cannot, if we would, conceal so great a wrong by gilding it with the tinsel of a seeming and temporary expediency. Time, besides being a great teacher, is always a great vindicator of right. Its unerring verdict has most sternly condemned every one of the great wrongs I have cited to you from the past. This decision we cannot escape. The cool judgment of the calm and unbiased historian is yet to pass our acts in review. When that time comes no expediency will weigh even as a feather in the balance of impartial justice. The question—the only question—will be, was it wrong, was it inhuman? And according to the answer will be the verdict rendered.

Sir, I make no boast of the purity of my motives here, but when I learned the lessons of freedom, I learned, also, to abhor oppression and tyranny; and wherever, within my sphere, be it narrow or wide, oppression treads its iron heel upon human rights, I will raise my voice in earnest protest; I will rebuke it and condemn it whether it emanates from a despot on a throne or from a popular majority which has become lost to sense of right. In carrying out such a principle I may fail, but I would far rather sink with the oppressed, however weak and despised and defenseless, than to rise with the oppressor, however powerful. I would rather have borne the name of a rebel and the brand of a traitor, with the patriots of the Revolution, than to enjoy the utmost favor of the tyrants who oppressed them. I would rather this day—this very hour—share a hovel and poverty with Kossuth, than a palace in splendor with his Russian foe.

Mr. McFARLAND. I rise for the purpose of calling the attention of the Convention to what is really the pending question, rather than for the purpose of discussing the merits of the proposition itself.

In common with other gentlemen who have expressed their feelings of disapprobation at the course which debate has taken, I feel that it is important and proper that we should come back to the consideration of the real question pending before the Convention. The question is, shall this section, proposing to prohibit negroes and mulattoes from coming into the State, and from purchasing or otherwise acquiring real estate hereafter—shall this section and the pending amendments be committed to a select committee, with the instructions moved by the gentleman from Floyd (Mr. Thonton)?

It must be apparent to every gentleman that this subject needs to be further investigated. I rejoice to see the feeling of courtesy and calmness which obtains in all the discussion of yesterday and to-day, compared with the excited state of temper with which the consideration of this section was first approached. I trust that this feeling, so necessary to the correct settlement of the question, and so creditable to gentlemen whose feelings are so warmly interested for and against the provisions of the section, will continue to characterize the discussion. The question itself is one of the most important that will come before the Convention, and that can be submitted to the citizens of the State for their judgment and final decision.

It is a subject of far more than local, or even State importance; it has claimed and received, and justly, too, the longest and closest attention of those who are councilors in the nation. It is no simple proposition in which the citizens of Indiana alone are interested and concerned—it is a great national question—aye, more, a question in which the world is concerned and of which the world is now taking careful note.

When gentlemen approach the consideration of this question, they must forget the little petty squabbles and jealousies and the narrow feelings and prejudices which may have surrounded them in their petty local constituencies. We must recollect that it is no question which concerns one constituency alone; we must be conscious that it nearly concerns and intensely interests, the whole constituency of the State, and involves the consideration of a question that reaches the very vitals of the great nation, of which we, as a State, form but a constituent part.

It was well said by the gentleman from Vigo (Mr. Cookerly,) that the proposition in debate would, if adopted, prove inadequate to the expectations of its supporters, and the ends it is designed to accomplish. We have some experience in this matter; there are examples of States adopting similar provisions; and it would be the part of wisdom in us to study those examples and profit by that experience.

The State of Illinois adopted a Constitutional provision similar to the one under consideration.

Now, here, as you have heard, was full and complete power given to the Legislature of that State, in as solemn and mandatory form as we can give to our Legislature, and what was the result? Did the first Legislature under the amended Constitution comply with the supreme mandate of the organic law of the State? Search the official record of the Legislatures of Illinois from that period to this, and you will find not a single law upon the subject! Sir, the Legislature shrank from the discharge of the duty so solemnly imposed upon them by the Constitution—and well they might.

But, sir, let us meet this question with the cool temper and kindly feelings with which it was discussed this morning, and be resolved that whatever provision it may seem wisest and best to adopt, shall be made effectual and not stand upon the page of the new Constitution, null and void, a dangerous precedent to show that even the solemn mandate of organic law may be inoperative—may be disregarded; as a provision is almost certain to be which comes in collision with the sentiments and feelings of a large majority of the people.

Let us leave nothing to the Legislature that can be properly done here; we must shrink from no responsibility which it is our duty to take; in a word, sir, let us, to adopt the forceful, if not very classic language of the youth, and "take the bull by the horns" (laughter). If it is possible to "get clear" of that class of population which, in the earlier part of the debate was denounced upon this floor as "vermin," and by others as "apes and the descendants of the monkey species," if, I say, we can in time get clear of the negro population of the State, if we can prevent their future immigration into the State by any means short of an outrage upon the common rights of humanity, short of a violation of the spirit and terms of our own charter of liberties, short of trampling by the right of mere brute strength upon those rights and immunities sacred here and everywhere, it may be done. But, in the name of God, let us not dare the vengeance of Him who holds nations, alike with individuals, accountable for crimes, and at the same time suffer the double retribution of seeing our iniquity impotent, of seeing the provision we adopt fall short of its design.

There is no time, if there was a disposition, to argue this question; but with this brief expression of my views, I submit whether it is not better that this discursive debate should be brought to a close and this whole subject be referred to a committee. The instructions of the gentleman from Floyd (Mr. Thornton) are not imperative; they only require the committee to inquire into the expediency of their provisions. Gentlemen who are desirous, and whose duty it is, to discuss this question, can reserve their remarks, and make them when the subject again comes up, in better form for debate, on the report of that committee. Let this whole matter be referred to a committee of intelligent, thinking men, who will, calmly and deliberately and faithfully investigate the whole subject in all its bearings, with the advantage of the pretty full expression of sentiment from representatives of almost every portion of the State, and who will report a provision in the best form which their judgment, thus aided, will enable them to, for the action of the Convention.

At that time, when the proposition will come up in a more definite form, I hope to have an opportunity to express my views on the subject; but at present, I feel that the debate is really out of order, and shall not enter into a speech. And I think that at this time, gentlemen should strictly confine their remarks to propriety or impropriety of committing this section and amendments to a select committee.

I understand that the friends of a measure, effectually to exclude colored people from coming into or settling in the State, have no confidence in the section as reported, while the opposite side denounce it as contravening the fundamental rights of all men.

This being the case, who so able as a committee of one from each Congressional district, as proposed by the gentleman from Floyd, to submit a proposition upon which a majority shall unite!

In conclusion, let me express a hope that this scattering debate will cease, that this whole matter will be sent to a committee, and that we may proceed to the discussion of other propositions which are already in a proper form for action.

Mr. MORRISON. I certainly have no disposition, Mr. President, to prolong this incipient debate, but there is much matter connected with the subject of this section, which in some shape has yet to be referred to the committee proposed by the gentleman from Floyd.

Before that committee reports in the form of sections what it may think to be the opinions of this Convention, there should be a much fuller expression upon many features of that report.

If those instructions presented by the gentleman from Floyd (Mr. Kent) pass, they will in effect be imperative, and the sections reported back to the Convention will embrace the principles expressed in those instructions.

But, sir, I must vote against some of the propositions contained in those instructions. I consider that public opinion is settled in opposition to the immigration of blacks into the State; I know that this is peculiarly true of the county of Marion. And, sir, I shall not be deterred from representing that settled will of my constituents against the influx of blacks, by the dolorous ditties which have been recited to us by gentlemen who may have a large abolitionist constituency, whose good opinion they may desire to propitiate. I stand here to say, that a large majority, not alone of the people of Marion county, but a large majority of the people of Indiana, have emphatically declared against the future immigration of negroes and mulattoes into the State. I hold, sir, that it is mere sophistry, a mere play upon logical formulas, to say that the people of Indiana has no power, under the Constitution of the United States, to prohibit this immigration. I shall not attempt to follow the arguments of the gentlemen who have taken the opposite side, because the restriction of the half-hour rule will prevent me from making myself understood by preventing me from reviewing the whole subject. But, sir, they do not, in my humble opinion, deserve so serious a consideration from any member.

I am opposed to the adoption of the instructions moved to be referred with this section, inasmuch as they contain several bad features.

And first, I will notice the proposition for the annual appropriation of ten thousand dollars, to be applied to the colonization of the negroes of this State in Liberia. Are gentlemen prepared to vote for that provision, are they prepared to declare that there shall be an additional tax levied upon the people for an appropriation they never thought of when they elected them to this Convention? What man is there here who, in the face of the unparalleled burthens of taxation now bowing the backs of the tax-payers of Indiana, will vote to add to those burthens by the annual appropriation of this large sum, and for the purpose of African colonization? I am not prepared for such a step, and I will not vote to require the appropriation of one cent for that object.

I am as much opposed to the keeping up of the agitation of this subject which will be the result of another proposition contained in those instructions, the proposition to submit a section prohibiting negroes from immigrating into the State, and from acquiring real estate, to the separate vote of the people. I say again, that public opinion is settled upon the subject. We have been virtually instructed in the will of those we serve, and we must not turn aside to please and accomodate gentlemen who are disposed to shrink from their responsibilities by leaving this subject an open matter; by submitting a section relative to the immigration of blacks, and their rights of property, to the separate vote of the people. I cannot refuse to represent what I am convinced is clearly the popular will, merely for the purpose of accomodating gentlemen who have a delicacy in this regard. I shall go for closing this matter up in the Constitution, and let the people vote upon it as a whole, but I am willing to provide in this Constitution for amendments to it, by the concurring votes of two successive Legislatures, and without the calling of another Convention.

I hope that the various points contained in these instructions will be debated until the committee to whom the section will be referred will clearly comprehend the will of the Convention.

I have no objection to the reference, so that all the points involved are fully and fairly understood.

Mr. OWEN. I think the gentleman (Mr. Morrison) has somewhat mistaken the nature of the instructions moved by the gentleman from Floyd. I think that there are no positive instructions at all, but merely a direction to inquire into the practicability and expediency of certain propositions.

Mr. MORRISON. I understand it otherwise. I understand those instructions to be an insidious means of getting an expression of the Convention, that shall be urged upon the committee as the will of this body in favor of certain propositions contained in those instructions. Although they are not imperative in terms, they carry with them, by implication, if adopted, the impression that the Convention favors their principles.

Mr. OWEN. I will read the instructions:

"Refer this section to a committee of one from each Congressional District, with instructions to inquire into the best means of ultimately separating the white and colored races in Indiana; and also into the expediency of incorporating in one article all Constitutional provisions relative to negroes and mulattoes, and submitting the same separately to the people."

Mr. MORRISON. Having heard the instructions read, I am confirmed in the conclusion that they have the insidious object which I mentioned. I wish to direct a committee to make no such inquiry as that. I do not wish the committee to go out with the idea that they are to report any such propositions; nor do I wish the Convention to be trammelled by the influence of a report which a committee thus instructed would make.

Sir, in this matter I have only to know the will of the people before I am ready to act. I have no ulterior object in view, which would be forwarded by deferring to the individual wishes or feelings of any member here. I have no courtesy to extend, at the expense of duty, for the sake of being in good repute with gentlemen who would like to dodge the responsibility of voting for or against the pending section. But as to some gentlemen here, a "change" seems to have "come over the spirit of their dreams" since they entered this Hall. I cannot account for that change, and can only say that I am not affected by it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, it is with the utmost diffidence that I attempt at this time to occupy the time and attention of the Convention.

I presume no member of the body labors under so much embarrassment as myself, in attempting to address a deliberative body. It has not been my fortune, heretofore, to have participated in the deliberations of any assembly of men where public speaking was required or expected. When I took my seat here, I was almost entirely unacquainted with the members of this body; I had no experience in public affairs; I knew but little of the rules of deliberative bodies. I therefore determined to remain silent, and not participate in the discussions of the Convention unless I thought my duty to those who sent me here imperiously demanded it at my hands.

Such a duty has now devolved upon me, and I will no longer shrink from the discharge of my obligations.

No question has come before this Convention upon which a more lively interest is felt throughout the State of Indiana, than upon the proposition now under discussion. It is a question upon the decision of which greater results depend, for weal or for woe, to the people of Indiana, than any other question likely to be discussed during the session. Therefore, Mr. President, I feel that I am in duty bound to those who sent me here, to claim the attention of the body while I endeavor to present the views I hold and the reasons that will influence my vote when the question comes to be taken on the proposition now in debate. I was in hopes, yesterday, and I yet think it desirable, that the motion of the gentleman from Floyd to re-commit with instructions to a committee of one from each Congressional district, the entire subject, with all the sections connected or in any way relating to the rights and privileges of the negro race within the limits of Indiana, would be adopted, in order that the whole question, and every proposition connected with the future social and political condition of the African race, might be fairly and legitimately brought within the range of debate at the same time, and if possible be decided by one vote.

The section now before us, provides that the African race shall not, hereafter, be allowed to come within the limits of the State of Indiana from other States; and it also curtails the rights and privileges of those that are already here. Now, I am satisfied with the section as reported by the committee, and am ready to vote for it; but at the same time I wish to provide the means by which to remove the unfortunate blacks that are now amongst us.

We say by our votes here that the colored man shall have no privileges within the limits of Indiana. Does not justice and humanity require at our hands that, after adopting such a provision, we should provide the means by which they may be colonized on the shores of Africa, in the land of their fathers? Shall we, the delegates of the people of Indiana—a people deeply imbued with the principles of humanity and justice—a people devoted to equal laws and equal rights—shall we say to the unfortunate Africans amongst us, "You shall not enjoy the privileges of citizens; you shall not hold property within the limits of the State; we will not throw around you the protecting arm of government; we look upon you as an inferior race, as a withering and blighting nuisance, not to be endured, and not, at the same time, provide means by which to remove them from their hopeless degradation to a place where they can enjoy that equality of rights which is very properly denied them here?"

The time has evidently come when this question must be met. The people in whose behalf I here speak, demand bold and decisive action on the part of this Convention; they see and are fully sensible of the dangers that surround them; they see Kentucky thrusting her free negroes from her soil; they see Illinois refusing them admittance within her borders; Ohio will no doubt do the same; all the Southern States are sending off this worthless population as fast as they can. Where will they find a resting place but in Indiana? They are now coming in upon us every day, and will so continue unless we protect ourselves by a positive Constitutional prohibition.

But concerning those unfortunate blacks that are already amongst us, I am willing—while we refuse to them the rights and privileges asked for them by some misguided philanthropists—I am willing and anxious that we shall provide means by which to send them to a land where they can enjoy that equality that they never can realize here. I am fully persuaded that the peace, and happiness, and prosperity of our country require that the two races be separated. All experience has taught us that two distinct races cannot live together in harmony and good feeling. Justice to ourselves requires that the negro population be removed from within our borders. Justice and humanity to our negro population also demand at our hands their speedy colonization. There is no alternative left us. I for one am prepared to meet this question; I am prepared to vote for the section as reported by the committee; I am ready to vote for it, because I know that in giving my vote in that way, and in no other way, can I truly and faithfully represent those who sent me here. And the deliberate convictions of my own mind fully sustain me in obeying the wishes of my constituents.

I am also in favor of requiring the Legislature to appropriate any sum of money, not less than ten thousand dollars annually, to the humane cause of colonization; and I have fears, that in supporting this measure I am not going far enough to meet the wishes of the people whose representative I am. I am proud to believe that the popular sentiment upon this subject is far in advance of any manifestations which have been made by the people's representatives.

I shall vote to re-commit the section, with the instructions moved by the gentleman from Floyd, and which were read a few minutes since by the gentleman from Posey.

On motion, the Convention adjourned until two o'clock.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Mr. WOLFE called for a division of the question, so as to see whether the Convention were in favor of again referring this question to a committee.

Mr. MILLER of Gibson observed, that he did not think the Convention were ready for the question; and he would therefore move a call of the Convention.

A call of the Convention was ordered, and the roll being called,

Mr. MORRISON of Washington moved to dispense with a further call, which was not agreed to.

Mr. MILLER of Gibson moved that those members who were not present, and who had not leave of absence, be sent for. [Cries of "no! no! no!"]

The question being taken on the motion to send for the absentees, it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 37, nays 32.

Mr. WATTS. I hope the Convention will consent to dispense with a further call of the House. We have as full a house as we usually have, and to demand a further call of the House will only waste the time of the Convention, and effect no good purpose.

Mr. GOOTEE moved that all the absentees have leave of absence.

The PRESIDENT. The motion of the gentleman from Martin is out of order, the Convention having already ordered that the absentees be sent for.

Mr. HALL moved that a further call of the Convention be dispensed with.

And the question being taken on the motion, there were ayes 41, nays 42.

So a further call of the Convention was not dispensed with.

Mr. PETTIT. You ought to close the doors so as to keep those gentlemen in who are now here. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT. The doorkeeper will close the door so as to keep in those gentlemen that are here. [Laughter.]

Mr. GREGG asked whose duty it was to go for the absentees.

The PRESIDENT. It is the duty of the Sergeant-at-arms.

Mr. GREGG. But he is sick and not able to perform the duty.

The PRESIDENT. Then it will be the duty of the Doorkeeper.

Mr. TAGUE moved that the Doorkeeper be placed outside the door with the key, so as to unlock the door in case of any members coming and asking admission. [Roars of laughter, accompanied by loud knockings at the door, which caused renewed laughter.]

Mr. WATTS. I hope the Convention has now thought over this matter sufficiently, and that they will consent to dispense with a further call. [Cries of "order! order!"]

The PRESIDENT. It is in order for the gentleman to move to dispense with a further call.

Mr. WATTS. I should not object to gentlemen indulging in a frolic of this kind were there none but Hoosiers here; but there are strangers present, and this conduct may produce an unfavorable impression upon their minds. I trust, therefore, that the Convention will dispense with a further call of the House, and proceed to business.

The PRESIDENT. Will the Convention dispense with a further call of the House?

The question being taken on a division, there were for the motion ayes 62, nays not counted.

So the further call of the Convention was dispensed with.

The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of the order of the day, being the fourth section of the report of the committee on rights and privileges, relating to negroes and mulattoes.

The PRESIDENT. A division of the question, before the consideration, being called for, the question will be taken first on re-committing, and secondly on the instructions.

Mr. PETTIT. I rise not to discuss a question of this importance now, but I ask whether it be in order in the first place to move to perfect this section.

The PRESIDENT. Not in the present stage of the question. The motion is to re-commit, which takes precedence of any motion to amend.

Mr. PETTIT. I am in favor of the motion to re-commit, and I hope the motion will prevail.

Mr. HALL. This subject has already been before a standing committee. They have labored upon it, and reported the result of their labors. We have now discussed this question some three or four days, and there is a proposition before the Convention on which I believe this body is pretty nearly divided. It appears to me that a subject of this kind should be decided without a re-commitment; I allude to the motion which was pending before the motion to re-commit was made, authorizing the free negroes now residing in the State to purchase and hold real property. That appears to me to be the question about which the Convention is most divided. Now if it is re-committed to a select committee of thirteen, how could that committee know whether to report a clause of that kind or not? It therefore appears to me that before the question is taken on the motion to re-commit, there should be an expression of opinion on the part of this Convention on that subject. I therefore move to lay the motion to re-commit upon the table, in order that we may have a decision of this Convention on the question to which I have referred.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark to the gentleman from Gibson, (Mr. Hall,) that his motion is not in order.

Mr. LOCKHART. Having proposed an amendment to the resolution of instructions, I deem it my duty to state to the Convention the reasons which have induced me to offer that amendment. I am prepared individually to vote for the sections as they came from the hands of the committee, but I am not prepared to say that that vote would receive the sanction of the people of the State. I know, however, that it would receive the sanction of an overwhelming majority of my constituents. If any one question was discussed more than another in the counties which I represent, it was this very question: and with a voice almost unanimous, the people decided essentially in favor of the sections reported by the committee. The reasons which have induced me to offer this amendment are briefly these: By a reference to the statute of 1831, by some styled the "black law," entitled "An act concerning free negroes and mulattoes, servants and slaves," approved February 10, 1831, may it not be held, under the first section, that the people had invited free negroes into this State. A portion of this section reads as follows:

"From and after the first day of September next, no black or mulatto person coming or brought into this State, shall be permitted to reside therein, unless bond with good and sufficient security be given on behalf of such person of color—in the penal sum of five hundred dollars, conditioned that such person shall not at any time become a charge to said county."

That section virtually provides that they might come into the State, and, if they did, that they should comply with its provisions. For a time it was supposed that this law was unconstitutional. The Supreme Court, however, has decided otherwise and that the act is constitutional. The amendment I have offered is substantially this: That all negroes who have been born in this State, or those who came into the State prior to the act of 10th February, 1831, just recited, and all who have come into the State since that period, and have complied with the provisions of the law, shall be permitted to hold real estate hereafter, as they have heretofore. It seems to me that if these instructions be adopted, the friends of the most stringent laws on that subject, would be satisfied. It would be leaving the negroes, exempted in the amendment, free to acquire and hold property. The ground which I have taken, I think would be neutral and common ground—ground on which we all would meet; that it would be a position which we could all maintain, and which would be maintained by the people of the State. It cannot be urged with propriety, that those who have come into the State since the passage of the act of 1831, and have not complied with its provisions, can have any claim to the protection which that law otherwise would have afforded them, or any other of the laws of the State. They reside here in fraud of the law and have no right to claim its protection.

Again: I am not prepared to say that either the courts of our State or those of the United States, would sanction a constitutional provision like that which we are proposing to adopt. It may be that we are going too far. It may be that the supreme judiciary of the State or of the Union may say, "By your act of the 10th February, 1831, you invited negroes to come into your State, or, in other words, you have said, that if they came they should give bonds; and if they have given bonds, you have no right to place such a provision either in your organic law, or on your statute book." I think, therefore, that the amendment I have offered is just and proper. I would say let the negro or mulatto who came into the State previous to the passage of that law, or who has complied with its provision, since it was passed, hold real property, and exclude all others. These are the views which I entertained when I introduced the amendment to the instructions. The proposition to refer all these questions to a select committee struck me favorably, and I suppose that by adopting such a course, some provision might be suggested which would meet the wishes of, and be acceptable to, a large majority of the Convention, and would be received and sanction by the people.

It has been said during the discussion of this question, that there is a pro-slavery party in this Convention; that there are men on this floor who are pandering to the Southern slave-holders—men who are not willing to maintain the principles declared to be the rights of the citizen of this State, guarantied by the present Constitution. I, for one, sir, am not prepared to say that when I take the position which I do, that I am pandering to the prejudices of the southern slave-holder. I maintain that Indiana ought to be, and should forever remain free soil ("consent," from several voices). I go in, however, for maintaining the integrity of the laws, and of the Constitution of the United States. I go in for the enforcement of the bill which has been denounced from one end of the Union to the other—I mean the fugitive slave law. I believe that it is a duty which we owe to the sister States, a duty which we owe to ourselves, a duty which we owe to the integrity of the Union, to see that the laws are faithfully, honestly, and impartially administered. That was one of the principles on which the federal compact was framed; and it is unquestionably our duty to preserve it inviolate. Sir, I see very little moral honesty in declaring upon this floor, that we are in favor of maintaining the supremacy of the law, while at the same time we stigmatize each other as being panders to the interests of southern slave-holders, or northern fanatics. If to maintain the supremacy of the law be to pander, then I am willing to be branded as a panderer (several voices—"consent").

The gentleman from St. Joseph (Mr. Colfax) appealed this morning with an air of triumph to Great Britain, as a country where slavery does not exist. He says that that fast anchored isle, around whose shores the waves of the ocean have beaten from time immemorial, whose throne is covered with the dust of a thousand years of hereditary succession—in that isle, says he, no slave treads the soil. I will agree with him that no African slave treads that soil; but I cannot concede that there are no slaves there. I say there is more abject slavery in Great Britain to-day than there is in Kentucky, or Virginia, or Louisiana. I say that the white people, the poor laboring white operatives and miners of England, are not so well provided for, not so well cared for to-day as are the slaves on southern plantations. Sir, as an evidence of the truth of this fact, hear what some of their own writers say upon the subject. Colquhoun, in 1817, says:

"When the population of England was less than 9,000,000, that there were 1,234,768 Englishmen in a state of indigence, requiring either total or partial support from the public."

Again, sir, hear what Southey says in relation to the poor of England:

"When the poor are incapable of contributing any longer to their own support, they are removed to what is called the work-house. I cannot express to you the feeling of hopelessness and dread with which all the decent poor look on to this wretched termination of a life of labor. To this place all vagrants are sent for punishment; and poor orphans and base-born children are brought up here till they are of age to be apprenticed off. The other inmates are those unhappy people who are utterly helpless, parish idiots and mad men, the blind and the palsied, and the old who are fairly worn out. To this society of wretchedness the laboring poor of England look as their last resting place on this side of the grave; and rather than enter abodes so miserable, they endure the severest privations as long as it is possible to exist. A feeling of honest pride makes them shrink from a place where guilt and poverty are confounded."

Again: he says that it is not uncommon that "you see women raking the ashes in the streets for the sake of the half burnt cinders. What a picture does one of their homes present in the depth of winter! The old cowering over a few embers—the children shivering in rags, pale and livid, all the activity and joyousness natural to their time of life chilled within them. * * To talk of English happiness is like talking of Spartan freedom: the Helots are overlooked."

This, sir, is but an imperfect picture of the situation of the laboring poor of Great Britain; and I ask those who declaim so eloquently and so loudly against American slavery, whether they can go upon a single plantation in the whole South and find wretchedness equal to that which an English author himself describes?

I wish now, sir, briefly to notice some objections which have been urged by my friend before me—the gentleman from Lagrange (Mr. Howe). He urges some legal objections to the passage of such a section as this; he seems to be of opinion that it would be unconstitutional, and that were we to place it in the Constitution it would be null and void. The gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Read) referred us to several authorities to show that such a law would be Constitutional. I have some other authorities to which I wish to call the attention of the Convention. The first to which I refer is in Little's Kentucky Report:

This, sir, was an action brought by Amy, a woman of color, born a slave in Pennsylvania, against her master, for trespass and false imprisonment, for the purpose of asserting her freedom. The defendant's plea was that she was a slave, &c.; verdict and judgment for the defendant. Upon the trial it was asserted by the plaintiff that she was manumitted by the will of her first owner, and that she was to have her freedom at the age of thirty-one, &c. She proved that she lived in Virginia as a free woman for several years, unmolested by any one, &c. The defendant relied, among other things, to defeat this action, upon the statute of Kentucky, which recites that, "whenever creditors, purchasers, and others are exposed to great injustice by the assertion of persons held in slavery of dormant claims to their freedom, founded upon certain acts of the Legislatures of Virginia and Pennsylvania and the interests and peace of society requiring that all such claims should be brought to a speedy determination," enacts: "That no writ, suit, or action shall be sued out, commenced, or prosecuted, by any person of color claiming his or her freedom in consequence of a failure to comply with the abolition act of Pennsylvania, requiring a registry of such person, or his or her ancestress; or in consequence of having been taken into the State of Pennsylvania contrary to the provisions of an act of the Legislature thereof; or in consequence of a failure to record the oath prescribed by the act of the Legislature of Virginia, entitled 'an act to prevent the further importation of slaves,' or an act amendatory thereof, unless such writ, suit, or action shall be sued out, commenced, or prosecuted within two years from the passage of this act; and it shall and may be lawful for any defendant or defendants to give the same in evidence without specially pleading it."

The constitutionality of this act was denied by the plaintiff, and upon the decision of that question, with others, the plaintiff's right to recover depended. The opinion of the court upon this branch of the case is very long, and, I will add, very able; I will, therefore, crave the indulgence of the Convention while I read it. It is as follows:

"It is obvious, that this act, according to the plain and literal import of its language, embraces the plaintiff's case, so far as her right to maintain the action depends upon a failure to have her registered according to the requisitions of the act of Pennsylvania, or to have taken the oath and have it recorded, as required by the act of Virginia, on the importation of a slave into that State; nor was it contended, that the act, if it can have any operation, would not be a bar to the plaintiff's action, so far as her right depended upon such failure. But it is urged, that the act, in limiting the right to maintain the action to two years, is void, because it is repugnant, both to the Constitution of the U. States, and to that of this State.

It cannot be pretended, that the Constitution of the United States contains any provision which prohibits the States from passing acts of limitation, in general. It may indeed be questionable, whether an act limiting the time of bringing an action to enforce a contract, which, when made, was not subject to such limitation, would not be incompatible with that clause of the Constitution which prohibits a State from passing any law impairing the obligation of a contract; for if, as is supposed by some, whose opinion is entitled to great weight, the obligation of a contract consists in the remedy which the law affords to enforce its performance, it would seem to follow, that an act limiting the time of bringing an action upon a contract, which, when made, was not subject to such limitation, would impair the obligation of the contract. But in this case, the action is not founded upon contract, but upon tort; and, of course, the act of 1808 cannot, upon any construction of that clause of the Constitution of the United States, be said to be incompatible with it.

It was not, however, of that clause of the Constitution of the United States, that the act of 1808 was contended by the plaintiff's counsel to be an infraction; but of the clause which provides that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."—1st clause, 2d section, and 4th article. To entitle the plaintiff to the benefit of this clause, it is obviously necessary, that she should be a citizen of some one of the United States; and it is accordingly urged by her counsel, in support of her title to that character, that she was, before her removal from Pennsylvania, a citizen of that State, and that by her removal to Virginia, she became a citizen of the latter.

Before we can determine whether she was a citizen or not, of either of those States, it is necessary to ascertain what it is that constitutes a citizen. In England, birth in the country was alone sufficient to make any one a subject. Even a villain or a slave, born within the king's allegiance, is, according to the principles of the common law, a subject; but it never can be admitted that he is a citizen. One may, no doubt, be a citizen by birth, as well as a subject; but subject and citizen are evidently words of different import, and it indisputably requires something more to make a citizen, than it does to make a subject. It is, in fact, not the place of a man's birth, but the rights and privileges he may be entitled to enjoy, which make him a citizen. The term citizen, is derived from the Latin word civis, and in its primary sense signifies one who is vested with the freedom and privileges of a city. At an early period after the subversion of the Roman empire, when civilization had again begun to progress, the cities in every part of Europe, either by usurpation or concession from their sovereigns, obtained extraordinary privileges, in addition to those which were common to the other subjects of their respective countries; and one who was invested with these extraordinary privileges, whether he was an inhabitant of the city or not, or whether he was born in it or not, was deemed a citizen.—See Rees' Cyclopædia, under the word Citizen. In England, a citizen is not only entitled to all the local privileges of the city to which he belongs, but he has also the right of electing and being elected to Parliament, which is itself rather an extraordinary privilege, since it does not belong to every class of subjects.—Com. Dig. Parliament, D. 6, 4 Inst. 6.

If we go back to Rome, whence the term citizen has its origin, we shall find, in the illustrious period of her republic, that citizens were the highest class of subjects to whom the jus civitatis belonged, and that the jus civitatis conferred upon those who were in possession of it, all rights and privileges, civil, political and religious.—Butler's Horæ Juridicæ, 26, 27.

When the term came to be applied to the inhabitants of a State, it necessarily carried with it the same signification, with reference to the privileges of the State, which had been implied by it with reference to the privileges of a city, when it was applied to the inhabitants of the city; and it is in this sense, that the term, citizen, is believed to be generally, if not universally understood in the United States. This, indeed, evidently appears to be the sense in which the term is used in the clause of the Constitution which is under consideration; for the terms "privileges and immunities," which are expressive of the object intended to be secured to the citizens of each State, in every other, plainly import, according to the best usages of our language, something more than those ordinary rights of personal security and property, which, by the courtesy of all civilized nations, are extended to the citizens or subjects of other countries, while they reside among them.

No one can, therefore, in the correct sense of the term, be a citizen of a State, who is not entitled, upon the terms prescribed by the institutions of the State, to all the rights and privileges conferred by those institutions upon the highest class of society. It is true, that females and infants do not personally possess those rights and privileges, in any State in the Union; but they are generally dependent upon adult males, through whom they enjoy the benefits of those rights and privileges; and it is a rule of common law, as well as of common sense, that females and infants should, in this respect, partake of the quality of those adult males who belong to the same class and condition in society, and of course they will or will not be citizens, as the adult males of the same class are or are not so. Nor do we mean to say, that it is necessary, even for an adult male to be a citizen, that he should be in the actual enjoyment of all those rights and privileges which belong to a citizen. He may not only not be in the actual enjoyment of those rights and privileges, but he may even not possess those qualifications, of property, of age, or of residence, which most of the States prescribe as requisites to the enjoyment of some of their highest privileges and immunities, and yet be a citizen; but, to be a citizen, it is necessary, that he should be entitled to the enjoyment of those privileges and immunities, upon the same terms upon which they are conferred upon other citizens; and unless he is so entitled, he cannot, in the proper sense of the term, be a citizen.

It results, then, that the plaintiff cannot have been a citizen, either of Pennsylvania or of Virginia, unless she belonged to a class of society upon which, by the institutions of the States, was conferred a right to enjoy all the privileges and immunities appertaining to the State. That this was the case, there is no evidence in the record to show, and the presumption is against it. Free negroes and mulattoes are, almost everywhere, considered and treated as a degraded race of people; inasmuch so, that, under the Constitution and laws of the United States, they cannot become citizens of the United States.

It is true, that when the plaintiff resides in Pennsylvania and removed to Virginia, the Constitution of the United States had not been adopted, and prior to its adoption, the several States might make any person they chose, citizens. But as the laws of the United States do not now authorize any but a white person to become a citizen, it marks the national sentiment upon the subject, and creates a presumption that no State had made persons of color citizens. And this presumption must stand, unless positive evidence to the contrary were produced. But none such was produced, either as to Pennsylvania or Virginia. On the contrary, it appears from the preamble of the abolition act of Pennsylvania, that the legislature of that State intended to confer upon those whom it was their object to emancipate, only a portion of the freedom which they themselves enjoyed; and they could not, therefore, have designed to give them all the rights and privileges of citizens. Much less could they have designed to bestow those rights and privileges upon those who, like the plaintiff, were not intended to be emancipated; but who might become free, by the failure of their owners to have them registered. And as it respects Virginia, we know that free people of color have never been considered or treated, either in the practice of the country or by the laws of the State, as possessing the rights and privileges of citizens. On the contrary, they are incapable of holding the lowest office in the government; they do not enjoy the right of suffrage, and cannot even be a witness in a civil case. In short, they possess not one of the privileges which are peculiarly characteristic of a citizen, and not even all those which are by courtesy allowed to aliens and strangers, while residing in the State.

The plaintiff, then, not being a citizen, either of Pennsylvania or Virginia, cannot be entitled to the benefit of the clause of the Constitution in question, and the act of 1808, most clearly, cannot be an infraction of it. But, supposing her to have been a citizen of Pennsylvania when she resided there, and by her removal to Virginia, to have become a citizen of that State; she must, upon the same principle have become a citizen of this State, by her removal here; and as a citizen of this State, the clause of the Constitution under consideration, would evidently not apply to the case. But again, admitting her still to have remained a citizen of either of those States; yet, as the act of 1808 operates as well upon citizens of this State, as upon those of any other, it cannot be a violation of the clause of the Constitution in question; for it cannot, upon any principle, be construed to secure to the citizens of other States, greater privileges, within this State, than are allowed by her institutions to her own citizens.

We cannot, therefore, in any light in which we have been able to view the subject, consider the act of 1808 as an infraction of the Constitution of the United States.

Nor can we think it a violation of the Constitution of this State. It was contended, in argument, to be in contravention of the 13th section of the 10th article, which declares, "that all courts shall be open, and every person, for an injury done him, in his land, goods, person, or reputation, shall have remedy by the due course of law, and right and justice administered, without sale, denial or delay."

We cannot admit that this section should be construed to operate as a restriction upon the power of the legislature to pass acts of limitation. It would rather seem to require them to make laws for the expeditious administration of justice, than to permit litigation to be endless. In fact, the power of the legislature to pass such acts of limitation, has been already settled, and cannot now be considered as open for discussion in this court. The act of 1809, by which actions to recover the possession of land from actual settlers, are limited to seven years, and the act of 1813, whereby the saving in the general statute of limitations, in favor of persons out of the country, &c., is repealed, are, in principle, the same as the act of 1808; and they have been decided to be Constitutional and valid, by the repeated adjudications of this court. It is true as was suggested in argument by the counsel for the plaintiff, that every day's detention of a free person as a slave, is a new wrong; but it is equally true, that every day's detention of the possession of land from the rightful owner, is a new wrong; and it only proves that in both instances the limitation operates upon future, and not upon past injuries, and thus affords an argument rather in vindication of the justice, as well as constitutionality of the act, than to prove it to be unconstitutional."

This opinion evinces great research and learning, and, to my mind, is a conclusive answer to all that has been said by my learned friend from Lagrange against the constitutionality of the subject matter now under debate. But, sir, I am not compelled to rely upon this decision alone; I have others.

The same doctrine is maintained by an adjudicated case, which I have in my hand, from the State of Arkansas. The case is short, and I will read it. It was an indictment against a free negro, and is as follows:

The record shows that the appellant, a free negro, was convicted in the court below of a violation of the provisions of the act approved the 20th January, 1843, entitled "An act to prohibit emigration, &c., of free negroes or free persons of color into this State;" and thereupon judgment was rendered accordingly. To reverse this judgment, upon the ground that the act upon which it is founded is unconstitutional and void, is the object of the appeal.

The proceedings appear to have been instituted upon the fourth section of the act, which provides: "That every free negro or mulatto, who may have emigrated to this State prior to the first day of July, 1843, shall, on or before the said first day of July, enter into bond to the State of Arkansas, with good and sufficient security for the use of any county, or of any person that may be damnified by such negro or mulatto, in any sum not less than five hundred dollars, before the Clerk of the County Court, conditioned for the good behavior of such negro or mulatto, and to pay for the support of such negro or mulatto, in case he shall, at any time thereafter, be unable to support himself, and become chargeable to any county in this State; and also to pay and make good to any person in this State any injury or loss which they may sustain, either in their person, money, or property of every description, by the wrongful acts or misconduct of said negro or mulatto."—See Ark. Pamph. Acts 1842-3, p. 62.

The Legislature, no doubt, intended not only this section, but the entire act, as a measure of police necessary to the security and well being of the people of the State. In this view, we are unable to perceive any clause or provision of either the Federal or State Constitution with which it conflicts. If any, it is that clause of the former which declares that "The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of several States." Are free negroes or free colored persons citizens within the meaning of this clause? We think not. In recurring to the past history of the Constitution, and prior to its formation to that of the confederation, it will be found that nothing, beyond a kind of quasi citizenship, has ever been recognized in the case of colored persons. It is a principle settled in all the States of the Union, at least where slavery is tolerated, that a colored person, although free, cannot be a witness where the parties are white persons. See Treatise on the Law of Slavery, by Wheeler, p. 194, and references.

In Kentucky the courts have said that "although free persons of color are not parties to the social compact, yet they are entitled to repose under its shadow." Ely vs. Thompson, 3, Mar. 71: And again in Aury vs. Smith, 1, Litt. Rep., 327, that "prior to the adoption of the Federal Constitution, States had a right to make citizens of any persons they pleased; but as the Constitution does not authorize any but white persons to become citizens of the United States, it furnishes a presumption that none others were citizens at the time of its adoption." The protection of these persons, and the right of property, is provided for to a humane and just extent. To assault, to maim, or to murder a free person of color, is as fully prohibited by our Constitution and laws as the like offenses against one of the white race; and so, as to depredations upon their property or habitations. If citizens in a full and Constitutional sense, why were they not permitted to participate in its formation? They certainly were not. The Constitution was the work of the white race; the government for which it provides, and of which it is the fundamental law, is in their hands and under their control; and it could not have been intended to place a different race of people in all things upon terms of equality with themselves. Indeed, if such had been the desire, its utter impracticability is too evident to admit of doubt. The two races differing as they do in complexion, habits, conformation, and intellectual endowments, could not, nor ever will, live together upon terms of social or political equality. A higher than human power has so ordered it—a greater than human agency must change the decree. Those who framed the Constitution were aware of this, and hence their intention to exclude them as citizens within the meaning of the clause, to which we have referred. Another clause of the Constitution declares that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." Art. 10. Under this provision it will be seen that no restriction is imposed upon State Legislation.

In our State Constitution there is nothing either express or implied, with which, in our judgment, the act in question conflicts. We entertain no doubt, therefore, as to the Constitutionality of the act upon which the prosecution is based.

The same doctrine has been substantially affirmed by the Supreme Courts of the States of Connecticut, Tennessee, Mississippi, Georgia, and more recently by the Supreme Court of the United States.

The sound of your hammer, sir, admonishes me that under the rule I must close. I shall hope, however, at some future day during the discussion upon this question, to finish saying what I would be pleased to say at this time.

Mr. WOLFE. I can see no use, sir, for my part, in referring this subject again to the committee without first coming to some definite action in regard to it. Its merits have been discussed now for some days, and some twenty or more speeches have been made, in regard to it; and if we refer it again, we will, when it is reported back, have to travel anew over the whole ground. It appears to me that the Convention is prepared to go right on and settle it in some way or other, and if, when the section comes up for its engrossment and passage, it should appear proper to make any amendments to it, they can be made, to the satisfaction of the Convention. If we send this section to the proposed committee of thirteen, it is not likely that their report will be satisfactory to one hundred and fifty members; therefore I think we had better proceed and settle the question now. I can see no use in referring the matter at all. I am glad to see that the Convention is considering the question in a calm and deliberate manner; and this I think is one of the reasons why we should act at once and not postpone action until a more exciting debate is sprung up on the question. The section embraces a subject that has created a great deal of excitement throughout the country, and before any new excitements are enkindled we had better dispose of it. Let us go on and amend the section if it be thought necessary, or consider any amendments that may be proposed, until it is made acceptable to the wishes of the majority, and then pass it.

Mr. KILGORE said, he did not like to engage in this controversy; yet, in justice to his constituents, he could not remain silent. He felt a dislike, also, to engage in it, from the fact that a rule, limiting the time of speeches, was hanging over him. He might not occupy anything like a half an hour in his remarks, yet, the fact that he was so limited tended to produce confusion and embarrassment in their utterance.

In the discussion of the propriety of referring this section, no gentleman had as yet been found willing to take upon himself the advocacy of the odious fugitive slave law, which, since its recent passage, had created so much excitement, and upon which, in connection with this section, he desired to speak briefly.

He would remark here that he did not wish to be misunderstood in what he should have to say upon this subject of the fugitive slave bill, so intimately connected with the section then under consideration. He was not in favor of repudiating the fugitive slave law while it remained on their national statute book. Black and odious as it was, he had no objection to its enforcement, provided the officers of justice could carry into execution its provisions. The principle of the bill—the re-capture of the slave by the master—he would not controvert; it was the details of it that were odious in his estimation. It would be the proudest hour in his life, if he should have to surrender his property and personal liberty by a refusal to obey the mandates of an officer who should attempt, in this land of freedom, to carry out those details. While he was willing, as he before said, to see the law carried out, if it could be—although he would not himself assist in its execution—he hoped no gentleman—of any party—would, during their deliberations here, become the advocate of so odious a measure. He was no abolitionist. He was under as little obligation to that party as any gentleman on that floor; but, while he repudiated all connection or fraternity whatever with that class of their fellow-citizens, so far as their peculiar action was concerned, he must be permitted to enter his protest against the doctrine that the slaveholders of Kentucky and other Southern States had the right to use the freemen of Indiana like blood-hounds to catch their slaves.

With regard to the reference proposed, he trusted that the section under consideration would be referred to the committee that had been proposed, without any instructions whatever. He thought this was the most correct and proper course that could be pursued; for no section, more odious in its character than that now before them, could be presented.

He would pass now to the consideration of the rights granted to persons of color under the Constitution of the United States. He would remark in connection, however, that the intention of the provisions of the Constitution with regard to the owners of slaves coming into free States, was very clearly expressed by distinguished writers upon constitutional law, who had stated that slaveholders simply possessed the right of other citizens in the free States to reside in those States, and hold such property as was held by the inhabitants of those States. It was perfectly immaterial as to whether they were citizens of another State; they could only enjoy the same rights and privileges of person and property that were guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States to those residing in the free States, or in other words, that, because they were citizens of another State, or had been such, that no greater restrictions should be placed upon their rights of property than were placed upon the resident citizens. How unnecessary was it, then, to contend that rights were conferred upon the servants of the slaveholder which were denied to the master. The manumitted slave and the free negro, it was said, could emigrate into the free States with their property, but the slaveholder could not with his. Those who had advanced this argument had forgotten that the slaveholder enjoyed the same privileges and immunities that the citizens of the free States enjoyed, and could hold the same kind of property they held. Then why should they complain of a law which put them on an equal footing with their brethren of the free States, who might not look with so favorable an eye upon the institution of slavery, or its advantages, as did its supporters? The negro had rights in a free State, and it was perfectly immaterial, so far as the rights of men were concerned in the free States, whether they were white or black—perfectly immaterial. The black man, as a citizen, possessed rights, and, possessing them, he could claim the protection of the provisions of the Constitution pertaining to the question.

If time permitted, he would go on and furnish many authorities in support of the position he had taken; but he could not at present enter into detail. In furnishing these authorities, however, he should not go to the decisions of the Mississippi courts, because, in nine cases out of ten, especially where the rights of free negroes were concerned, they would not be relied upon or recognized as respectable authority in the court of even a county justice of the peace.

While speaking of these cited authorities, he would say that he was somewhat astonished when he perceived that the distinguished chairman of the committee on rights and privileges (Mr. Owen) had been almost thrown into spasms when he had heard his friend from Monroe (Mr. Foster) read what purported to be the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, when, in truth, it was only the opinion of one of the Judges, who dissented from the opinion of the majority—Judge Taney. The majority of the court had given an opinion, the very reverse of that so triumphantly cited, which was merely the dissenting opinion of one of the Judges. He hoped the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) had examined the matter; if so, he could not have failed to discover the mistake that had been made.

Mr. OWEN. I crossed over to where the gentleman from Monroe sits, for the special purpose of examining it.

Mr. FOSTER would repudiate most emphatically the idea of attempting to palm off upon the Convention the opinion of Judge Taney for the opinion of a majority of the Supreme Court. It was a misunderstanding into which the gentleman had fallen.

Mr. KILGORE said, that he thought it was very queer, to say the least, that the gentleman from Monroe should cite the opinion of one Judge in preference to the opinion of the whole court as an authority. Why did not the gentleman read the opinion of the majority of the court?

A word in relation to what it was proposed to do with reference to persons of color. It was now proposed to carry out the principle of the odious slave law, for the infamous fugitive slave bill and the present law under consideration were of a similar character, and connected with one another. It was proposed to pass a law prohibiting the immigration of persons of color into the State of Indiana, and the Legislature of the State was to be required to pass stringent laws upon the subject—for it was evident to every mind that the law must have stringent penalties attached to its violation, in order to attain the end designed; penalties even more severe in their character than those passed in Kentucky.

Because, sir, continued Mr. K., if free blacks will not come here, slaves will, and we must pass a law far more cruel than the law of Kentucky, or the slaves will make Indiana a kind of city of refuge, it being adjacent to the slave States from which they are driven. What are we to do? We are to declare that any negro or mulatto that sets his foot upon the soil of Indiana is guilty of a misdemeanor, and that we must inflict a certain punishment upon him for the offense, say confinement in the jail; and if the offender be a fugitive from labor, the man who claims him can come and take him back. Will not the people of Kentucky, sir, thank us for our praiseworthy efforts in catching their slaves, and in making slaves for them of the free blacks? How rejoiced will they be on hearing of the passage of such—a law! This will be the alternative offered in Kentucky to the free black man residing there—you will either have to leave the State or be sold into bondage, and if you leave the State and go into Indiana, you will be incarcerated in the penitentiary. And this, too, sir, for daring to be a freeman. How consistent with republicanism,—with the teachings of democracy!

And, sir, you go still further. You say to the officers of the State who administer justice: You must swear solemnly under high heaven to carry out the provisions of this iniquitous law. You cause them to swear that they will violate the laws of God and everything that is sacred, for the purpose of carrying out these provisions that you may engraft upon your Constitution. This, sir, is the necessary result.

If, sir, this law in all its provisions be a good and wholesome law, and there is a general feeling pervading the entire community in its favor, as gentlemen say there is, why engraft it upon the Constitution? The Legislature having charge of all municipal regulations, can enact such a law. They have the power to pass a law excluding persons of color from our State, and to inflict stringent penalties upon all who violate the law. Why not leave the Legislature in charge of this matter, who have the power of passing all laws for the protection of the citizen?

Sir, gentlemen know they are wrong in this matter, and they fear to carry out the question to its necessary bounds. Every principle of humanity, of philanthropy, of justice, and of religion forbids it.

I regretted exceedingly, sir, to hear professors of religion—men whom I am told, have graced the pulpit—taking sides with the advocates of the section reported by the committee. As a mere question of expediency, the gentleman from Putnam (Mr. Farrow) remarked that it was exceedingly unjust that we should deny to the master, who is our friend and neighbor, the privilege of coming here with his negroes and settling among us, and yet turn round and extend to the negro the very privilege that we should say to the master that he should not come into Indiana excepting side by side and on an equality with his slave, as regards the protection of person or property. Well, sir, for one I can see nothing cruel or unjust in such a provision. We simply say to these masters that we will not permit them to bring their chattels into our State to tarnish our land of freedom with the curse of slavery. Sir, our sympathies should be extended rather to the oppressed than to the oppressor.

Mr. FARROW. I would remark to the gentleman from Delaware that I was simply alluding to the question of sympathy, which I thought should be extended in preference to our own color than to any other. I barely stated that in respect to immigration from a slave State, I saw no reason for extending a sympathy and a privilege to the slave which was withheld from the master.

Mr. KILGORE. The unfortunate slave, sir, is not in our land as a matter of choice. The ruthless hands of our people dragged the African from his home and made him a slave. Therefore it is that he is entitled to our sympathy, and those who are engaged day by day riveting the chains of oppression upon him still tighter and tighter, are entitled to no sympathy at my hands. Why, sir, we propose to treat this oppressed class of our population as we have treated no other portion of God's creation. The unfortunate Greek has had our sympathies in his hours of suffering—the oppressed Poleander has had our sympathies, and prayers, and tears; and even since this Convention has assembled, we have had some one or two meetings expressive of our sympathy with the oppressed Hungarians, few of whom have sought our State as a place of refuge. The oppressed, sir, of all nations of the earth have sought this land of freedom as a matter of choice; and while we have been extending our sympathies to them, we have forgotten the defenseless and down-trodden African, whose rights have been trampled in the dust in our midst for centuries. We even shut our ears to his cries for help and mercy, and are ready to stifle the feelings of the philanthropist, and denounce those who express any sympathy for this poor and oppressed portion of God's, creation as fanatics and agitators—as men who would uproot the very foundations of our government.

Let me tell gentlemen who attempt to stifle investigation and act the part of the tyrant to look to themselves in the future. How was it, sir, when years ago these same efforts were made, and when the right of petition was sought to be destroyed? Did not good and great men—the great and lamented John Quincy Adams for instance—foretell the period when these restrictions would be borne away as chaff before the wind, and the rights and privileges of the crushed and forlorn slave be still further extended? And what has been the result? Is not the light of liberty dawning on the benighted African? Are not his shackles being broken? Who would have thought at the time when those restrictions were attempted to be made upon human rights—who would have predicted then that the slave trade would have been abolished in the District of Columbia? And we find too, sir, that Southern territory has been admitted as free territory—a result that has astonished the whole South—and this is the result of the labors of these very agitators. And, sir, let this provision be engrafted upon the Constitution, or the odious slave law and other laws so intimately connected, be put in operation in this State, and you will make this little band of agitators the strongest party in Indiana. The very moment you attempt, in this State, to denounce their sympathies and to oppress the object of their commiseration, you give them strength—you give them the sympathies of the whole community—not for abolitionism, but for the unfortunate object at whom you aim the death-blow of oppression.

If, sir, a provision is to be engrafted in our Constitution prohibiting the emigration of persons of color into this State, and annexing the penalty of imprisonment for its violation, let us not leave it for the Legislature to pass it. Let us not declare that the first Legislature that comes after us shall do that which we are not willing to take the responsibility of doing ourselves. I am willing, sir, to take the responsibility of acting upon the section, and a very decided action too, although I must say I feel very little responsibility in relation to the action of this body. I hardly know, sir, where I stand, for I seem to be in strange company. I expected that this would be a whig or democratic Convention, but I find that whigs and democrats are advocating the same measures. And if, sir, the oppression of the African becomes one of the cardinal principles of the whig party I shall cease acting with that party so far as I am concerned. I may then unite myself with some other party, and if I should we will try to keep that party free from all the ultraisms which seem now to pervade the ranks of other parties.

I have remarked, sir, that many of the gentlemen who advocate this section reside on the borders of Indiana, who were probably overrun with fugitive slaves from Kentucky. Now, sir, I have great sympathy with the Kentuckians, for who has not reason to be proud of the land of his nativity? But I think that one cause of this ultra sympathy with the Kentucky master in preference to the slave is to be found in the fact that many gentlemen living on the borders of this State intermarry in Kentucky, and thus by acquiring property through their wives, perhaps in the shape of negroes, become to have pecuniary interest in that class of people. I do not know that there are any gentlemen here who have thus an interest in Virginia or Kentucky slaves. I have heard stories about some of our great men owning plantations in Kentucky, (a voice—"it is true,") and I feel pretty well assured that such is the fact, and that personal interest in too many instances has prejudiced their views upon this question.

Mr. NEWMAN. I am not disposed, Mr. President, to let this subject pass without saying a few words. This is not a question of a day, nor is it one merely of jest; for it rises far above all mere municipal regulations. It is one of immense consequence to the American people, and for one I have no disposition, no anxiety, to become the member of any party which will come in conflict with the rights of even the humblest portion of the Anglo-Saxon race.

Here, sir, is a population to say the least, one sixth of the entire inhabitants of this glorious Union, and what are you doing with them—what will you do with them? Will we crowd them out, and say there is no place in this broad land of freedom where you can set your foot?

Gentlemen have said, let them go to the land of their forefathers. But how will they go? If gentlemen would have them go let them come forward with some liberal proposition providing for the expense of their journey, and invite them to set their feet upon Africa's soil, there to rest through all time to come. But how can they leave this country without the means? If when this inducement is offered to them to leave this country, they will not leave, then with more propriety you can pass stringent laws providing that they must go.

A suggestion has been made by one of the members, that the free negroes who refuse to go, should be sold or hired into domestic bondage, and that the sum thus obtained shall be applied to defray the expenses of emigration of those who will go. With this proposition, sir, I do not concur. These men have rights of some kind.—And there is, sir, a law of necessity which, whether higher than the law of the land or not, must be set up in opposition to existing or human law—there is no other remedy. These persons must live somehow, and they have that guaranty from the fact of there being born. They are entitled to a place of residence in some portion of God's footstool, and where will you place them?

I am opposed, sir, to the passage of any law which will give them additional privileges. That is the position I have hitherto occupied. Neither do I desire their immigration into this State; for as every one knows, they are not a population to be desired by any means. Yet in the name of a common humanity, let us provide some other means of getting rid of this population, than by passing a law of this character.

It is further agreed that though they are citizens on our soil, yet that they have no rights here; no rights but what we, as a people legislating in our primary capacity, have the power to abrogate at pleasure; or in other words, that we have a right to exclude the whole of them from the State of Indiana, and not merely to exclude them from coming, but to drive out these already here.

If this class of population are not citizens they cannot, sir, appeal to the great charter of the Constitution which secures the citizen in his rights; and if they have no rights under it what is to prevent their extermination? What guaranty have they that they will be protected in any rights belonging to the human family? Will gentlemen go so far as to say that the Constitution of the United States guarantees to them no rights; that they have no protection under it. It seems to me this is going further than any man on this floor would be willing to go.

It is said that they are not citizens of the United States, and the opinions of certain persons have been quoted, who have undertaken to expound the law on the subject that such is the fact. Now, sir, I have examined no authority on this point;—I appeal only to the nature of the case.

When the Constitution of the United States was formed the number of this class of persons in the United States was something near a million. The framers of that instrument contemplated, as is evident from their debates, and the remarks made by the most distinguished and enlightened men, the institution of slavery in the light of a temporary institution, and considered the time was fast approaching when it would cease to exist. What did they contemplate would be done with the negroes? Did any one then look forward to the period when they would be transported beyond the bounds of the United States? If such was the fact I have seen or heard nothing of it. Because, sir, they calculated the system of slavery would yet cease to exist, from the fact that they were careful to exclude the odious term of slave from the Constitution. They have not named the black man or the negro in all that instrument; but have styled them as persons, as members of the human family; and they have so recognized them to a limited extent as the basis of representation.

If then they are the basis of representation, if taxable as other inhabitants of the United States, what position should they occupy? What rights should they enjoy? Let us come right to the question whether they have or have not any rights within the bounds of this Union. If they have none, we can exterminate them, we can transport them, we can confiscate their property, we can do what we will with them.

My friend from Vanderburgh (Mr. Lockhart) read us an opinion from Littel's Kentucky Reports; and I was really sorry that his half hour had expired before he got through with reading the opinion and his comments upon it. I wanted to know these opinions to see what that Convention recognized as the rights of the black man or the mulatto. The question was there raised as to what constituted a "citizen," and the Judge went back to the derivation of the word for the purpose of establishing in what citizenship consisted—an act which as applied to modern times—to the people of the United States, was manifestly wrong. Originally it applied simply to the liberty of a city; whether the term referred to all the franchises of the city, I do not undertake to say, although the Judge, in speaking of it, seemed to consider it to have reference to all the franchises of a city. If that was what was meant by it, it was palpably erroneous as applied to them, as it would be palpably erroneous as applied to the people of the United States. Let any one of our citizens go into the State of Virginia, for instance, and no matter how long he may remain there, unless he possesses certain qualifications not required here, he does not enjoy the same franchises or privileges that citizens residing there enjoy. He would labor under like disabilities if he went into South Carolina. But let the humble Virginian or South Carolinian come into Indiana, and he is at once placed on the same footing with the citizens of Indiana. It is then a local disability they labor under, and nothing more. It is a local disability such as women and minors labor under, who are not admitted to the same franchise that the male portion of the community are admitted to. Does it necessarily follow, sir, that they are not citizens within the true meaning of the term? Will any one say that that is not a fair construction of the instrument, that they are citizens? If then any one may labor under a peculiar disability in a particular State does the principle the less apply to the whites than to blacks, when the blacks labor under certain disabilities? It seems to me it does not. It was remarked by a certain Judge that every person born within the jurisdiction of sovereignty became the subject of a sovereign, and that in this country the term citizen was merely explanatory of the same sense. He was merely subject to the law of the country—the ruling power. And so is every person, black or white, male or female, born within the jurisdiction of the United States subject to the jurisdiction tion of the United States, and of the particular State in which he may reside. That constitutes his inherent right of citizenship. That makes him a citizen and he consequently owes allegiance to the government.

Will you say that the black man owes no allegiance to this government? Then he owes allegiance to some other government, and if he does, to what government? To whom is he bound in allegiance? If he is not a citizen or a subject in this country, where is he a citizen, of whom a subject? Has he no rights?

The second section of the first clause of the Constitution of the United States which has been referred to, does not use the term citizen for any particular class, but speaks simply of the people of the United States. Now who were the black people of the United States at that time? Were they any part of the inhabitants of the United States upon whom the provisions of this instrument were to operate? Were they to be governed by them? Did they owe allegiance to this country? It seems to me most clearly that they were, from the words that representation and direct taxation should be apportioned among the several States who should be included within this Union according to the respective number of inhabitants in each State, who should be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a number of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other persons. This indirect term of expression was adopted in order to avoid the use of the odious term slavery, as it would have been a disgrace to put it upon the great charter of American freedom. And as it was thought, too, by those who framed the Constitution that slavery would soon become extinct, it was considered that if this appellation was retained in the Constitution that it would appear a lasting memento of the fact that slavery had existed among us.

I have come, sir, to the conclusion, from my own cogitations merely, without reference to any authorities, although there are many authorities of varied character, that they are citizens of this government and that we have no constitutional right to pass this enactment. This is a constitutional question, but aside from that it is a grave question, and one with regard to which we should be careful in our action.

This population, sir, is increasing at an unheard of rate. It is rapidly filling up the whole Southern portion of the Union. And what remedy do we propose to alleviate the evil of their increase among us? We may adopt temporary expedients of the kind proposed in the present section, but they will only be temporary. We must go further back. We must provide some permanent remedy. And I, for one, am willing to go as far as any member on this floor to furnish this remedy. If the Convention instead of adopting the present provision will vote a sum of fifty thousand dollars annually for the transportation of these negroes from the State, I would take the responsibility of voting for such a measure.

This would be a just and righteous measure; and if we make such a provision as this we may come forward and say with greater confidence as well as truth, that we are making the most liberal provision for ridding ourselves of this population. With these remarks, Mr. President, as I have nearly exhausted my time, I will take my seat.

Mr. TAGUE. I wish to make a few remarks on this matter and but very few, as I have not said any thing on the subject yet. [Cries of "hear him."] I myself, Mr. President, am in favor of, by some means or other, trying to get rid of this colored population, which is talked of here. I would like to have the indulgence of the Convention; I cannot talk very loud and I would like to be heard, if the Convention pleases. [Cries of "hear him."] It takes me a good while to try to say something, and I frequently fail. [Cries of "consent."]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Watts). The Chair will be much obliged to the Convention, if they will give the gentleman from Hancock a strict attention. [Several voices "consent, consent, consent."]

Mr. TAGUE. As to the justice of the matter of getting shut of these colored people, I must confess it looks to me a middling hard case. However, with regard to prohibiting them from coming here, I think we have a full right. In the first place, self-defence requires it; ["consent"] and from what information I have I find that the surrounding States—at least the State west of us, Illinois, have got a clause in their Constitution similar to the one reported for us to act upon. Also I discover in the debates of the Kentucky Convention, and in their new Constitution, I see they have a clause in their Constitution, that free negroes and mulattoes cannot inhabit that country, unless they are in the penitentiary [laughter]; and if that can be called a habitation they are so far inhabitants. The Convention of Ohio has a proposition of the same kind before them, and in all probability they will pass it. If we leave a gap here open for this colored race to come in, according to what we discover from the Southern States, there are many slaveholders setting their negroes free, and are wanting to get rid of them; and I have been informed that they are shipping them to Indiana now. I have been informed that there were sixty-five sent from North Carolina; that a gentleman of the name of Rush, an honorable and fine man, right adjoining the county which I have the honor to represent, who means to settle them, and in all probability some of them wish to be settled in the county where I reside, and if we don't prohibit them from coming here, we will be inundated with black people entirely. We will either have to leave ourselves, or to prohibit them from coming. [Cries of "consent, consent."] I say that that is the case. I would say let us vote here—and if you permit Dutch people who are white—and the gentleman from Delaware, who is not now in his seat—[several voices, "here he is, here he is," and "go ahead."] I did not understand the gentleman entirely. I was looking at a newspaper and trying to read a little, and I heard him make some remarks relative to foreigners. I thought he had an allusion probably to my Dutch brethren. [laughter and "no, no,"]—and it set me to thinking right off with regard to this matter before the Convention, about referring this back to another committee. I did not know but that when they reported from that committee, that they might take the matter into consideration and take the Dutch in also [laughter]. I have frequently heard remarks made about the "black Dutch" &c., and I don't know what the movement is here. Of course I am distinctly opposed to referring this, on that ground, for one thing.

Another reason, too, why I am opposed to it, we have now already spent some four or five days in discussing this matter, and should it be again referred it will probably be a week or ten days before the committee will report again to this House. We have already business enough before us for a month or two longer, certain; and, in all probability, if we take the business in its regular order, this will come out in the rear, and it will not come up until next harvest [laughter]; and the gentlemen that have been speaking upon it would forget all that they have said, and they would discuss every section over again, and there would be weeks spent, and we should have the work discussed all over again. Now, we had better stick to what we have got. I find that when gentlemen rest over only one night they come here pretty well filled up with gas again. [Great laughter.] Now I am in favor of getting this matter to a close sometime early, and we can as easily amend these sections now in the Convention as we can when they are reported back to a committee. We have got a start on it, and I think we had better hold on. As my friend from Sullivan observed the other day, if we have a hook fast we had better hold on and bring this matter to a close as soon as we can. It does appear to me that on this matter the sense of the Convention is understood, if we can only fix some way to bring it to a vote. Now, I am pretty much in favor of the section as reported by the committee. There might, perhaps, be a slight amendment, but I am willing to swallow it just as it stands; or if it can be arranged or amended so as to get shut of these colored people any sooner by it, I am in favor of that, for their own benefit as well as for our convenience. I have not at any time yet called the previous question.

[Cries of "No, no, no, no; not yet; it would be wrong; don't do it."] Well, I was going to, but I will not this time. I did not intend to make a speech ["go on, go on"]; I only intended to make a few remarks, and I will now take my seat; but I do hope the Convention will bring this matter to a close. I ought to be ashamed of my conduct in making these remarks. ["No, no," and "all right."] They are not to the point, as they ought to have been, but I hope the Convention will pardon me.

Mr. BLYTHE and Mr. STEELE having risen together, there were loud cries of "Steele, Steele."

Mr. BLYTHE. I will give way to the gentleman from Wabash. [Applause.]

Mr. STEELE. I hope the Convention will come to order. I did not anticipate saying one word upon this important subject. I can very justly say, sir, that it has detained this Convention some three or four days, and has already cost the State of Indiana some thousands of dollars, and we are no nearer the object than when we first set out.

My friend from Hancock (Mr. Tague) labors under some difficulty to know in what manner the Convention will be enabled to conclude this important matter. In speaking of the State acting in self-defense, he reminded me of an anecdote which I once heard of a Kentuckian, [Cries of "hear him, hear him," and "let's have it,"] and the probability is that it would apply to the gentleman's argument in reference to these blacks we have so much difficulty about in the whole nation. Well, the man in Kentucky was thanking his Maker for the good soil, and the extensive range, and the large quantities of corn they raised; yet, he said, there was one important obstacle in the way of continued success. He remarked to the Lord that the Indians discommoded them very much. "Well, now," says he, speaking to the Lord, "what shall we do with them? Good Lord, what shall we do with them? We cannot rid ourselves of the difficulty. Nothing short of Thy power can do it. Thou canst take them and curse them, and damn them, and blow them up like peelings of onions." [Roars of laughter.] Now, the gentleman's argument amounts to that, and it cannot amount to anything more. But this is a grave subject, and one, although it has already occupied much of the time of this Convention, that requires a reference to the committee called for. In none of the forms and shapes in which it has been presented to this Convention, has it been placed on a ground on which I could honestly vote for it. We have it in the first place with instructions to re-commit to a select committee, and there are several amendments. Thus has the whole time of this argument covered the main question that has been before us, and to remove the drift and get the matter in its proper shape, I believe we ought, long ere now, when the proposition was made by the gentleman from Floyd, to have made a reference and got it back again in better order than it now stands in. First, my conscience taught me that we ought to have these sections separated. We ought first to prohibit the immigration of these negroes and mulattoes into this country, and in the second place we ought to consider the section preventing them from inheriting property. If the question had been on these sections separately, gentlemen could have voted on them long since, and the question could have been settled long since.

With the gentleman from Marion (Mr. Morrison) I am well aware that the State of Indiana loudly calls for a prohibition of the immigration of men of color; but I think the interest of the country as loudly calls for opposition to the second branch of the subject. By making this reference, we can decide upon each branch. But by dividing them the Convention can go further. Some gentlemen say the section prohibiting immigration is not stringent enough; and if it is again referred, the committee can report back with such a penal clause as they may think proper, and they can subdivide these sections as they may deem best, and be more cool, more dispassionate, more deliberate than this whole body can be upon this important subject as it now stands before them. These being my feelings on the subject, I would vote directly for a re-commitment of this matter as called for by the gentleman from Floyd; and I am with the gentleman from Delaware, and would rather see it naked and without a dress—without any restriction; and I would leave it to the sound wisdom of the committee to report back to this Convention what they may deem to be of the most interest and of the greatest advantage to the State.

Now for a moment—and with that I will conclude—let us anticipate who this committee will be. It is to be composed of a selection from the several judicial districts of the State of Indiana, and that selection will be made by the Chair, of the most prudent, cool, and deliberate men of these districts; men well adapted to draft a report and bring it back to this Convention. For these reasons I ask the Convention to re-commit it and let us proceed to something else, and see if we can make any further progress in completing the revision of the Constitution of Indiana. Let me say to gentlemen that I am beginning to get anxious to get home, and I would like to see our work progress a little faster. This is the seventh week of the session, and if we do not progress faster than we have done, we will not get home till corn planting time, or in time to make our gardens next season.

Now, sir, we had a new rule the other day limiting the speakers to half an hour each, and I find that even with that rule, we have not gained much ground [several voices, "not one bit"]. Sir, before we advance in this Convention we must come to the conclusion to govern ourselves [hear, hear!]. One reason why I voted against that resolution was this—will we send it abroad to the country—will gentlemen of talent and observation let it go out to the country, that they are not competent to govern themselves? [Hear him! hear him!] No; never will I give such a vote; and I am fully of opinion that the Convention can pass on with half the length of argument, and secure to the citizens of Indiana as good a Constitution as they would have if we keep talking here for months [hear, hear]. And let me say to this Convention that I have not been lengthy in my arguments; but I have come to the conclusion that they shall be made shorter; and where I believe that the citizens of Indiana have an interest at stake, I will merely explain the reasons why I vote thus and so. Let us control ourselves; let us bring our own words and thoughts into subjection. Let us consolidate them and propose them in few words, and go on from this time forward and prove to the citizens of Indiana that we are revising the Constitution in earnest.

Mr. BLYTHE, having obtained the floor,

Mr. LOCKHART said, that, as it was late in the day, and the time had arrived at which the Convention usually adjourned, with the consent of the gentleman from Vanderburg he would move that the Convention do now adjourn.

Pending the question on the motion to re-commit the section and amendments,

The Convention adjourned.

REMARKS OF MR. BIDDLE.

Made in Convention, Saturday, Nov. 2d, on the subject of the tenure of State Officers.

Mr. BIDDLE—Mr. PRESIDENT: I do not rise to debate this proposition, but would say a word however to the question which seems to be in controversy between the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) and the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Rariden,) namely, whether a State Constitution is restrictive or delegative in its character. It is undoubtedly restrictive. The people of a State in their primary condition, before the institution of any government, possess the entire human sovereignty, and are restrained only by the laws of nature and of God. When they enter into civil government each individual yields up as much of this natural right as shall be necessary to the rational liberty of the whole. This is what I understand to be the true distinction between natural and civil liberty. There can be no government without restriction. When gentlemen say they will not restrict the people, they say they will have no government. The people in their cool moments deliberate together and settle what shall be their rule of action when the day of excitement comes—when they are disturbed by fear, hope, interest, passion, hatred, love, and the thousand motives that unbalance the human understanding, and break up the human heart to its very depths. This is what I call self-government. And, Mr. President, there is not a sublimer moral spectacle on earth than to see vast bodies of men, States, Nations, thus nobly actuated. It is the yielding up of individual interest to the common good, the subjugation of passion to reason, and a complete triumph of moral right over the physical arm. This, sir, is true self-government.

The Constitution of the United States, however, in this respect is the reverse of a State Constitution. That instrument is one of delegated powers only. The United States have no natural right to govern the individual States, no more than one State has to govern another. They are not a government strictly, but a confederation of governments. Congress, because it has not the natural sovereignty, can do nothing which is not expressly delegated, or fairly implied in the Constitution of the United States; a State, because it has the entire natural sovereignty, can do all things not prohibited by its Constitution.

But, Mr. President, I deny that the proposition before the Convention is restrictive of the people proper, that is, of the many—the masses. It restrains the few who hold office, for the benefit of the many who do not. The tendency of it will be to fairly distribute the honors and profits of office, and to insure the pure administration of the functions of the State. Sir, it is a law running throughout nature that like begets like; power begets power, sir, and unrestrained, will perpetuate itself. I go for the proposition.

WEDNESDAY, Nov. 20.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. STEELE.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The PRESIDENT announced the first business in order to be the consideration of the motion to re-commit with instructions, the section relating to the prohibition of the immigration of negroes into the State, and the right of those already here, to hold property.

The gentleman from Vanderburgh, (Mr. Blythe,) being entitled to the floor,

Mr. GREGG desired that the order of business might be suspended in order to enable him to introduce a motion that the half hour rule be suspended for the present. In some remarks which he had submitted to the Convention on this subject, he had occupied more than half an hour, and he hoped that other gentlemen would have the same privilege accorded to them. He was satisfied that no gentleman, who desired to express his views upon the subject could do justice to himself if he were restricted to half an hour.

Mr. BLYTHE. I may be permitted to remark, Mr. President, that the motion of the gentleman from Jefferson, is made without any application on my part. I am content to abide by the rule.

The question being taken on the motion to suspend the order of business to enable the gentleman from Jefferson to make his motion to dispense with the half hour rule, it was decided in the negative.

So the order of business was not suspended.

Mr. BLYTHE. The question which has been for some days before the Convention, has been, by most of those who have spoken on it, divided into two parts; one resting on the Constitutional objection to any action by the Convention; and the other on the injustice of the section which has been proposed.

As was remarked some days since, by the gentleman from Floyd, I think that, unless we can in the first place, dispose of the Constitutional objection, which has been urged to our action in the premises, it is useless to discuss the matter further.

This question out of the way, then, free from embarrassment, we can discuss the other; and, as my time is limited, and as the Constitutional question embraces a great many points, I shall, for fear that I may find myself without time, in the first place, direct my attention to that part of the question which, in my judgment, is most important, and which is most easily supported by judicial authority.

On yesterday, sir, the gentleman from Monroe, (Mr. Foster,) read from the opinion of Chief Justice Taney, a recognition of the principle which we seek, by the first clause of this section, to establish—the principle which, in my opinion, is the correct one. The gentleman from Delaware, in the afternoon of the same day, in commenting on this part of the case, remarked that the gentleman from Monroe had read from the dissenting opinion of the Chief Justice, and that he (the Chief Justice) was not sustained by the court pronouncing judgment in the case.

Now, sir, it does seem to me that the gentleman from Delaware should have read the opinion and judgment of the court before undertaking to pronounce so authoritatively in relation to it.

I undertake to say, after having examined the opinion of the Supreme Court, or rather of a majority of the court, in that case, that they agreed with Chief Justice Taney in the opinion that he expressed in relation to the point now at issue between us; I undertake to say that, in that very case, the Supreme Court of the United States, sanctioned and sustained the principle for which I contend. There was a difference of opinion, it is true; and the opinion of the Chief Justice was, it is true, technically speaking, a dissenting opinion, but what was the difference of opinion between the majority of the members of the court, and the Chief Justice? It was this: A question had arisen under a legislative enactment of the State of Massachusetts. One section of the act provided that paupers, idiots, lunatics, and other persons likely to become a State charge, should not be permitted to land from vessels from foreign ports; and the third section provided that a tax should be levied on all other alien passengers, all persons not embraced within the description of paupers, idiots, and lunatics; and this tax was to be paid by the master of the vessel, before his passengers should be permitted to land. And the question upon which Chief Justice Taney differed from his associate justices, was this: whether this was a police or revenue arrangement. If it was a revenue arrangement, then it was in contravention of a clause of the Constitution of the U. States; and therefore, null and void: if it was a police arrangement, it was clearly within the scope of their jurisdiction, and Chief Justice Taney was right. Now, what is the opinion that was delivered by the Chief Justice, on that question? It is this:

"I think it, therefore, to be very clear, both upon principle and the authority of adjudged cases, that the several States have a right to remove from among their people, and to prevent from entering the State, any person, or class or description of persons, whom it may deem dangerous or injurious to the interests and welfare of its citizens; and that the State has the exclusive right to determine, in its sound discretion, whether the danger does or does not exist, free from the control of the general Government."

Now let us see how far this opinion of the Chief Justice is supported by the other members of the court. Justice Grier delivered the opinion of the court against sustaining the law; but after setting out in full the several sections of the act, he proceeds:

"It must be borne in mind (what has been sometimes forgotten) that the controversy in this case is not with regard to the right claimed by the State of Massachusetts, in the second section of this act, to repel from her shores lunatics, idiots, criminals, or paupers, which any foreign country, or even one of her sister States, might endeavor to thrust upon her; nor the right of any State, whose domestic security might be endangered by the admission of free negroes, to exclude them from her borders. This right of the States has its foundation in the sacred law of self-defense, which no power granted to Congress can restrain or annul."

Now, sir, could the Supreme Court have recognized the right which we claim to exercise, in more unequivocal terms? And at the conclusion of the opinion, when its several points are grouped together, the distinction between police and revenue arrangements is still recognized and kept up.

And yet it is a dissenting opinion. Well now if this remark had been made by one who was not a lawyer, it might have been permitted to pass, but when it is made by one who is a lawyer, and who knows the force and effect of such a declaration that the opinion quoted is but a dissenting opinion, it seems to me, certainly, that it ought not to pass without remark.

Then I say, sir, that we have the very highest judicial authority known to the Constitution and laws of the land. The right which we claim is a right which the Constitution says is unquestionable; and what is its foundation? The right of self defense. The right to guard ourselves against the dangers which are hinted at in that decision, dangers which every one will recognize who recognizes the principle there laid down.

It is a principle, sir, upon which you and I and all of us act every day we live. We have not only the right to guard our property, but we have the right to guard our firesides, our domestic and social institutions and relations. Sir, we carry it with us, and act upon it in all the relations and business of human life.

But we are not alone with this decision. It is a little remarkable that in questions of this character, gentlemen, with all their industry and research, have as yet been unable to produce to us a solitary decision on their side of the question; and yet we have decisions made by the courts of Connecticut, of Tennessee, and of Arkansas, and of old Kentucky herself, upon this very question.

The gentleman from Vanderburgh (Mr. Lockhart) alluded to this Kentucky decision yesterday, and it is the only legal decision I have yet seen which gives the true history and meaning of the word citizen.

Gentlemen who take the other view of this question, if they have examined a note by Chancellor Kent, which was referred to some days ago by the gentleman from Monroe, (Mr. Read,) will there find that Kent expresses the opinion that free negroes are citizens within the meaning of the Constitution. And I will venture to say that that is about the only respectable authority they can find sustaining that position.

Now let us look for one moment at this authority. The cases to which I have referred as having been decided by the courts of Connecticut and Tennessee, are referred to in a note. In the same note, after remarking that citizen and subject are convertible terms, and that birth upon the soil is a test of subjection to the government, although it is not necessarily of citizenship, he says: "The better opinion, I should think was, that negroes or other slaves, born within or under the allegiance of the United States, are natural born subjects, but not citizens. Citizens under our Constitutions and laws mean free inhabitants, born within the United States or naturalized under the law of Congress. If a slave born in the United States be manumitted, or otherwise lawfully discharged from bondage, or if a black man be born within the United States, and born free, he becomes thenceforward a citizen, but under such disabilities as the laws of the States respectively may deem expedient to prescribe to free persons of color."

Now can any one tell me what this means, or what test of citizenship is here given?

Now, I want to give both sides of the case, and there is authority on the other side, and I will venture to say there is no authority, but that can be produced on that side. Let us look at it for one moment. Citizen and subject are convertible terms. The slave, though born on the soil, is not a citizen but a subject, while the free negro born on the soil, but exercising none of the rights, privileges, or immunities of citizen, having but very few other rights beyond those of a slave, is not merely a subject but also a citizen; but then he is a citizen under such disabilities and restrictions as the States may see fit to impose upon him.

He departs from the test which he, in the first place lays down, that is the place of birth. But how does he supply it? Not at all. It is left undefined and uncertain, and we must look somewhere else for a test, under such restrictions and disabilities as the States may see fit to impose. What restrictions? Taking away from him some one or more of the privileges which we as citizens enjoy. What are those privileges? Personal security. The right to hold and transmit property. The right to vote and to hold office, or in other words, to participate in the affairs of Government. Well, now, the law may take from the colored person some of these privileges. He is a citizen under such disabilities as the State may impose. If the State may take away one privilege, it may another, and if it may take away two, it may take away all, as a matter of course. The free colored citizen of New York, so designated and styled in the Constitution and laws of the State, when he removes to Indiana, though in the State of New York he has been accustomed to exercise the privilege of marching up to the ballot-box and casting his vote, encounters at once a power which says to him, you may enjoy all the other privileges of a citizen, save and except that of voting and holding office. Now is there any difference in principle between depriving him of either one, or both of these privileges and depriving him of the privilege of holding property? If you deprive him of the one, why not deprive him of the other also? If you take away the privilege that is of chief value in his estimation, you may as well strip him of all the others. And when you have done all this, what do you leave to him? You leave him the privilege of locomotion, and that is all. You do not imprison him; he can cross the river, and at the very moment, in the language of the gentleman from St. Joseph, when he sets his foot upon our soil his shackles fall off and he stands erect a freeman. He has the glorious freedom of locomotion. Well, now, if you by law, can strip him of all these, what law prohibits you to strip him of the only one that is left? Can any one give me a reason why he talks about principle, the Constitution, and citizen's rights, and at the same time proposes to strip the free colored citizen of some of the rights of a freeman? Why is it that if we may strip him of one right we may not of the rest? There is no good reason that can be given.

A day or two since the gentleman from Lagrange assumed to lay down several fundamental propositions in relation to this question. It is not my purpose to enter into a detailed examination of those propositions, for I have not time.

But his argument amounts to this: if the free negro of Massachusetts and New York is entitled to the privileges of citizenship in those States, he is entitled to the like privileges in every other State. Now to show the fallacy of his argument, let us follow its consequences and see if it does not inevitably lead us into sundry absurdities. Why does he select as an instance the case of the free negro of New York? Is it because in that State he has super-added to his other privileges the right to vote? Does he not by this selection evidently make this right to vote one of the criteria of citizenship? He is a citizen of New York, so recognized, as Chancellor Kent says, by the Constitution and laws of that State. Very well. He removes to Indiana, where we recognize his right to hold and transmit property; nothing more. How is that? Is it not a violation of the Constitution of the United States. Unquestionably it is, according to the argument of the gentleman from Lagrange; because we deprive a citizen of New York of one of the most invaluable privileges of a citizen, and the Constitution of the United States says that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States. Then I say, that if the argument be true, once a citizen, always a citizen, and there is no power in the State of Indiana to deprive him of the privileges of a citizen. But he is a citizen to all intents and purposes, and entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities of the citizens of the several States, and he has as much right as you have to use the ballot box, and to participate in all the affairs of government. Nay more; he is entitled to sit in this Hall, and in the Hall adjoining this; he is entitled to still more: he is entitled to preside as Chief Executive officer over the destinies of the State. And why? Because he is entitled to all the privileges of a citizen, and there is no escape from the conclusion. But the gentleman from Lagrange, conscious of the weakness of his position, yields the whole argument by saying that we have a right to exclude the pauper, but have not the right to exclude the free negro. On what principle, I ask, do you exclude the pauper. It is on the principle recognized by the decision of the Supreme Court, that we have the right of self-defense. Yet the pauper, destitute as he may be of all property, a vagabond on the face of the earth, may be a citizen, and clothed with as many political rights as you or I, or the proudest citizen can claim to enjoy; and if he go to a sister State, he is entitled to go to the ballot box and vote; he is entitled to hold office. But poverty is a crime, and we may take from our State Treasury money for the purpose, if necessary, of lining our borders with musketeers, to keep out those who are unfit to associate with us, and why? That we may protect the State from pecuniary burden. And yet when the question is, whether we will protect our social and domestic relations and institutions; whether we will preserve from contamination the race of which we are a part, we have no power to do it! [Applause.] And this is the test of citizenship? Away with all such arguments.

But one step further. The argument of the gentleman makes the slave a citizen. The bondmen of the Southern States are just as much entitled to sit in the Legislative Halls of Indiana, and to hold the highest office in the gift of the people of the State, as our own free born natural or adopted citizen.

One step further: If every free negro of Massachusetts and of New York, is a citizen, then all who enjoy the same, or similar privileges, must be citizens. The indian is therefore a citizen—why? Apply the test. The gentleman from Lagrange says, that he is a citizen who is entitled to personal liberty, to hold and transmit property, personal and real. Apply this test, and the indian is a citizen. But, I ask, has the government of the United States power to lay its hand on a citizen of Indiana, and remove him beyond the borders of the State? No, Sir! No, Sir! Let the government of the United States attempt it, and there would be a blaze enkindled throughout the State of Indiana, that could not by any possibility, by any power on the face of God's earth, be extinguished. [Applause.] Yet the government of the United States will lay its hand upon a whole tribe, a whole nation of indians, and remove them to a remote territory. If they are citizens according to the test of the gentleman from Lagrange, they are citizens in the same acceptance and sense, as the free colored person.

Then the argument is false, because it leads us to the most ridiculous absurdity in its consequences.

There is one word that I want to say in regard to the other branch of the question, and I quit this Constitutional argument, for the purpose of doing so. Gentlemen talk to us about humanity and justice, and that in time to come, when the storms of passion shall be stilled, and the mists of prejudice shall have rolled away from our vision, we ourselves will blush at the work in which we are this day engaged. They talk of tyranny. But who are the tyrants? Sirs, you yourselves have avowed on this floor, time and again, that you would not grant to the negro, free or not free, the inestimable privilege of voting or holding office. There you have placed your hand on him, and you are thrusting him lower down in the scale of social and political privileges. I take bolder ground than you, and say, either recognize this principle of exclusion, or its antagonist principle:—that negroes shall be—as I believe, in all sincerity, they never can be—citizens on an equality with ourselves. I believe the Almighty himself, has written the decree with his own hand, and that there is no power in man, or in human legislation to eradicate or blot it out—it is written by the hand of the Deity himself [applause].

Now I go one step further than you. I would, if I believed as you do, either remove them to a place where they may be free men, surrounded by their peers, where they may stand erect amongst their equals in all the dignity of freemen, or else I would admit them as citizens with us. If we cannot exclude them, I say to you live up like men to the profession of your faith. You say we must elevate him. Then why do you not come up to your work, and, instead of recording your votes against his right of suffrage, take him by the hand and lift him up to the same platform of social and political privilege upon which you stand? The elevation of which you talk, he can never attain, while your votes shut up the pathway to the enjoyment of the highest and most valued privileges of a freeman. You taunt us with tyranny. But is this your philanthropy? Is it thus you would elevate the black man? I would thank no man for such philanthropy, displayed in my behalf. I would thank no man for saying that he sought to elevate me, when he said merely, you may have the privilege of coming to our State, of settling down amongst us, of acquiring, holding, and transmitting property; but those privileges of freemen, which we value above all things, in defense of which we would shed every drop of our blood, those privileges you cannot enjoy. I would thank no man to place me so low in the scale of social and domestic relations; and yet this is the humanity of the gentleman. Glorious humanity it is—

The gentleman's remarks were here arrested by the expiration of the half hour.

Mr. BASCOM. I do not rise, Mr. President, to discuss the merits of this question; but to express the hope that the section may be recommended. As for myself, sir, I have nothing to gain or lose by opposing the section as it now stands. I came here, perhaps, with as unprejudiced views as any member of this Convention; but I tell gentlemen who are so ready to exult at a supposed victory, that it would be well for them to pause and reflect, lest after a fancied triumph here, a power should come down upon them at the ballot-box, which they will not be able to resist. It would be well for them to consider whether it is not better to pass provisions that will meet the views of the people of the State, and not attempt to put into the Constitution such an odious provision as this.

Mr. MURRAY. I rise merely to say a few words in explanation of the vote that I shall give upon this question. I shall vote against the proposition, because it is in opposition to a principle I was taught in youth, and have cherished in riper years; and, the people of the district which I have the honor to represent are opposed to it. Having been a member of the committee which reported the section, I feel bound to say that I saw no disposition on the part of the committee to do anything that was contrary to the interests of the State. There was a difference of opinion among the members of the committee. Some dissented, but dissented silently. For myself I thought it better to make this explanation to the Convention than to oppose the report of the committee or to offer a minority report. All that I have heard on the subject cannot chase from my mind the heart and home words of memory. We are, sir, by a provision such as this, trampling under foot the principles that are embodied in the Constitution of the United States—principles which are founded upon the natural rights of man. Thousands and thousands of the oppressed of other lands are arriving at our ports, seeking a refuge in what they consider a land of freedom, a home for the oppressed, a place of refuge for the down-trodden of all the nations of the earth. While I believe that every member of this Convention is acting in conformity with what he conceives to be the best interests of Indiana, I cannot concede this great principle for the sake of mere expediency. Look at the reports of your police courts; you will find that nine-tenths of the cases of disturbances of the peace, arise from the conduct of these foreigners. The statistics of the country will show the immense sums of money that you are compelled to expend annually on account of these people. Yet there is no law to prevent their landing upon your shores; there is no law by which you can repel them. I regard this subject as being well worthy of the serious attention of the Convention. I would go any lengths consistent with humanity in order to separate the colored from the white race. I have no wish to see them amalgamated. I have no desire to see those strongly contrasted colors blended into one. I have no sympathy with the abolitionists. I believe if that party had not sprung up—if the sentiment which animates them had been clearly defined and understood at the commencement—before this day, the whole of this State of this Union would have emancipated their slaves. I believe there is something wrong about the whole thing; but in order to rid ourselves of trouble and of danger, and of the degradation, if you please, of mingling with those who come within our borders, it seems to me we are going too far; and it seems to me that we are trespassing upon the original rights of man—upon the very principles of civil liberty. Sir, all those who may come to the State hereafter can do the State no harm; they will never hold office—public sentiment will prevent it; public sentiment will draw the line of distinction between the white and the colored race; and if there are some so depraved, so lost to all sense of shame as to mingle with them, the loss is their own. I hold that we should never infringe upon the principles of civil liberty for any object that is a mere matter of expediency.

[NOTE.—Mr. Niles followed in a speech occupying half an hour, but as his remarks were cut short for want of time, the Reporter, at his request, withholds the manuscript till he shall have an opportunity to finish what he desired to say upon the subject. It will appear hereafter.]

Mr. HENDRICKS said: Mr. President, if I express the wishes of the people whom I have the honor to represent in this Convention, I will be compelled to vote for the first part of this section. The second part I do not expect to support. The reasons against the latter part of the section were so well given the other day by the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) that they need not be considered by me.

What I have to say upon this question I desire to submit in this connexion, as it will be rather in continuation of the argument of the gentleman from Vanderburgh (Mr. Blythe). It is assumed by gentlemen who oppose this measure, that it is inconsistent with, and in violation of, the second section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States, which is as follows:

“The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of the citizens of the several States.”

And in favor of this position the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Newman) and the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles) have given their opinions. I desire that this question shall be fully discussed; for if the section be in violation of the Constitution of the United States, all argument as to the expediency and propriety of its adoption is unnecessary. This would cut off all further debate. And, sir, I will say, that I can conceive of no graver Constitutional question that could occupy our attention. It involves not only a right and power to pass this measure, but, sir, it might reach to many other questions and measures. It involves, sir, the sovereignty of our State, her right to the exclusive control and regulation of many of her domestic affairs, and the power of other States to interfere with our domestic policy, and prescribe what shall constitute citizenship in Indiana, and the rights, privileges, and obligations resulting therefrom.

I propose to examine this question further; not by the authorities and decisions of the courts that bear upon it, for this has been thoroughly and ably done by the gentleman from Vanderburgh, but by a few general principles and universally admitted rules of construction.

And I would first suggest, that the argument of the gentlemen on the other side destroys itself. It is contended that the other States may, and that New York and Massachusetts have, by their laws, constituted free blacks within their borders their citizens, and that under this clause of the Constitution of the United States they have the right of emigrating into any of the States, and of acquiring and holding property. But, sir, how and by what authority do they become such citizens of those States? The answer is direct, that the States had the power, and by their laws made them citizens; that, for instance, Massachusetts, by the exercise of that sovereignty which is hers as an independent State, made those citizens who were not so before. This very argument admits that each State has the power to prescribe what shall constitute citizenship within her limits—a power that must of necessity be exclusive.

In giving construction to any written law, it is proper to look to its subject matter; and the words should be taken in such sense as will be reasonable, as applicable, and referable to such object. To state the rule more distinctly, the words should be construed in reference to the subject matter. If we apply this rule of construction to the section under consideration, we will find that the word "citizen," as used therein, does not include the black population; for whom, sir, was the Constitution provided as a form of government? I should rather ask by whom it was formed, for it is the government of those by whom it was constituted. The gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Newman) said that it was provided as a government for the whole population found within its limits, whether white or black; and to sustain himself in this position, the gentleman read from the preamble to the Constitution the following:

"We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union," &c., "do ordain and establish this Constitution," &c.

This is the language of the people of the United States through their delegates—it is the language of those who were represented in that Convention. It cannot be the language of others. Delegates in the Convention could only speak for and use the language of those whom they represented—from whom they received their power. The Convention was composed of the delegates of the free white population of the United States, and in no instance was any delegate in that Convention selected by a black population, or by a mixed population of whites and blacks. The Constitution is the form of government for the free white people of the United States, constituted for their good, formed by them to secure "the blessings of liberty to themselves and their posterity." Of whom does this section then speak, when it uses the word "citizens?" If we say that it was intended, as is insisted, to secure the rights, the equality of the citizens of all the States, who, I ask again, were intended by the word "citizens?" Most assuredly the free white people; those by whom and for whom, and to secure whose rights, liberty, and equality, the government was established; those who owe to the government allegiance, and who are entitled in return therefor from the government to protection, security, equality.

Again, sir, in giving construction to this section of the Constitution of the United States, we must look to the circumstances existing at the time of its formation, and interpret the language as then used and understood. At that time none were recognized as citizens of any of the States but the white population. Gentlemen say that the States of Massachusetts and New York have made negroes and mulattoes citizens; but at the time this language was used they were not recognized as citizens in any of the States. The language of this section when adopted did not include them, and we cannot now construe or interpret it so as to include a class that it did not then embrace. The language of the Constitution of the United States cannot be made to change in compass or meaning with the changing laws of the States.

To ascertain the propriety of any proposed construction of a law, it is proper to look to its tendency and consequences, and if these should be ridiculous, or unreasonable, we say this could not have been the intention of the law-makers. Let us examine by this rule, the construction of this clause of the Constitution of the United States, contended for by gentlemen on the other side. They say, that if a State grant to any one, the privileges of citizenship, he is entitled to these privileges in all the other States. Suppose then, sir, Massachusetts should make colored men citizens, with the right of voting, holding office, testifying in courts, serving on a jury, appearing in court in person, &c., these same privileges he would carry with him to Indiana, if he should immigrate to this State. Or suppose the same State should declare married women, and minors over the age of fifteen years, competent to vote, hold office, make contracts, wills, &c., they would carry the same rights with them upon emigrating to another State. This construction, sir, would enable any one State, to regulate and control the question of citizenship, and the "privileges and immunities of citizens" in all the other States, itself, at the same time being subject to the same control, from the other States. This, sir, would be a result, which would not only destroy the sovereignty of the States, but their independence, and separate existence, and throw their laws and institutions into inextricable confusion. Such a result could not have been intended, or contemplated by the framers of that instrument. It is absurd to suppose, that the framers of the Constitution of the United States, intended to introduce into it any provision which would necessarily cause a conflict between the laws and institutions of the different States.

The correct construction of this second section of the fourth article of the Constitution as I suppose, is, that the persons, or inhabitants of each State, shall enjoy all the privileges and immunities in the other States, which persons of the same class enjoy therein. That no State shall grant privileges or immunities to citizens of one State, which she refuses to persons of the same class in other States. For example, Indiana shall not by law provide, that persons immigrating from the State of Ohio, shall be entitled to vote or hold office in this State, sooner or under less restriction than persons of the same class coming from Kentucky. This construction is not liable to the same objection as that which I have examined, and, sir, it leads to a result worthy the Federal Government, the perfect equality of the States.

I am the more convinced of the correctness of this construction, by an examination of the context—the other sections of the same article. I find this section, concerning the right of citizenship, in article IV. of the Constitution of the United States, an article nearly every provision of which is to secure State rights and equality. The first section secures full faith and credit to the public records and judicial proceedings of each State. The second section (a part of which we are considering) secures the equality of the States, as to their citizens, and the rights of the several States to demand and recover fugitives from justice or labor. The third section provides for the admission of new States into the Union, and secures the unity of the old States, and the regulation of the Territories of the United States; and the last section of the article secures to each State a republican form of government, protection against invasion, and domestic violence. Finding this second section in such connection, in an article almost wholly devoted to secure State rights and equality, I infer, that it was intended by the framers of that instrument to secure the equality of the several States, as to their citizens, and not the political equality of all the persons in the United States. This construction does not impair the sovereignty of the States, within their spheres, but maintains and secures it, and with it the provision excluding free negroes and mulattoes from immigrating to our State, is not inconsistent.

Mr. President, I will not detain the Convention longer with further argument upon this branch of the subject, but will very briefly consider the question of the right and propriety of our preventing the further immigration of free blacks and mulattoes into our State, and notice some of the objections urged by those who oppose it.

Those who favor this measure are charged with pandering to a pro-slavery sentiment. For myself, sir, in reference to this charge, I have only to say that I have no sympathies for the institution of slavery. My strongest prejudices are excited by any oppression of man. But let us examine this charge, and see, if we can, which is the pro-slavery side of this question. Two years ago, we heard it from these same gentlemen, that the institution of slavery ought not to be carried into the free territories, not because the number of persons held in bondage would be increased—not that slavery in one State or Territory would be any greater violation of man's rights, than in another—nor that the condition of the slave, upon the banks of the Rio Grande, would be worse than upon the Roanoke—but that the institution ought to be confined within its present limits, until the number would be so increased as that slave labor would become unprofitable, and the institution unmanageable, and fall by its own weight. The same argument has been urged against the Colonization Society, that it only carried off the surplus and unprofitable black population from the South. The South, sir, in reference to the free black population, has adopted its policy—a policy, which, in my judgment, is as wise as it is unjust. The Southern States prohibit their immigration within their borders; Kentucky drives them from her limits, and the other States require such security from the master, when he manumits his slaves, as in fact drives them out. The policy of the South is, that the whole black population, which is not continued in servitude, shall be driven out. This policy is adopted, not only to relieve themselves of the burthen of this population, but to secure the permanency and vigor of their peculiar institution. And, sir, these gentlemen, who oppose this measure, now say that we must suffer the South to carry out her policy, and throw upon us and our children the burthens of their institution—that we shall prune it of its decayed and unprofitable branches—that we shall nourish the institution of slavery, that it may grow and have perpetual vigor. And yet they say that those who demand that the South shall bear its own burthens, and not throw them upon the North, are pandering to a pro-slavery sentiment. I say, sir, that these gentlemen, by their course upon this question, are lending “aid and comfort” to the supporters of the institution of slavery.

This is not a question, sir, between the State of Indiana and the free black population of the South. With that population, Indiana has no controversy. For Indiana, it is a question of policy; but, as between her and the South, it is a question of right—of obligation. It is one of the highest obligations of every State to provide for the destitute, the indigent—for all, sir, who are unable to provide for themselves, within its limits, whether they are white or black; and I would hope always to see Indiana faithfully discharge this obligation; but it is no part of this obligation that our State shall bear any part of this burthen for another; and upon this principle is based the law which has been upon our statute books for a number of years, which provides that any one (white or black) coming into this State, and likely to become a public charge within the first year, shall be removed by the overseers of the poor beyond the limits of the State, and taken to their old settlement. This statute, which may exclude the white man from our borders, because he may be poor and dependent, and secures us from the burthen of the pauper population of the other States, does not so excite the sympathies of the gentlemen.

Shall the State of Indiana suffer the South to throw upon her, to be provided for, the old, the diseased, and the vicious of her black population? Shall we bear the burthens which the institution of slavery creates? Every principle of justice—every dictate of sound policy—answer, we should not. We have none of the advantages of the institution, (if it have any,) and we ought to bear none of its burthens. Under the influence of the present Southern policy, the number of negroes and mulattoes coming amongst us is greatly increasing; and in a few years the North will be burthened with the whole black population of the United States, if we adopt no measure to prevent it.

I will not go into any comparison of the white and black races. It is enough for my purpose, in this argument, that the races are different—physically, intellectually, and morally—as different in all these particulars, as in their color. They cannot meet and mingle, in a state of social and political equality, without a violation of the laws of nature, and a gross outrage of all our better feelings, and without producing a degradation of our own race. If the blacks are permitted to be among us, it must of necessity be in a state of social and political inferiority—a condition prejudicial to both races. I hope never to see, permanently established amongst us, a race that we will regard as inferior. Under such an influence, we cannot maintain in their purity our plain republican principles and manners, regarding all as politically equal. Nor could we maintain the dignity of labor. The white laborer would not be willing to work with, and at the same employments, with an inferior race. I will close my argument upon this subject by saying that the races ought to be separate; and I hope yet to see a policy adopted that will eventually place this unfortunate race, as an independent people, in their own country.

Before I take my seat, I desire to say that I have not much objection to the proposed reference of the several questions relating to the black race; but if I should vote for the reference, I do not thereby commit myself to the support of all the measures. The first part of the section under discussion I will support; but I do not expect to support the latter part, which would (if it have any effect) prevent the negroes and mulattoes now within our State from acquiring any more real estate, and even prevent that which they now hold from descending to their heirs. I think we have no right to drive those out who have acquired settlements under our laws, nor ought we to impair their present rights, but rather to give them inducements to industry and good order. Nor do I expect to support the proposition making it obligatory upon the Legislature to appropriate annually a sum of money towards the cause of their colonization. I do not know the wish of my constituents upon this question. It is purely and properly a question for legislative control; and for these reasons I cannot support it here. In the Legislature, after the people were further freed from the public debt, I would be delighted to carry out the will of my constituents, by providing for the removal of the blacks from amongst us. But we are not here to legislate.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley said: I have a word to say in reply to the gentleman who has just taken his seat. If I understood the gentleman aright, he stated that I had said that the State of Kentucky had made poverty a felony. My remark was intended to be that the State of Kentucky had made freedom a felony.

Mr. BRACKEN. I am inclined to think that we are now about ready for the vote; and, therefore, I call for the previous question.

And there was a second.

The PRESIDENT. A division of the question having been demanded, the main question is upon committing the subject to a select committee of one from each Congressional district.

Mr. McFARLAND. What would be the effect of the previous question if the motion to commit fails? Would not the previous question bring us to the first section before the House?

The PRESIDENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. McFARLAND. Then I suppose there can be no more amendments offered.

The yeas and nays having been demanded and ordered, upon the question of commitment, the Secretary was directed to proceed with the call, and he reported—yeas 74, nays 48—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Balingall, Bascom, Beard, Berry, Bicknell, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Carr, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Tippecanoe, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dunn of Jefferson, Foley, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Hall, Hawkins, Helm, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Howe, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan Milroy, Morgan, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Rariden, Robinson, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Steele, Taylor, Tood, Watts, Wheeler, Work, Wunderlich, and Mr. President—74.

YAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Barbour, Beach, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Clark of Hamilton, Coats, Cookerly, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Gootee, Haddon, Hardin, Helmer, Hendricks, Hovey, Huff, Logan, Mathis, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Nefsinger, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Smith of Scott, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Walpole, Wiley, Wolfe, Yocum, and Zenor—48.

So the subject was referred to a select committee, to consist of one member from each Congressional district.

Subsequently the President appointed the following gentlemen to serve upon said committee:

Second District, Mr. Kent; First District, Mr. Owen; Third District, Mr. Holman; Fourth District, Mr. Rariden; Fifth District, Mr. Maguire; Sixth District, Mr. Dobson; Seventh District, Mr. Stevenson; Eighth District, Mr. McFarland; Ninth District, Mr. Niles; Tenth District, Mr. Howe.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. If these instructions are to be now voted down, the whole subject would still be before the select committee. Would it be in order to move to lay the instructions upon the table?

The PRESIDENT. It would not.

Mr. FOSTER. I propose further to amend the instructions as follows:

The PRESIDENT. No amendment is in order. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Vanderburgh, (Mr. Lockhart,) to the instructions proposed by the gentleman from Floyd (Mr. Kent).

The amendment having been read again by the Secretary—

Mr. PETTIT. If in order, I would move to lay the instructions upon the table.

The PRESIDENT. The motion is not in order. The instructions are under a call for the previous question.

Mr. PETTIT. The previous question was demanded upon the reference.

The PRESIDENT. The force of the previous question extends to the whole subject.

Mr. LOCKHART's instructions were now rejected; and the question recurred upon the adoption of the instructions proposed by Mr. Kent.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Supposing these instructions to be lost, I would inquire whether the vote upon the original section will come under the force of the previous question?

The PRESIDENT. The original section has already gone to the select committee.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford demanded the yeas and nays, and the demand being seconded by ten members, the Secretary was directed to proceed with the call, and he reported—yeas 60, nays 63—as follows:

YAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Badger, Bascom, Berry, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Foley, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Hall, Hawkins, Holman, Johnson, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Maguire, Mather, McClelland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Morgan, Mowrer, Murray, Newman, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Rariden, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Robinson, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Taylor, Todd, Watts, Wheeler, and Wiley—60.

NAYS.—Messrs. Balingall, Barbour, Beach, Beard, Bicknell, Blythe, Bourne, Carr, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Cole, Cookerly, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Gibson, Gootee, Haddon, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Jones, Kilgore, Lockhart, Logan, March, Mathis, May, McFarland, McLean, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Nave, Nefsinger, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Clark, Schoonover, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Walpole, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—63.

So the instructions were rejected.

Mr. FOSTER. I would inquire of the Chair whether it would now be in order to propose instructions to this select committee?

The PRESIDENT. It would be in order.

Mr. FOSTER. Then I propose the following:

"The General Assembly shall pass laws providing that any free negro or mulatto hereafter immigrating to, and refusing to leave, this State, or having left, shall return and settle within this State, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and punished by confinement in the county jail, or apprenticed for a term not less than six months, and the proceeds devoted to the Colonization Society in trust for the benefit of those negroes in this State who are willing to emigrate to Liberia."

Mr. GIBSON. I propose to amend the instructions as follows:

"And inquire further into the expediency of reporting a section, in substance as follows:

SECTION —. Any person who shall knowingly permit any negro or mulatto, coming into this State after the adoption of this Constitution, to occupy any real estate of which such person may be the owner, shall forfeit such real estate to the county in which the same lies, for common school purposes."

The amendment was agreed to, upon a division—affirmative 50, negative 46.

Mr. HALL. I propose further to amend the instructions by adding the following words:

"The object is to have the proceeds of such hire first applied toward sending the negro or mulatto so hired to Liberia, if he will consent to go."

Mr. FOSTER. I accept the amendment.

Mr. PETTIT. I want to inquire whether the instructions now offered are of an imperious character, or whether they are submitted as a mere matter of inquiry?

Mr. FOSTER. I have no objection to such a modification.

Mr. McCLELLAND. I propose further to amend the amendment by way of substitute—striking out and inserting these words: "that the committee be instructed to inquire whether the Legislature does not possess ample power to prevent the immigration of negroes and mulattoes without any express provision of the Constitution? and if so, whether there is any necessity for making such a provision?"

The yeas and nays were demanded and ordered upon the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. Is it in order now to debate this subject?

The PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. MORRISON. It seems to me, that, by this time, it must be evident to every member of the Convention, that there are certain principles which cannot be sustained here; and I, for one, am perfectly willing—since these instructions have been somixed up—that the subject should remain in the hands of the committee without instructions. I am willing to trust to their report to shadow forth the opinions of this Convention as reflected by the votes which have been given, in such manner as their judgment may direct. I think that in this way we shall be able to come at the most satisfactory conclusions with reference to the whole subject. Therefore, I shall move to lay the instructions upon the table.

The motion was agreed to, and, accordingly, the instructions were laid upon the table.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I would ask whether all the sections which have been heretofore reported relative to negroes and mulattoes, have been referred to this committee?

The PRESIDENT. No, sir.

Mr. OWEN. Then I would ask for a suspension of the rules to enable me to move that all the sections heretofore reported upon the subjects of negroes, mulattoes, and colonization, be severally referred to this committee.

The motion was entertained and agreed to by unanimous consent.

Mr. GIBSON. There is a petition upon this subject from Clark county. I ask the consent of the Convention that this petition may be taken up and referred to the same committee.

A VOICE. "That petition is already referred."

The PRESIDENT. It cannot be reached then.

Mr. McCLELLAND. I move to take from the table a petition which, some days ago, I presented from my county, and refer it to the same committee. Some days ago I presented a petition upon this subject from three hundred and twenty citizens of Randolph county—moving myself to lay it upon the table at the time, because it could not have an appropriate reference. If the Convention still desire to tie down the hands of these petitioners, they have the power to do it, and I will give them the opportunity. I do not see why the petition from Clark county should have the preference.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark that debate upon a question of reference is entirely out of order. But by unanimous consent, the Chair will entertain the motion.

The petition was accordingly taken from the table and referred to the committee by unanimous consent.

RIGHTS OF MARRIED WOMEN.

Mr. STEVENSON moved to dispense with the consideration of the previous order, for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the report of the committee on rights and privileges, submitting propositions to amend with reference to the rights of married women.

The Convention refused to dispense with the consideration of the regular order.

PUBLIC WORKS.

The PRESIDENT. The next order is the consideration of the report submitted by the chairman of the committee on the State debt and public works, (Mr. Hall,) on the 26th of October. Is it the pleasure of the Convention to consider the bill by sections?

SEVERAL VOICES. "By sections."

The Secretary then read the first section of the report, which is as follows:

"SEC. —. The credit of the State shall never be given or loaned in aid of any person, association, or corporation."

Mr. READ of Monroe proposed to amend the section by adding these words: "Nor shall the State hereafter become a joint owner, or stockholder in any corporation or association."

The question upon the adoption of this amendment having been announced by the Chair—

Mr. READ of Monroe said:

Mr. President, my object in offering the proposed amendment, is to effect a complete separation between the State and all corporations, in carrying on business of any kind whatever.

If there is a single proposition settled beyond all manner of controversy, by every principle of sound reason, by experience all over the world, and more especially by the experience of our American States, it is this, that government should not in its own capacity, nor by a partnership with individuals, become an agent in business operations, except so far as required for the mere purposes of government.

The history of the last thirty years has taught the American people a lesson on this subject never to be forgotten; the results of which, I trust, will be incorporated in every amended State Constitution, that like fatal experiments may not under any new phase of circumstances be repeated, or even attempted. Why, sir, what have we seen? We have seen the enormous sum of two hundred and thirty three millions of debt heaped upon our American States, within the memory of most of us. We have seen the public patronage of the States the mere foot-ball of contending political parties—we have seen partisan leaders advocating local expenditures to strengthen their own power—we have seen hosts of contractors, bankers, stock jobbers, brokers, corporation mongers, gamblers, speculators, and petty office holders, rioting upon the spoils of the State, and united to support the powers which most favored themselves; under these influences, State after State was launched into the vortex of extravagance and corruption. Ten sovereign States were driven into bankruptcy, and disgraced in the eyes of the world.

Government, sir, has no capacity to make canals, to construct turnpikes or railroads, deal in stocks, or to enact the banker. These are no proper functions of government; and as often as the State is entangled in any such operations, it not only violates the very end of its existence, but is sure, sooner or later, to be cheated, plundered, victimized.

In the grand aggregate of State indebtedness, Indiana comes in for her full proportion. No less than twelve millions fell to her lot; an amount equal to a twelfth part of all the present taxable wealth of the State, and, at the time it was contracted, equal to an eighth of it. After that terrific crash of State credit, which broke upon the country, in which public and private credit was prostrated, and individuals and communities were alike overwhelmed, had in some measure passed off, men began to reflect and soberly inquire what can be done to prevent similar ruin in the future.

The great remedy which has been devised, is so to change the State Constitutions as to take away from the Legislatures the power again to involve the State credit. Mainly with a view to provisions of this kind, State after State has changed its Constitution, and other States are now engaged in the work.

In order to apply an effectual remedy to the plundering of the State Treasury, we must understand how these hundreds of millions were lost, and how other hundreds of millions would inevitably have been lost, but for the total explosion of the system of State credits.

The laws under which these debts occurred, have been very aptly called PLUNDER LAWS, and they are three fold in their character:

1. Laws for constructing works of internal improvement.

2. Laws involving the funds of the State in banking.

3. Laws loaning the credit of the State, or the trust funds of the State, for one or the other of these objects, to corporations.

All the State indebtedness has grown up under legislation falling under the one or the other of these divisions, or all of them united, and no other way whatever.

Sir, I wish in our new Constitution entirely to cut off this legislation, falling under I care not which of these divisions, and to cut off all power to create State debt, except in the case of public defense. The objects which these laws contemplate, so far as proper in themselves, are most safely and economically accomplished by individual sagacity and enterprise; and with one accord, the people of all the States, have committed their railroads, their plank roads, and their turnpikes to companies of individuals.

Mr. President, one of the most important offices of a written Constitution is found in its requirements to keep the State to its appropriate sphere of action. Government is ever passing its legitimate bounds, and intermeddling in subjects which do not properly appertain to it. In all ages, and under all forms, too much government and the improper interference of government in matters not belonging to it, are among the sorest evils which have afflicted men.

The State, sir, I need hardly say, is an exceedingly bungling and unskilful manager of all business transactions. It is ever liable to be cheated, and never upon capital makes the same returns as do individuals. Hence, it is much more profitable to leave money in the pockets of the people than for the State to undertake the management of it for their good. The purposes for which money should be raised by the State, or its credit embarked, should be strictly limited by the Constitution. Let the State take the place of the merchant, the manufacturer, or the banker, or in any way become a partner with companies, no matter under what pretext done, it is sure in the final result to be the loser.

All common sense and all the history of the past proclaim this as the unfailing result.

I was struck by the sound philosophy of an essay on the question, "what is the State," found in the French Almanac for 1850. "To those," says the author of the essay, "who say the State should do much, we reply, then the people must allow it to take much. To those who say the State should raise but few taxes, we reply, then the people must not require it to proceed beyond its special function. As to those who pretend that the people should require much of it, yet give it little, their claims are chimerical and absurd."

It would be a most instructive lesson on the capacities of a State for business operations, if we had any means of determining the present value of the immense investments which the States made during the period of the internal improvement and State banking mania. By a table taken from the American Almanac, when the total amount of State loans was, in round numbers, $180,000,000, the following was its distribution:—$53,000,000 for banking; $69,000,000 for canals; $43,000,000 for railroads; $7,000,000 for turnpikes, and $8,000,000 for miscellaneous objects. In Hunt's Merchants' Magazine, I find the following statement, which I believe to be entirely correct; that, in State internal improvement, the only example of complete success, is the Erie Canal, of New York; and, in relation to banks, the use of State credit has been a total failure, and of unmixed evil. I suppose the present actual value of the aggregate State investment, would not be, as measured by the dividends which they yield, 25 per cent. upon the investments made. The committee on State debt in the Ohio Convention, in making their estimate for meeting their interest amounting to 1,250,000 dollars, calculate the income of their public works at only 366,000 dollars. The actual cost of their public works, stands them in, at this time, 30,000,000 dollars—(that is including interest over and above income, for some years)—the value of the works is $6,000,000. And Ohio, in regard to her public works, it must be remarked, is considered one of the fortunate States. But we have a better illustration, and nearer at home, in the sale of our own Central Canal, on last Saturday, by the Governor, at the State House door. The work, I understand, cost three quarters of a million, and sold for $2500.

VOICES.—"And a bad bargain at that."

The loaning of State funds to companies has proved equally disastrous. The amount of such loans in Ohio was three millions—the loss two millions. In 1842, Mr. Brough, then Auditor of State of Ohio, was appointed agent to look after the interests of the State, in these companies. His report to the Legislature is full of developments, showing that the State, in such concerns, is always the sleeping partner, and exhibiting the various frauds by which the State was plundered of her interest.

In New York, the State loaned its credit to the extent of five millions: the loss was, I believe, in still greater proportion.

But, sir, if it could be shown that the State in all these transactions is largely the gainer, still I hold they are utterly wrong in principle. Money making is not the business of the State. If the State claims a monopoly of any business she inflicts an injury upon her citizens which is little better than downright robbery. If she sells out a monopoly for a bonus, the robbery upon the citizens is ordinarily still worse, as being paid for and sanctified by a right purchased from government. If the State becomes a partner with a few of her citizens, to the exclusion of others, offering the same terms, it is still a most odious and anti-republican principle, and more worthy of the days of monopoly, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, than of an American State. Should vast profits be pointed to as the result of such alliances, I say, in the first place, I have no faith whatever, that, in the long run, there will be any such profits. All experience is against the supposition. But if there are really such profits, so much the worse for the people.

Business, when left open to private enterprise, regulates itself. Competition soon reduces profits to a just standard. Could government, by selling out to a few of its citizens, the exclusive right of making or vending any articles of manufacture, or of carrying on any kind of commerce, save the people from all taxation, does not every one see that this would be the most unjust and oppressive of all modes of raising revenue?

In some oriental countries, there is no taxation. The whole revenue is raised by extortions for the use of certain privileges. 'If, by a continued connexion between the State and banking, in the form of a monopoly to a few persons and a few towns, as it now is, the whole expenses of the State could be paid, still it would be the most unequal mode possible to be devised, of taxing the industry of the country. It would be the most expensive, too, of all methods of taxation. It would be giving a few persons much, in order that the State might gain a little. It would be of that species of legislation of which Dr. Wayland says, it is not legislation but robbery.

In regard to all such connexions, I am reminded of the story of the Sultan and the Dervish. The Sultan, opening his coffers, showed the Dervish a large pile of gold, which he had received from one of his pashaws; ah, said the Dervish, if your highness could only see the pashaw's pile, you would see a much larger one.

My design, in the amendment which I now propose, is to produce a complete divorce of the State from corporation mongering of all kinds. The section, amended, embraces just this principle—that the State shall not loan its credit to corporations, nor enter into a partnership, in any form, with them.

The same principle, also, in regard to counties, I wish incorporated into the Constitution.

Public debt is a hydra-headed monster, which is always springing forth in some new form, and under some new pretext. Cut it off in the nation,—straitway, it shoots forth in the States—cut it off in the States—it comes forth in the counties—cut it off in the counties—and it steals forth in the form of town or city bonds.

Mr. President: I wish to quote a sentence. It is this: "It is not in a splendid government, supported by powerful monopolies, and aristocratical establishments, that the people will find happiness, or their liberties, protection; but in a plain system, void of pomp, protecting all, and granting favors to none."

This is a plain sentence, from a man who did not deal much in the graces of composition, and it may not sound well to "ears polite." It is from Andrew Jackson.

I have another sentence to quote. It is from the writings of Moses. It is of far better composition—it is more appropriate to our subject—it is short, direct, and pithy. In quoting it, I wish to say, that it is not for the purpose of holding a rod over the head of any one. It embraces, however, the very precept which I wish to carry out in our State Constitution, in reference to all the funds of the State. The sentence, sir, is this—"Thou shalt not steal."

Mr. WATTS. Is it in order to amend at this time?

The PRESIDENT. It is in order to amend the amendment.

Mr. WATTS. Then I will offer a small amendment.

The amendment was read by the Secretary, as follows:

"Provided, The State shall have power to invest capital in a State Bank and branches."

Mr. RARIDEN next obtained the floor, and, upon his motion, which was agreed to,

The Convention took a recess till 2 o'clock, P. M.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the first section of the report of the committee on the State debt and public works, in relation to the State credit. The section is as follows:

"The credit of this State shall never be loaned in aid of any person, association, or corporation."

The PRESIDENT stated the question to be on the amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Watts).

Mr. DOBSON remarked, that he did not think this was a proper time to go on with the bank question, and that, perhaps, it would be better to lay the resolution and amendments on the table, and proceed with other sections which were less likely to elicit debate.

Mr. WATTS. If the gentleman from Owen and Green is of that opinion, I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. DOBSON. I would suggest that this bank question will, in all probability, involve a week or ten days of hard work, or hard talking, whichever the Convention has a mind to term it; and I think it would be better to pass on for the present, over some of the sections that are less likely to excite debate, and to adopt or reject them, so that the people may see that we are doing something. This section does not appear to me to involve the bank question, although gentlemen may think it does. We shall come to that question directly in the order of business, and if gentlemen think that this section does involve that question, I would lay it upon the table for the present, and proceed to something else, so that the people may not think that we are spending all our time in doing nothing. I would be like the boy at school, who, when asked if he had got his lesson off, replied "yes, all but a few hard words," and he had "skipped" them, [laughter] and would try to learn them some other time. Now, as the Convention has spent so much time, and done nothing, it appears to me that we had better lay aside for awhile those questions which excite debate, and endeavor to pass such amendments as we are pretty well agreed upon.

Mr. READ of Monroe. If that is the disposition of the Convention, I will withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDENT. Then the question will be on the first section of the article reported by the Committee on the State debt and public works.

Mr. STEPHENSON suggested the propriety of passing over this section for the present, and considering it when the bank question should come up. If the section were considered now, he thought it would necessarily bring up the bank question, for which he thought the Convention was hardly prepared. He would, therefore, move to lay the section upon the table for the present.

The question being taken on the motion, it was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on engrossing this section for a third reading.

Mr. WOLFE moved to strike out the word "this" and insert the word "the" so as to make it read "the credit of the State" instead of "the credit of this State." That was all the change which he desired to make in the section.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. RARIDEN. I move to strike out the section with the view of inserting another which I will disclose shortly to the Convention.

A MEMBER. Read the substitute.

Mr. RARIDEN. It is not quite ready yet, and at any rate I believe it is quite in order to move to strike out without offering any substitute at all. Mr. President, I object to this section on the ground that it is too indefinite for my purpose. I do not know what it means. If it means to say that the State of Indiana shall never become a partner in any banking system, as it is now, I am against it, and it strikes me that that is the object of it. I can suggest a great many states of cases in which it would be quite proper that the "credit of the State should be loaned"—that the State of Indiana should contribute of her means, and even though everything was lost, in one sense of the word, the State would be the gainer by the sacrifice of the amount of money thus advanced. For example, if any of those great thoroughfares—the arteries of the commerce of this country—should happen to fall into a state of dilapidation, if the work should go down—say, for example, that it was even this line of Railroad from Indianapolis to Madison, if that should go into waste and decay, the State of Indiana could very well afford to spend fifty thousand dollars and to lose that money entirely and forever, rather than have that line of communication with the Ohio river cut off. The same thing may be said of the Wabash and Erie Canal. We cannot at all times foresee forthcoming events. These companies might all collapse, and the whole property fall into the hands of the State. Take it, for instance, where I reside—on the White Water Canal; the State of Indiana has expended $1,100,000 on that work, and a company of men have spent $700,000 more. Suppose the company were now broken up. I have no hesitation in saying: that the construction of that work has not lost to the State one dollar, although we expended $1,100,000 in it and never got a cent except in the shape of enhanced taxation, on the property on the margin of that canal; and that I believe in itself, has been amply sufficient to compensate the State for all the outlay. It may be so with this great work in the West, for aught I know; and judging of the future by the past, I must confess, that I am indisposed to tie up the hands of the Legislature.

Sir, the whole theory on which this section is based is wrong. It is upon two ideas, both of which are absurd. The first is that all the wisdom of the State will evaporate with the dissolution of this Convention, and the second is that mankind are incapable of self-government, and that they cannot be trusted with power. Now, sir, with this view let us contemplate for a moment the character of this Government, and what will be the effects of these restrictions upon the legislation of the country. In order to have a government that can control public affairs and guarantee individual rights, we must delegate a sufficient amount of power, and it takes as much power to administer a republican form of government as it does to administer a monarchical form of government. The only difference is that in a monarchy it is concentrated in one or two hands, while under a republican government it is distributed among a great many, who act as checks to each other; but the elements of power are in both instances the same. We must then delegate power to guarantee individual rights and to protect public liberty. We look to the Government as parental in its character, as fostering every thing that is calculated to benefit society, and not as laying its iron hand upon every thing in the shape of improvement. Not a bit of it. My theory of government is that the representatives of the people always reflect public sentiment. There may be, it is true, an occasional mistake; there may be an aberration; but every thing admonishes us that the representative, to be a faithful representative, must reflect the sentiments of the people who have elected him; or if he is indisposed to do so, when he looks forward to the next election he is admonished that he ought to attend to the wishes of the people if he wishes to be re-elected.

Well, sir, if I am right in this theory, that the representative always reflects the sentiments of the people who have elected him, I think it is a great mistake to suppose that there is patriotism in restricting the delegation of power, and to suppose that the people retain the power, the exercise of which is thus restricted. I deny that they do retain it, and for this reason—that there is no organization through which the people can carry out that power which is not delegated; and if it be not delegated to the representative it cannot be exercised at all for want of that organization. Then no matter how wise or how beneficent the object may be, it seems to me that the object and purpose of this provision is to cut off every thing of the kind.

Now there is another principle, and it is one which I have maintained some ten or fifteen years. You may talk about the supremacy of the law and the sacredness of the Constitution as much as you please, but whenever laws become obnoxious—whether they be organic or statute laws—the people will change them. Public functionaries universally truckle to public sentiment on every point. And that is as it should be, because it shows the omnipotence of the people. Gentlemen need not therefore talk to me about betraying the people, because they never intend to do anything of the kind. The representative may err, and so may the people, but my word for it, he will never err long unless the people go with him and sustain him in that error. Gentlemen talk about the ruin which is brought upon the people by their representatives by their connection in Indiana with the system of internal improvements. Well, sir, I occupy a position in which I could denounce these improvements with as much freedom and with as good a grace as any gentleman on this floor, for I was opposed to the whole system—I was opposed to everything of the kind. Now I admit that when I look over the whole ground, when I contemplate the immense debt which now lies upon the people of the State—when I look upon the situation in which the State then was and in which it would have remained if my advice had been pursued—when I look upon all this and contemplate at the same time the present position of things, I am not at all prepared to say that the State would have been in any better position if my advice had been followed, and that is a large admission for one occupying the position which I occupy. I was a representative most of the time when these improvements were begun. I was opposed to the Wabash and Erie Canal and to the State Bank; and when I look at all the consequences which have resulted from these measures, I ask myself "would the State have prospered if my advice had been taken?" I ask myself "what would the State have been in such case?" Why, sir, it would have been a wilderness, as it then was. You would have heard nothing of your Madison and Indianapolis Railroad. You would have heard nothing of your Wabash and Erie Canal and other great public works. Now what does it amount to when you contemplate this matter philosophically? All these public works are a mere tax upon the capital of the country. They are a mere exchange of money for the labor of the country. It is the rich man exchanging that much money to the man who constructs the work for the work itself, and what is better than all, it is of advantage to both parties. The one class furnishes the elbow grease, and the other the capital, and it works mutually to the advantage of both. These works are now completed and have been completed by the united efforts of the State and of individual enterprise; and although I was so narrow-minded at the time as to refuse to take any interest in them, I have no hesitation whatever in saying that they have been of immense advantage to the State. Although I opposed these improvements, and at that time could have bought the stock at half its present price, I can attribute my opposition only to my short-sightedness. I had no confidence in them. Well what have we seen as their consequence? We have seen that the products of the State have been increased more than a hundred and fifty thousand dollars per annum. I know that I am within the bounds when I say that. Now who is injured by this? The farmers? No; for every man who owns a farm in their vicinity receives in consequence of these improvements ten times the amount in the enhanced price of his land and products, over and above all that he pays in taxes to meet the interest of the debt. Does any gentleman here doubt that? I think no man can doubt it who reflects on the matter for a single moment. Then I am entirely opposed to restricting the representatives of the people in future. I would not object to it if we could leave the power to be exercised by the people themselves whenever they may think it necessary to exercise it; but when you fail to delegate the power to those only who can exercise it, it is in my judgment tantamount to an abandonment of the power itself. Why then would you restrict them? Is it true that those who are to come after us are not to be trusted? I do not believe in any such thing. I believe in the progress of mind and intelligence; I believe that those who are to come after us will be as capable of managing their own affairs as we are. I believe another thing—that with all the misfortunes and calamities which gentlemen have bewailed with so much lamentation, have resulted beneficially both to the State and to the people. The mind of the people has been developed; their intellectual resources have been called into action which would in all probability have lain dormant had it not been for these stimulants in the shape of enterprise and disaster, which have been applied to the mind.

Another word on this subject: The question is significantly asked, "If the people had had a part in enacting these disastrous measures, would the difficulty have come upon us?" I say yes, they would; for the people were in advance of their representatives all the time. Although the people of the county of Wayne have fostered and maintained me from my boyhood, entertaining the sentiments which I then did, I was too prudent to put my name before the people in reference to this question, because I was opposed to them. I now, however, entertain the idea that they were nearer right than I was, and that if they had taken my advice the State would have been in a less prosperous condition without the present debt upon it than it now is with that debt. Then are you afraid to trust the people hereafter, that you are thus to restrict them? Why should we clog their action? I tell you that these parchment barriers cannot restrain the people when they entertain the idea that they are a restraint upon their power. I say, then, that when you consider that their representatives are responsible to them every year, the representatives will be apt to think more about what will best secure their next election, and how, in order to effect that, they can best subserve the interests of the community at large. Does not every body know that? It is as plainly true as any proposition that can be set forth. Some men of platonic patriotism may think differently, but they are only the exceptions and not the rule. Every man who is a candidate for popular favor will study how he can best secure his next election; and in order to do that, he will study how to subserve the interests of the community. Now shall we tie the people down in this way? They have always held the rod in their own hands; and if any individual goes beyond the wishes of those he represents, he is at their mercy, and in nine cases out of ten they will turn out such a man and put a more faithful representative in his place. I say, then, that there is no inducement for the representative to violate the wishes and the interests of those whom he represents; and I cannot but think that in most cases it is their mistake rather than their design. What object can they have in so doing? All their hopes of future preferment depend upon their maintaining the people's confidence. And why should they destroy that confidence, and with it every hope for the future, by abandoning the interest of their constituents, and by sacrificing their confidence by misrepresenting them? The people have the power in their own hands.

If you can find a majority of a Legislature silly enough to stultify themselves in any such manner, let them do so; but that is an event which I do not expect to see while I live. Why, then, will you restrain the people? Sir, I am limited to half an hour in my remarks, but I assure the Convention that I could not recite in an hour all the occasions on which it might be necessary for the State to become a partner with corporations; and even supposing it to be true that the funds of the State might, in some instances, be sacrificed, if they promote the great object of all governments—the best interests of the community—although I admit that such partnerships should not, perhaps, be sought by the State, especially with the view of raising revenue—for I am of opinion that all revenue should be raised by taxation—but if the government, by connecting itself with associations, thereby improves the State and enhances its own revenues, it is, in that case, doing the State a service. Why should we tie down the community in this respect? Is all the wisdom of the State—past, present, and to come—concentrated in this Convention? Can we see and provide for all the various contingencies that may arise in future? I apprehend not. Will not the people who come after us be as anxious to see to their own interest as we can be to see to it for them? If they act in contravention to their real interests, does not the calamity rest upon themselves? Most certainly it does. I implore the Convention, therefore, to leave this matter open to the people. There is one thing that I would go for, because I think it would only be honest and fair to posterity; and that is, that, whenever the State of Indiana makes a loan of money, I am willing to say at the same time that taxes shall be imposed sufficient to meet the interest of the amount, and a sinking fund; and that they should not be repealable until the debt is paid. [Several voices, "Consent."] But if, on the other hand, it is to be said that there is no contingency in the future in which it would be proper for the State to advance pecuniary means, or to connect itself, in any way, with the enterprises of the country, I should be against all such propositions.

Some gentlemen say that we have no right to impose such burthens upon posterity, and that we have now loaded it unjustly with a heavy burthen by way of a State debt. It is true that we have a State debt, a part of which will be left to posterity; but have we no credits against that? We received the heritage an unbroken wilderness, and we have converted it into fruitful fields; we have created its productive capacities, and have intersected it with commercial facilities without number. In a word, sir, we have almost annihilated space, and brought its remote parts in connection with commercial emporiums and places of market. Is this nothing for which posterity should thank us and give us credit? Why, sir, the increased productions and the increased markets of the State which have been stimulated by those enterprises, would themselves pay the whole public debt in less than five years. Then what has posterity to complain of?

Here Mr. R.'s time expired.

Mr. HALL. In reply to the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Rariden,) I would observe that the object of this section was merely to prevent the State from connecting itself with any work of internal improvement of any kind. The only provision which is omitted is that of which the gentleman speaks. The section does not say that the State shall not be an agent or owner or have any interest in any banking institution. It does not go that far. This question was considered by the committee on currency and banking, and it may be important that we should not forestall the action of that committee on the subject.

To give no credit of the State, as the section provides, seems to me altogether proper. We see the embarrassments which have been brought upon the country, by loaning the credit of the State for purposes of internal improvement. These should be carefully avoided in the organic law which we propose to adopt. The committee say, furthermore, that the State shall never embark in any work of internal improvement, because the credit of the State shall not be given for the purpose of carrying on such work. For these reasons the section was reported in the shape it was.

Mr. McFARLAND proposed, further to amend the section, by inserting after the word "State," in the first line, these words: "or of any county in the State."

Mr. McFARLAND, in explanation of his amendment, said: By reference to the 28th order before the Convention it will be seen, that no county shall subscribe for stock in any incorporated company, unless the same be paid for at the time of such subscription; nor shall any county loan her credit to, or borrow money for, the purpose of taking stock in any incorporated company; and it strikes me, that the same arguments which are used in favor of prohibiting the State from embarking in enterprises of this kind, would be equally as applicable to the several counties; and that, by the terms of the section as reported, the evil complained of is only taken from the State and transferred to the counties.

But this amendment was rejected, and the question recurred upon the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Rariden,) striking out the first section of the report.

Mr. BASCOM. Would it be in order now to propose an amendment, in order to perfect the original section? I understand the pending amendment is to strike out.

The PRESIDENT. Precisely so.

Mr. BASCOM. I wish to offer the following amendment which is similar to that proposed by the gentleman from Monroe:

Amend by adding "Nor shall the State hereafter become a joint-owner, or stockholder in any company or association."

Mr. BASCOM said—

Mr. PRESIDENT, I offer this amendment for the purpose of covering the ground which the Chairman of the committee (Mr. Hall) has admitted was not covered in the original section. I would prohibit the State from being a stockholder in any bank, or any other corporate association whatever. I can see nothing beneficial resulting to the State from any such association; and when we look at the results of the past experience in the State, in her connection with every work to which she has extended her credit, it is preposterous for any gentleman to get up here and ask that the State should again embark in such enterprises. There is no one case in which the State has taken hold of any public work, that she has not been stript of thousands. I hope, therefore, that some stringent measure will be adopted, by which the State shall not only be prohibited from embarking in works of internal improvement, but that her credit shall be wholly disconnected and withdrawn from the banks. I hope the great State of Indiana will no longer be found engaged in supporting and upholding as a partner, what I call a swindling machine. I hope the State will dispense with all connection with banking; for all banks have but one tendency—one destiny—and that is, to swindle the people. Gentlemen talk about bringing down the price of produce and labor. Sir, are the banks of the State to rule the people as by a monopoly, and fix the price of produce and labor? If so, it would be safe for me to say that this State Bank is a monster and will swallow up all the labor of the country. Sir, this institution does already to a great extent, rule the State; and she is a monster, and I stand pledged, before the people, that I will here, and elsewhere, wage a war of extermination upon the State Bank and all similar banking institutions. I want something that will better remunerate the labor of the country, than any of these shaving systems ever has done or ever will do.

But they say we shall be flooded with the paper of other States, in the event of the winding up of our own banks. Sir, I hope that the day is coming, when our neighboring States will not be infested with these institutions, and I hope that the whole band of the sisterhood of States will follow in the wake of those west of us, who are already in advance of us with respect to the subject of currency. I hope, sir, that these institutions will all be hurled from power, and placed where they can be no longer an eye-sore to the community. These are some of the reasons why I hope the section will be so amended as that the State shall not be connected with any corporation or association whatever.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. The Convention are about to take a vote upon a question which occupies but little over one and a half lines in the printed bill before us, but I consider it to be one of the most important questions which may be presented to the consideration of this Convention during the whole session. Sir, I consider this so plain a question, that I would scarcely think it necessary to argue it, were it not for the ground which has been assumed in a long legal argument of the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden).

I, sir, am one of those who on all occasions promptly respond to the sentiments of the people as they may be expressed with reference to any great measure. I consider this proposition (without reference to party considerations) truly a democratic measure. When I say democratic I do not mean to be understood as declaring that the proposition is especially favored by those who politically call themselves democrats; or that it is opposed by those who are politically called whigs; but I speak of it as a measure connected with the rights of the people. I will state to the Convention that they will generally find my votes and my voice given to sustain the interests of the people against any course of policy which will permit corporations to filch from the people their rights which they can never get back again. It is strange that in full view of the political schooling of the year 1836, that we should hear such arguments as have fallen from the lips of the gentleman from Wayne. Our people are to this day ground down by most oppressive taxes, which the system of internal improvements of that year have inflicted upon them;—better called a system of oppression, inflicted by the representatives of the people, as they call themselves, in the Legislature, by means of a regular system of log rolling. And now why should gentlemen wish to place a power so dangerous to the people again at the disposal of the Legislature? If gentlemen were to go among the people and ask them whether they desired such a restraint to be placed upon the Legislature as to prevent a recurrence of so great an evil, I have no doubt but that the majority in favor of such restraint, would astound every man who has the slightest doubt upon the subject.

It is well known how these schemes are got along in the Legislature. Corporations are always well represented there, and the people have no knowledge of what is going on until they are entrapped by them.

What right has the State of Indiana to become a partner with any speculation? She has no more right to do this than she has a right to form a regular co-partnership with a merchant or manufacturer, in any speculation looking to a profitable result. I hope this Convention will take such action, upon this subject, as will forever silence the presumption that the State of Indiana may become a partner in any money making enterprise.

I voted for the amendment of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, because I think the same principle ought to extend to the counties which we are about establishing for the State. There is no justice in the principle that the property or money of the people should be taken to make profits for corporations. I shall be found constantly voting against any proposition to connect the interests of the people with the interests of the corporations; for the reason that corporations always labor and scheme for their individual benefit, which is always antagonistic to the interests of the people. The proposition is so plain that it is unnecessary to elucidate by giving examples. Gentlemen have no interests to maintain here which should prevent them from reflecting the will of their constituents upon this subject, and the question narrows itself down to the simple proposition whether the State is to become a partner or a stockholder in any public enterprise—whether taxes shall be laid upon the people to raise capital, and then be appropriated by the State for the purposes of private speculation in any concern where individual interests are always militating against the interests of the State. The individual who stands in such a connection with the State, knows that the State will stand more shaving and speculation, and he will indulge more in this way than he would if he were acting in an individual partnership concern where his partner stands ever actively watching the operations of the concern. The State has been aptly compared to a goose, and according to the saying, he was a fool who did not pluck her. And in view of what we have suffered heretofore, I think it is but the part of prudence that we should provide for the evil to come.

I hope the Convention will put this principle imperishably into the Constitution; and say to the people: We will protect your pockets from any attempt to get you into partnership with individuals, where they have the control of affairs, and will most naturally pocket the largest share of the profits.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford. Would it be in order now to offer an amendment?

The PRESIDENT. There are two amendments pending.

Mr. READ of Monroe. I would observe, sir, that I withdrew the amendment now offered by the gentleman from Wells, (Mr. Bascom,) upon an appeal made to me by several gentlemen around here, who considered that, as we had just passed through a heavy debate, it would be better to put off this discussion for a few days. But I think, myself, that it would be just as well to meet the question now as at any future time. I hope, therefore, that the section will be allowed to pass with the proposed amendment, so that it will read in these words:

"The credit of the State shall never be given or loaned in aid of any person, association, or corporation, nor shall the State hereafter become a joint owner or stockholder in any corporation or association."

Mr. WOLFE. If it is the object to get up a discussion of the bank question upon this subject, I will move to lay the section and pending amendments upon the table. I think we had better get along with one thing at a time.

This motion was agreed to, and accordingly it was Ordered, That the first section of the report, with the pending amendments, do lie upon the table.

PUBLIC DEBTS.

The PRESIDENT. The next thing in order is the consideration of the second section of the report, which the Secretary will now read. The section is as follows:

SEC. —. The General Assembly may contract debts to meet casual deficits or failures in the revenue, for the purpose of paying the interest on the State debt; but such debts shall not, at any time, exceed one hundred thousand dollars: Provided, That the State may contract debts to repel invasion, suppress insurrection, or, if hostilities are threatened, provide for the public defense.

Mr. GIBSON. I will move to amend by inserting after the word "hundred" the words "and fifty," so that it would read: "but such debts shall not, at any time, exceed one hundred and fifty thousand dollars." I think that, although at the present time the sum named in the section might be sufficient, still it might not be sufficient twenty years hence. I think this limitation should have some reference to the amount of wealth and population of the State; that a limitation which might be proper enough now, might not be so after the time when our wealth and population shall be doubled.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman will send up his amendment in writing.

The amendment, having been sent up and read by the Secretary, was rejected without a division.

Mr. ROBINSON. I propose to amend as follows:

Strike out the first, second, and third lines of the section, and so much of the fourth line as to include the word "provided," so that the section will read: "That the State may contract debts to repel invasion, suppress insurrection, or, if hostilities be threatened, provide for the public defense."

Mr. R. said, Mr. President, I am very unwell—hardly able to be in my place. Such is the state of my health, that I am not able to defend the amendment as I could wish to do. I will, however, briefly point out to the members of the Convention the reasons which have induced me to offer this amendment.

In looking at those lines of the section which I propose to strike out, I see that authority is proposed to be given to the General Assembly to contract debts by borrowing money for certain specific purposes, so making it possible for the Legislature to increase the State debt. These lines propose to authorize the Legislature to borrow money at interest, for the purpose of paying interest on the State debt, the principal of which debt, ultimately, must be redeemed by taxation. Now this power is liable to abuse. Gentlemen who have been members of the Legislature well know, that, for the last several years, there has always been a deficit in the amount of money on hand necessary to meet the interest on the State debt; and is it proper thus to authorize and empower the Legislature to resort to a new loan every year, especially since we find that those who hold our State bonds (at least some of them) have got them into their hands by not paying anything like their value for them! A large proportion of these bonds have been procured for thirty-seven and a half cents to the dollar; and we now are shouldering the responsibility of paying their face with interest, in accordance with the act passed for the payment of the State debt. Now this matter must at last result in this: that, if ever the interest and the principal of the State debt is to be paid, it must be paid by means of taxes directly collected from the people; and therefore, if there should be a deficit of money in the treasury to meet these payments of interest, I would be in favor, at once, of levying a tax upon the people to meet that deficit, instead of resorting to a loan—for a loan must be a loan at interest—and in this way, the State will be placed in such a predicament that she will have to pay what is called compound interest; and the only means of relief from this condition of things will be found at last in a resort to direct taxation.

For these reasons, sir, I am opposed to this section, or to this part of it which proposes to give to the Legislature, any authority to borrow money to be expended, directly or indirectly, in the construction of works of public improvement.

I am opposed to giving the Legislature power to borrow money, even for the purpose of paying any debts already contracted. If we are in debt now, let us meet interest and principal by a direct tax, however hard it may seem in the present, and not put off the burdens of the evil day upon our children and theirs. Let us pay our State debt, contracted in folly as it was, by direct taxation and not swell it to a more fearful bulk by borrowing more to pay interest.

As I remarked, such is my health that I cannot speak at length, but I wish to impress it upon the Convention, that it will be dangerous to give the authority to the Legislature to borrow money for any purpose. When the Legislature finds that the amount needed for annual or biennial appropriations exceeds the amount of revenue, they will, unless restricted, resort to borrowing, in order to get rid of the responsibility and perhaps the odium of increasing the rate of taxation.

I hope that the amendment will be adopted, and that we shall forever shut out the possibility of the accumulation of another State debt—the present one is curse enough for at least three generations, no matter how great their political sins.

Mr. COLFAX moved to amend as follows:

Add the words, "The General Assembly shall have no power to contract debt in the name of the State, except as is granted in this section."

Mr. COLFAX: Mr. President, I have offered this amendment because it contains a salutary principle. I shall heartily advocate the adoption of the next section, provided a still further restriction like this cannot be obtained. The amendment proposed is further restriction—a wise and healthy one. It is a step in advance of the section as reported by the committee; and though I know not how many there are who coincide with me, I am, for one, ready to take that step.

When we look back upon the scenes of excitement through which our State has passed—when we remember that so enthusiastic were the people in favor of the mammoth system, that they would as heartily and as strongly, and as overwhelmingly have voted for its adoption at the polls, as did their Representatives in the Legislature, it does seem as if, now in our cooler moments, with the results of that infatuation in full view before us, we should so act as to prevent, if possible, their repetition. Let us resolve, and place it in this instrument beyond repeal, that no more State debt shall hereafter be created upon any pretext whatever.

I have but little doubt that the people would hail the adoption of such a section. And, as we have suffered more than other States from the results of imprudent debt, which still hangs over us, impairing our prosperity, and impeding our progress and advancement as a State, let Indiana be the pioneer in the adoption of this new Constitutional principle, and become, in this respect, a model for others to follow. For, I might say in addition, if it is eminently judicious for a man to resolve against incurring debt, except for what are really the necessities of life, it is equally so for a State, which is but an aggregation of individuals, to resolve, especially after the costly lesson we have learned from experience, that she will not suffer the creation of additional debt, except what may be necessary, as provided for in this section, to keep the wheels of government in motion.

It might be wearisome to detain the Convention with additional remarks. I know not what will be the fate of this motion. But, whatever it may be, I shall not be the less convinced that this Convention should so put up the bars that they cannot hereafter be taken down, and should inscribe plainly and positively on the Constitution, "No more State Debt."

Mr. DOBSON. I would impute no "insidious designs" to any gentleman, but it strikes me that the amendment just proposed has a strong squinting towards the protection of certain banking interests.

I move that the amendment be laid upon the table.

Mr. HOWE. The gentleman from St. Joseph will find in another section a provision which obviates the necessity for his amendment, if I correctly understand his intention.

Upon Mr. DOBSON'S motion to lay the amendment (Mr. Colfax's) on the table, the yeas and nays were demanded.

After the call,

Mr. TAGUE asked to have his vote recorded.

The PRESIDENT. Which way does the gentleman vote?

Mr. TAGUE hesitated for several moments, amid cries of "vote yea" and "vote nay" from all parts of the chamber, but finally voted yea.

Mr. MAGUIRE asked and obtained leave to change his vote; he wished to vote yea.

Mr. BASCOM asked leave to change his vote.

Mr. DOBSON. I remarked to some members near me, that the gentleman was caught in that vote, and would be reminded of it.

The PRESIDENT. Was the gentleman within the bar at the time his name was called?

Mr. KILGORE remarked that it might not be necessary for a gentleman to be within the bar at the time his name was called.

The PRESIDENT. If the gentleman will read the twelfth rule, he will find the Chair is right. [The President read the rule.]

Mr. KILGORE. If the Chair will read what immediately precedes that——

The PRESIDENT. The Chair has read sufficient to show that the gentleman is in error.

Mr. KILGORE. I think the matter is of sufficient importance to be settled, and I do not think it necessary that a member should be within the bar at the moment his name is called to allow him the privilege of recording his vote.

The PRESIDENT. If the gentleman finds fault with the rules, he can move to amend them.

Mr. MORRISON remarked that the twelfth rule was a proper one. When the yeas and nays are called, the question is not really put to the member till his name is called by the Secretary.

The result of the vote was—yeas 69, nays 55—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Badger, Barbour, Beach, Blythe, Bourne, Bow-ers, Bracken, Carr, Chenowith, Clark of Ham-ilton, Coats, Conduit, Crawford, Crumbacker, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Fisher, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Gordon, Hall, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mathis, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Moore, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Rariden, Read of Clark, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Stevenson, Taylor, Todd, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President.—68

NAYS.—Messrs. Balingall, Bascom, Beard, Bicknell, Biddle, Borden, Brookbank, Bryant, Chapman, Cole, Colfax, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Foley, Frisbie, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hawkins, Hendricks, Howe, Kilgore, Kinley, Mather, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Clin-ton, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Morgan, Mor-rison of Marion, Murray, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Rob-inson, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Tague, Wheeler, and Wiley.—55.

So the amendment was laid upon the table.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is, upon the engrossment for a third reading of the second (on the page of the report) section of report number three.

Mr. NEWMAN. I desire to offer the fol-lowing amendment:

"Insert after the words, 'the General As-sembly may contract debts,' the words, 'for the purpose of paying or extending the time of the payment of the public debt of the State.'"

It will be borne in mind that it may be de-sirable to borrow money for the purpose of paying the State debt, just as individuals fre-quently find it convenient and profitable to pay one debt by contracting another. It may be that the State will find itself able to contract a loan at a lower rate of interest than she is now paying her bond-holders; in this event, which, sir, is a very probable one, the Legislature ought to have the power to borrow the money for that specific purpose. It would be simply carrying forward the present debt without the accumulation of the principal, and with the advantage of a lower rate of interest. No new debt would, in reality, be created.

Mr. PETTIT [in his seat]. No more a new debt than if the State bonds were assigned over to other parties by the present holders.

Mr. NEWMAN. Precisely. In the business transactions of every day, individuals find it to their interest to create one debt in cancelling another, and I wish the Legislature to have the power to do the same thing for the State when the public interest would thereby be promoted.

Mr. HALL said.

Our present State debt is probably placed upon a different footing from that of any other State in the Union. It is payable at the pleasure of the State. So long as the interest shall be paid, the principal never becomes due. Most of the outstanding bonds of Indiana bear five per cent. interest. As the value of bonds or stocks always depend on the amount of interest or dividends paid thereon, so long as money shall be worth six per cent. interest, the market value of our five per cent. bonds will be about eighty cents to the dollar, which is now their market value.

If the present rate of taxation shall be continued, it is fair to calculate that our domestic debt will be paid off in three years; and that a continuation of the same rate of taxation will fully discharge our foreign debt in fifteen years. The data upon which these conclusions have been arrived at, will be exhibited to the Convention when the appropriate subject comes up.

I can scarcely conceive it possible for a us to place our State debt on terms more favorable than now exists. For these reasons, Mr. President, I consider the amendment just offered at least unnecessary.

The question being upon Mr. Newman's amendment, the same was disagreed to.

Mr. TODD offered the following amendment:

"Strike out the words 'one hundred thousand dollars,' and insert the following, 'amount of said interest;' so that the section should read:

"The General Assembly may contract debts to meet casual deficits or failures in the revenue, for the purpose of paying the interest on the State debt, but such debts shall not at any time exceed ["one hundred thousand dollars" stricken out] the amount of said interest."

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. HELMER moved to amend by striking out after the words "shall not exceed" the words "one hundred thousand dollars," and insert the words, "amount of such deficit."

Mr. MAGUIRE. This section restricts the Legislature from borrowing any money for any purpose, except to meet the interest on the State Debt, and limits the amount to one hundred thousand dollars. The amendment, if adopted, permits the State authorities to borrow to the amount of the deficit, be it more or less. It is my opinion that, after the expiration of the next two years, the State will not have to borrow any money at all, and we can certainly trust the Legislature and the State officers for two years. It is very important that we should lay the interest upon the State Debt promptly. At the time the committee had this subject before them, it was supposed that one hundred thousand dollars would prove sufficient to meet all the deficiencies likely to arise in the revenue to meet the accruing interest on the State Debt; but, from information since received, it appears that there is a possibility of a small additional sum being needed for one or two years. For this reason, I hope that the pending amendment (Mr. Helmer's) may be adopted. It provides that, instead of the Legislature being restricted to the sum of one hundred thousand dollars, we should declare that the amount of debts contracted, should not exceed the amount of deficits in the revenue. As I before remarked, if the sum needed to meet the deficit should be less than one hundred thousand dollars, the Legislature would not be authorized to borrow more than that amount, and the sum borrowed cannot, by any possibility, be applied to any other than that specific purpose.

I do not desire to see one dollar of debt created beyond the amount absolutely needed to meet deficits, but for that amount it is right, and also good policy to provide. The amendment is a good one, and I hope it will be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The PRESIDENT. The next thing in order is the consideration of the section of report number three:

"No act of the General Assembly shall authorize any debt to be contracted on behalf of the State, except for the purposes mentioned in the—[preceding;]—unless provision be made therein, to levy and collect an annual tax, sufficient to pay the interest thereon and to discharge the debt in twenty-five years; nor shall such act take effect until it shall have been submitted to the people at a general election and have received a majority of all the votes cast for and against it.

Mr. SMITH, of Ripley. I rise for the purpose of moving to strike out the entire section.

A single remark in which I will give my views.

This proposition is one to introduce into legislation a new element. It is a proposition to allow the Legislature to contract a debt for an unlimited and indefinite amount of money, provided they shall submit the matter to the people, and provided that a direct tax shall be levied sufficient to pay the interest and to cancel the debt in twenty-five years.

There is no necessity for a provision of this kind. My own impression is that when a Legislature comes up here, its members should come well instructed in their business and understanding the wishes of the people upon all subjects of legislation—they should be able to pass finally upon all laws for the good of the people. I am utterly opposed to the idea of requiring a body of the chosen representatives of the people to enact a law which is of no binding force until approved of by the people a second time at the polls. I say a second time, because the people in choosing from their midst men of integrity and ability to represent them, do virtually endorse their action while serving in that capacity, and therefore it is unnecessary to submit their acts for a second confirmation.

When a merchant authorizes an individual to act as his agent in business transactions, and gives notice to community that he is his accredited agent, that merchant is bound by all the business transactions, contracts, &c., which that agent may make. The merchant reposes confidence in his agent, that he will do nothing adverse to his interests. He considers that, being in his employ, it is to the personal and pecuniary interest of the agent to deal honestly and with an eye to his benefit. Shall not the people—do not the people repose as much confidence in their agents, commissioned annually by their suffrages to act for them, as the merchant puts in his clerk or agent? I contend that the people select their agents to represent them in the Legislature because they cannot attend in person, and that they select men in whose honesty and intelligence they have the greatest confidence, and I say that it is useless to require that the acts of these representatives shall be submitted a second time for their approval.

I am further opposed to the section because there is no restriction as to the amount of debt to be contracted; the amount is unlimited. This certainly is proposing to introduce a novel feature into legislation, and one that will result to the injury rather than the benefit of the people.

Mr. KILGORE. I propose, before the question is taken upon striking out the entire section, to amend by adding at the end of the section [above recited] these words:

"And that part of said act which provides for the payment of said debt, shall not be repealed or suspended until the debt is fully paid."

Mr. NILES. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ripley (Mr. Smith) that he should so modify his motion that, instead of proposing to strike out the whole section he should move to strike out all after the word "article," so that the section would simply read:

"No act of the General Assembly shall authorize any debt to be contracted on behalf of this State, except for the purposes mentioned in the—[preceding] section of this article."

Mr. SMITH, of Ripley. I will accept the modification. I move, then, sir, to strike out all after the word "article."

Mr. BASCOM moved that the amendment (Mr. Kilgore's) lie upon the table.

The question being taken upon Mr. Bascom's motion, the same prevailed.

The question now being upon the motion of Mr. Smith of Ripley?

Mr. RARIDEN moved to strike out all that part of the section which proposed to submit an act for the borrowing of money to the people.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. President: I am not one of those who suppose that the embodied wisdom of the State is concentrated in this Convention, although I think it a most respectable and able body. I think that it is safe to leave something in the people's hands—I think it always safe to trust the people. Now, sir, suppose a great emergency to arise—a famine in the land, or some other great calamity—so that it should become impossible to collect the taxes; if the amendment of the gentleman from Ripley prevail, the Legislature cannot contract a debt for the purpose of carrying on the government. Nor can the State, even if every man in it shall demand it and vote for it, contract a debt for the redemption of any of her Public Works, or for any other purpose. I think, sir, it is good policy, and eminently safe, to leave discretionary power in the hands of the people.

Sir, the subject of corporations has been alluded to in connection with this subject; and it is intimated that those who favor the section as reported by the committee are in favor of involving the State as a partner in works of internal improvements. Now, sir, I have to say for myself that I am utterly opposed to embarking the State in any system of internal improvements, or as a partner in any corporation—other than a State Bank, if the people choose to have one. [Much laughter on all sides.]

Mr. President, the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Ripley would, in my humble judgment, exhibit—what no gentleman would be willing to avow—a want of confidence in the capacity in the people for self-government, to the extent proposed, exhibits a lack of belief in the people for self-government.

Mr. DOBSON. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. DOBSON. I do not know but that the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Rariden,) in voting upon this question, may get caught voting wrong, but I trust not. [Laughter.]

But what will be the effect of the adoption of this amendment? Why that the State cannot borrow money for any purpose except to meet a deficiency in the revenue. I have a right as an individual to borrow money when it is to my interest to do so, and why should not the people through their representatives or the Legislature, or by a direct vote at the ballot-box? I am willing that the State should be involved in debt if the people say so, and vote for it at the ballot-box. This section meets with my approbation as it is, and to test the sense of the Convention I shall call for the yeas and nays upon my motion to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. TAYLOR. A few words, Mr. President, before the vote is taken.

It strikes me that the pending question is one of much greater importance to the people of Indiana than members seem to be conscious of. It is but a few minutes since that we voted down a proposition very similar to this, and I now ask gentlemen to pause for a moment, and look calmly and carefully at the position we occupy. Can it be possible that one hundred and fifty of the representatives of the people, who have come up here, fresh from immediate communication with their constituents, propose themselves, or are to be led into the support of a proposition, to tie up the hands of those constituents by absurd and unexampled restrictions upon the action of representatives assembled in a legislative capacity? Is it possible that this large and able body around me are willing to bind up the will of the people, until the calling of another Convention: are they indeed afraid to trust the people with what is peculiarly their own business—the amount of debt they are desirous to incur, and the rate of taxation they are willing to bear? If the latter part of this section is stricken out, the result would prove it the most unwise and ill-considered acts that could have been committed. By taking that step you actually declare that if the people of the State desire at any time hereafter to contract a debt of half a million of dollars for any purpose whatever, they shall be prohibited by their organic law from carrying out that object.

Sir, I am prepared to take no such step, and I will not. I have as much confidence in the people as I have in this Convention—we are only a portion of the people, temporarily entrusted with the performance of business, for the accomplishment of which they cannot assemble in mass, and shall we dare to say that the people shall never contract a debt except for a specified sum, and that too for a specific purpose? It would be an unwise act than I am yet willing to believe a majority of this Convention can be induced to commit. It is in fact against the whole theory of the government of this country. Our most boasted principle is that the people are the source of all power, that their will is supreme, and the majority shall declare that will. A provision of the kind, supported by the other side, is in direct contravention of those broad principles which lie at the foundation of our form of government. The restriction proposed is palpably subversive of the self-evident principle that the will of the majority must govern. And if we have that laudable ambition to frame an instrument that shall be approved by the majority, and that shall prove worthy enough to endure long after we shall have passed from the stage of action, let us beware how we attempt to fetter the free will and tie up the hands of the people, by refusing to allow them to be the judges of what is the best for their interests under the new combination of circumstances, with which the ever changing future will surround them; let us shrink from an attempt to render impotent the will of the majority of that people fairly and deliberately expressed through the great channel of their communication with their servants—the unmistakable ballot-box. Under such ample guards and restrictions as are provided in the different sections of this article, can there be any danger of the people running madly into debt, and in a collective capacity, rashly commit a financial suicide? Is there so much danger that the people of Indiana, that I had supposed so intelligent in the principles of government, so deliberative in action, will commit self-destruction if left to themselves, and that too with the warning wrecks of 1836 strewn everywhere before their eyes? I cannot believe it; I still have faith that they will exist as a people, and will continue in the steady march to honor and prosperity, even though this Convention should not stake out the narrow road, indicate the points of stopping, and forbid the least divergence from the line marked for them to follow for a century to come. Why, sir, we have been told about the "lights" in this Convention; but great as is my respect for the ability and the foresight of gentlemen, I tell the Convention it cannot see so unerringly into the coming time, and judge so accurately of the interests and wants of this people in that future upon which we can only theorize and speculate, as to declare that it can judge better of the policy to be pursued by the next generation than that generation when it shall come into the busy theater of life. We are not omniscient, and if we rashly venture to declare in this Constitution that a majority of the people shall not be allowed to contract a debt for which they may vote at the polls, we shall find that we are not omnipotent.

Let us not say then, that the people shall not borrow money if they see fit to create a debt; a thousand contingencies may and will arise, that may make it not only necessary, but positively a money making business, for the Legislature to borrow money.

SEVERAL VOICES. What is one instance?

Mr. TAYLOR. I will answer gentlemen. It may be that in the event of abundant capital in Eastern or European markets seeking safe investments at low rates, the State could borrow money at two per cent. less rate of interest than she is now paying the majority of her bondholders. Would it not then be to the interest of the State to borrow the amount of her public debt at this lower rate of interest and cancel the debt in its present shape and save thousands of dollars annually to the tax-payers of the State by the lessened amount of annually accruing interest? Many times men are saved from bankruptcy by such a policy.

Perhaps it is thought that the people will not have as able and as careful men in the Legislature as they have fortunately secured in this Convention. If there was any danger of this being the case in the future, I think the State ruin might be averted by prevailing upon some who were in this Convention to accept of a seat in the Legislature! [Laughter and applause on all sides.]

I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. RARIDEN. I may be mistaken, Mr. President, but I apprehend that in voting upon the pending question we are deciding a greater question than appears upon the surface. I apprehend that this is no less than the question whether or not we are to have a State Bank and branches or free banks.

If I am right in this, and I suspect I am, I wish to say that I am utterly opposed to any proposition having for its object the prohibiting of the State from having the right to control so as to correct the currency of the State. I will never vote to put it out of the power of the State to correct an unsound currency when circumstances may demand that interference. Whatever goes to help the financial condition and increase the financial power of Indiana helps her to control the paper currency of the State, and this, in my opinion, is a proposition that would make her impotent to control that paper currency.

The PRESIDENT. That is not the question before the Convention.

Mr. RARIDEN. This is a proposition forever to prohibit the State of Indiana from borrowing money to exceed the sum of one hundred thousand dollars, and that to be applied to the specific purpose of meeting a deficit of revenue for paying the interest on the State Debt.

The PRESIDENT. That is the proposition now before the body.

Mr. RARIDEN. Yes, sir; but how was the foundation laid for the State Bank except by the State borrowing upwards of two millions of dollars, as the capital upon which to bank? And, sir, if this proposition carries, the people of the State will hereafter be at the mercy of those who, unchecked by a powerless State Government, will be able to control the currency.

I tell you, sir, that there are influences operating upon votes that may not be generally enough appreciated. [Several voices—"that is right; that is true."] I am told by those around me that I am tracking right. [Laughter.] I am opposed, then, to any prohibition that will forever restrict Indiana, as a State, from entering the financial field with a State's resources and correcting a vicious currency. The time may come when the credit of the State may be absolutely necessary to drive such a currency out of her borders. It would not be acting the legitimate part of a Government, which is framed for the good of the governed, if the State was powerless to protect its citizens from the enormous financial frauds that might be practiced upon them with impunity. Those frauds will come just as sure as the State Bank is put down, and the independent banks get unchecked control of the currency of the State.

I have no objection to allowing men of capital to associate their wealth for banking purposes, but I do not want them to acquire a power paramount to the State.

Mr. OWEN. I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Ripley (Mr. Smith) will prevail, and that the latter portion of the section will be stricken out; in other words, that we shall, by Constitutional provision, interdict the Legislature, even in connection with the people, from again following out the ruinous policy of 1836.

Few men have more confidence in the people than I; but it is not my opinion that the people never decide wrong. Unquestionably they do sometimes. In 1796 the people rejected Thomas Jefferson as President, and elected John Adams; while in 1800 they rejected Adams and elected Jefferson. They could not very well have been right in both cases.

In the sober second thought, in the well considered judgment of the people, I have complete confidence; but they are often impulsive, and sometimes mistaken, as may happen to each one of us. In a time of excitement they may do, in haste, that of which they will repent at leisure. This would be assuredly the case, if the people were ever again to involve the State in an enormous public debt, for the prosecution of a system of internal improvements.

It is said that the people have a right to do as they please. Not always. There are things which the people themselves have no right to do.

A VOICE. Name them.

Mr. OWEN. One generation of men have no right to impose burdens upon the succeeding. One generation of men have no moral right to contract a public debt so vast that the next generation, and perhaps that which follows it, shall be loaded down with taxes, to discharge the interest and repay the capital. They may, indeed, do this thing. They may obtain the money and spend it. Many States and nations have done so. But it is not morally right on that account. Wherever it has been done, it has been done wrongfully.

The question of a State Bank in which the State shall become a stockholder, is not, as the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) seems to take for granted, necessarily involved in the pending proposition. We have been officially informed, that, at the expiration of the present State Bank charter, there will be a School fund, of some million and a half dollars, at the control of the State. • That must be invested, in some way, to bring an annual revenue ; and the State may, if she see fit, make bank stock of it. Few gentlemen, I think, who are in favor of a State Bank, would propose that the State shall take stock to a larger amount than that. I am, for my own part, opposed to all connection between the State and any bank. But I do not see that gentlemen who differ with me in this, need vote against the present amendment on that account.

We do not, and we cannot, by this amendment, debar the people from contracting a State debt, if they should be absolutely resolved, and should continue resolved, to do it. There will doubtless be a mode provided in this Constitution, by which, at any future time, separate amendments may be proposed by the Legislature to the people. The provision may be, perhaps, that if two successive Legislatures concur in recommending the same amendment, it shall then be submitted to the decision of the popular vote. If, then, there be, at any time hereafter, an enduring desire on the part of the people to run into debt, they can do so. I am opposed to any easier and more hasty mode of reaching the matter ; and shall therefore vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Ripley.

Mr. READ of Clarke. I must express my surprise to see the discussion upon this question take the course it has. I had supposed that this question of allowing the Legislature to involve the State in debt, was as firmly settled in the negative as was the principle of biennial sessions.

As to banks, I desire to see the State have no connection with banks. But whether or not the gentleman from Wayne is right in his intimation that the bank question is involved in this proposition in favor of restricting the Legislature from contracting a debt of more than one hundred thousand dollars, and that for the specific purpose of paying the interest on the present public debt, I am clearly and unequivocally in favor of restriction. That was one of the particular purposes for which we were sent up here. The State was, and is, laboring under the most serious financial embarrassments, resulting from the abuse of this debt-making power in the memorable year of 1836. Gentlemen may talk to us as did the member over the way, (Mr. Hall,) about the certainty of paying off our enormous public debt in eighteen years, but I must say, that in my humble opinion, it will be five times eighteen years before that most desirable consummation will be realized.

Suppose that the Convention of 1816 had adopted a Constitutional provision similar to the one now in debate, what a prosperous and a happy people might we not have been ? A simple poll-tax would have paid all the annual expenses of the State. In our part of the State this is one of the main questions of Constitutional reform, and the people there had in view a prohibition against the incurring of future debts by future Legislatures, when they voted for the calling of this Convention. Therefore, I say, I am surprised to find that it is even a mooted question whether or not we shall restrict the Legislature from borrowing money except to meet a deficit in the revenue, for the payment of the interest on the State Debt. Nor do I take this position because I think all wisdom is in this Convention, and that future Legislatures will be less wise and less patriotic. No, sir ; I left at home many smarter men than myself, [laughter,] and it is possible, though it may not be true in the case of other gentlemen. [Cries of "yes, it is so with more of us."] If we adopt the pending amendment, future generations may get into the same difficulties from which we have not yet escaped ; but now that we have been delegated with power for the express purpose of prohibiting future Legislatures from accumulating an incubus of debt upon the tax payers of the State, let us do it ; let us do it in the name of the people whose will we must not dare to disobey. I am in favor of the section as it is proposed to be amended by the gentleman from Ripley, (Mr. Smith,) and I am confident that there will be found two-thirds of this Convention who will vote with me.

Mr. LOCKHART. I hope that we shall adopt the section as it came from the committee. During the canvass preceding the election of delegates, this question was discussed from every stump, and the result of discussion, at least among my constituents, was that they declared in favor of the provisions of this section as reported from the committee. I can say that in both of the counties which I represent here, there was not a single dissenting voice against such provisions ; public sentiment there is unanimous in favor them. They do not insist to be prevented from creating a public debt by a vote at the ballot box. I hope that the section as reported will be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. READ of Monroe. Mr. PRESIDENT : We have before us just the old question of a public debt. For my own part I am not of that school which believes a public debt a public blessing.

Sir, if there is any question settled by the people of Indiana, it is this, that they will pay off the debt which now hangs over them, and by this new Constitution forever prohibit the contracting of a new one, except in the single case of insurrection or invasion by an enemy. This I believe to be distinctly the voice of the people of Indiana, and until this evening I had not supposed that there were five men in this Convention who would vote for the power of creating a State debt in any manner, or under any form, or for any purpose.

Sir, we have just passed a tremendous crisis. Now is the time for us to look around and reflect. If we learn no experience from the past, if we now fail, in this period of calmness, to place upon ourselves the restrictions which will in all time to come save us from similar wide spread ruin and calamity, I hold that this Convention has been called in vain.

Look, sir, to other States. State after State has called Conventions to reform their Constitutions. All around us Constitutional Conventions are in sessions, or just about to be in session. If there is a single cause more than any other, which has produced this general movement, it is the desire, on the part of the people, to cut off from themselves and their representatives the power of creating public debt.

Had this great attribute of sovereignty, this precious right of creating public debt, claimed here as one of the dearest rights of a State, been utterly denied to the nations of the world, what a different picture would they have presented. Public debt all over the world is one of the great instruments of oppression—one of the engines by which men are made “hewers of wood and drawers of water” for other men. Through this exercise of a sovereign right Great Britain has her four thousand million dollars of debt, and her people are ground down in the dust of oppression, while the owners of the debt are their masters, without the obligation of even supporting their slaves.

I trust, sir, the motion to strike out will prevail, and that Indiana in all coming time will, by constitutional provisions, be prohibited from selling herself to bond holders. No increase of State debt through any agency whatever is safety, policy, and wisdom.

Mr. BARBOUR. I hope that the pending amendment will not prevail, and after hearing the discussion I am impelled to ask if it can be possible that gentlemen are serious in their intention to forbid the majority of the people from borrowing money if they are disposed to do so, and to tax themselves for the payment of the interest and the liquidation of the whole debt in twenty five years? Have we no confidence in the people? Shall we not believe that they will send up able men, and men of integrity to represent them in the legislature, who can judge of their interests and who should have the power to execute their will?

I will not make a speech at this late hour, but I trust that the section will be adopted without amendment.

Mr. PETTIT. I have risen, sir, to call the attention of the Convention to a canting phrase which has been used and already worn threadbare since the opening of the session; the term is “confidence in the people.” If we had perfect confidence in ourselves as a people, we should have called no Convention at all at an expense of forty or fifty thousand dollars to frame restrictions for the future. If we possess the unlimited confidence in the people of whom we are a part, if we always do right and never go wrong, why have the restraining influence of organic and statute laws? Sir, we have not that perfect confidence in ourselves, nor have the people outside of this chamber in themselves, and we take our cool and calm moments to bind and restrict ourselves—to protect ourselves against the sudden and dangerous impulses of passion and prejudice. Gentlemen rise here and propose a restrictive clause in one thing, but upon every thing else, upon every other restriction than the one he proposes, he has great confidence in the people and declaims against the idea of restricting clauses, and another gentleman will rise in his place and offer an amendment, the effect of which is to restrict the natural liberty of the people in another direction, but he, also, will tell you that it is from no distrust of the people that he takes that course—far from it.

Now, if we repose unlimited confidence in ourselves as a people, we should do nothing more in this Constitution than to provide for a legislative department. Yes, sir, one, short simple clause of five words is sufficient. “There shall be a legislature,” no more is needed unless to mention that there should be two branches, one to consist of one hundred the other of fifty members. We might have met in the morning of the first Monday in October and in an hour’s time been prepared to adjourn sine die. This implicit confidence in human nature does away with the necessity of all checks and guards and Constitutional provisions. Representatives would come up here and whether calm and deliberate and uninfluenced by any extraneous circumstances of feverish and excited, and swayed by the powerful influences always brought to bear upon the almoners of power, their laws will be binding, the people have elected them and the people can do no wrong. Sir, this gross flattery of a collective body which no individual member of it would be vain and silly enough to take to himself, is not correct—it is not the language that should deter us from patiently investigating every subject that comes before us, and from endeavoring to provide every wholesome restriction which time and the experience of a great people in self government, show us to be necessary and politic. Self government is no longer a theory, it has been demonstrated, it has passed the ordeal of the severest test and it stands out as a recognized practicability among men, as glorious in its results, as it was beautiful in theory. But, Mr. President, the experience of men in self government has not yet intoxicated them with the idea that they are immaculate; it has only shown that under wisely framed restrictions, adopted in times of calmness and in the absence of excitement, it is the happiest and the best form of government. And, sir, it is to prevent the evils resulting from excitement and passion, that we take our calmer and quieter hours to bind ourselves and our fellow man. Otherwise, there is no need of the present organization of government. You create a legislative department only and it will have all the power you need. That legislature could create an executive, to execute its will, a judicial department to construe it, for they have all law-making power. It will be as omnipotent as the British Parliament. Why not create such a legislature? We have, it is said, unlimited confidence in the people and in ourselves.

Sir, the song to which we have listened from the gentleman from Gibson, is an old one, and its voice of syren tones is that which allures to ruin. The beginning is a profession of unbounded confidence in the never erring judgment of the people—the end is entanglement in the meshes of an enormous public debt. Let me refer that gentleman to the last message of Governor Noble, who has now passed from the stage of action, and I shall therefore only speak of those of his acts, which are a part of the documentary history of the State. In his last message, he told the people that the resources of the State were sufficient not only to complete the public works then commenced but to construct those works projected and provided for in the bill generally known as “the calf bill” without taxing the people a farthing. I cite it to show how terribly the people have been deceived and as a warning that we should guard well the debt making power for the future.

Tell me not that the impending State debt will be cancelled in eighteen years. Any statement of this kind must be based upon the calculation that the population of the State will double and threble in a few years, and that the taxable property of the State will double every year.

Mr. President, I believe that this clause of the section should be stricken out, and indeed the whole section might be stricken out, but for the purpose of greater definiteness I am willing to vote for it. The previous section provides that the Legislature may borrow money, specifies the purpose to which it must be applied, and fixes the amount.

Upon the score of principle, I should vote to strike out the following clause which is the portion to which I particularly object:

“Unless provision be made therein to levy and collect an annual tax sufficient in amount to pay the interest thereon, and to discharge the debt within twenty-five years; nor shall such act take effect until it shall have been submitted to the people at a general election, and shall have received a majority of all the votes cast for and against it.”

We came here to frame organic law that should be the rule of action of the people until by them amended, and I shall vote for no proposition to submit the acts passed by a Legislature to a separate vote at the annual election. The people, for whose benefit it is said to be, do not want it; they choose men from their midst to make laws, not to recommend bills. A Legislature is a law-making power, not a mere meeting of men to advise the people to do this and that.

Of all the curses upon the people is the demagogueism which proposes that the legislative department shall merely recommend the passage of laws and submit them to the people, and only be in force if voted for by a majority at the polls. It is all contrary to the principles of our institutions. We create an executive department to execute laws, a judiciary to construe them, but a legislature to make them. Otherwise, why go through the mockery of forms? Elect A. and B. to draft laws and submit them for adoption by the people at the annual election?

I am utterly opposed to the creating of a public debt which was contracted under an excitement unparalleled in the history of the country. And, if you leave this door open, as proposed in the latter clause of this section which I have cited, it will be so again. By producing a state of feverish excitement, a measure can be carried at the polls, for borrowing any amount of money. I am for restriction. A burnt child dreads the fire—and this State has been most dreadfully burned in this regard. What is the position of Indiana to-day. She has scarcely a locality upon the political diagram of the earth. She has no name except for an almost abandoned public faith and ruined public credit. She has walked to the brink of repudiation and lasting disgrace.

Instead, then, of allowing any opportunity for a future Legislature to contract another public debt, insert a positive Constitutional prohibition against it in every possible form and shape; redeem the honor of the State, free her from the disgrace abroad and the embarrassment at home, of a public debt of twelve millions. This is what the people demand.

Mr. MOWRER moved that the Convention adjourn, but objection being made, the motion was withdrawn.

Mr. NILES. I should feel no solicitude as to the fate of the motion now pending, and should make no remarks upon the subject except for the indications of the vote taken a few moments since.

It must be admitted that a public debt is, in itself, an unmixed evil. The history of the world is full of lessons to that effect. It is, doubtless true, that in a very few instances, the accumulation of a debt, and the expenditure of money, raised upon the strength of the public credit, have proved useful, both to the State and the people. The construction of the Erie canal by the State of New York, is perhaps, the most memorable example of the kind upon record. But it should not be forgotten that such instances are the exceptions rather than the rule. In a large majority of cases, similar experiments on the part of governments, have resulted only in disastrous failures. The history of our own attempt to make ourselves rich and prosperous, by borrowing money to improve the State, is but too fresh in all our recollections. I am no enemy to public improvements. I class them among the most valuable characteristics of the age in which we live. But I believe that all works of real importance can be effected by means of individual or associated wealth and enterprise. And with that view, I have earnestly endeavored in this Convention, to secure to associations formed for such purposes, all the facilities consistent with justice and a perfect equality of rights. I hold that a government should confine its operations as far possible, within its own necessary and appropriate sphere—throwing its protection over all alike—encouraging every useful enterprise, but leaving to the people, in their private capacity, whatever they are capable of doing.

There are strong prudential reasons why a government should not engage in enterprises, which can be accomplished by the people themselves. A government can act only through agents, who are far removed from their principal, and who can seldom be held to a strict accountability.

It seems now to be admitted, that one generation has no right to impose a public debt upon another. This is a great truth, and a principle of justice which the world has been slow to learn, but which, among us, is fully established. It is equally plain to my mind that, except for the immediate necessities of the government, a majority should never be permitted to impose a public debt upon a minority without their consent, and against their will. Each is equally inconsistent with the purpose for which governments are formed. Whether the debt be contracted for twenty-five years or for all time, it is to me equally objectionable. While I am unwilling that such a burden should be imposed upon my own and my neighbors children, I am equally unwilling that it should be forced upon myself and my neighbors, whether composing a large or a small minority of the people of the State.

I therefore, can but hope that the motion now pending will prevail and that these sections will be adopted in such a form, as, at once and forever, to preclude the possibility of a greatly increased burden of taxation. Let us take warning from our own past history, and from the present condition of almost every nation in Europe, and effectually guard against accumulated public burdens.

If it be said that my views upon this subject indicate a want of confidence in the people and are inconsistent with the doctrines for which I have earnestly contended, that according to the theory of our government, we should, as we may safely trust the people in the management of their own business, such as whether they shall elect one man or another to an office, or whether they shall elect a man only once or a dozen times to the same office, I answer that the one is inseparably connected with the preservation and conduct of the government, while the other has no such necessary connection with it. The difference is much the same as between a man's meddling with other people's business or attending to his own.

Mr. FOSTER. I have but a few words to say, sir, but in what I do say I shall be in earnest. It sounded singular indeed to hear the distinguished gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles) say that the majority had no right to tax the minority,—that, in a word, the majority shall not rule in, and control the government. Why, sir, that is not only contrary to the whole theory of our government, but it is in direct contravention of the ground assumed by the gentleman throughout the session, thus far.

Gentlemen profess great love for the people, and yet they are afraid to trust them in the matter of creating a public debt if they should ever choose to do so, and express their will by a direct and separate vote.

With all due deference to the Convention, and to Legislatures, I beg leave to say that I have more confidence in the people than in their representatives. The people do not always select their best men to represent them; they sometimes fail and elect demagogues. [Cries of "consent!"] Give me the judgment of the people; I have unlimited confidence in their decisions.

I am pledged to go against any provision for the contracting of a public debt, unless the law for that purpose shall, before it goes into effect or is binding upon them, be submitted for their adoption or rejection at the next annual election after its passage by the Legislature.

The proposition now under consideration, to strike out all the latter part of the pending section, is really a proposition for preventing the State to borrow money, whether or not the people shall ever desire to borrow. This I shall oppose.

I am opposed to banks, but, sir, when it comes to a choice between the State Bank and a system of free banking, I pledge myself to go for the former. And my colleague knows that this will be acting in conformity with the sentiments and expressed will of our constituents.

It has been observed that we are a progressive people, and that we have progressed in democracy.

Sir, I belong to the old school and cannot follow where some of my younger brethren seem disposed to lead; and I shall not vote for a constitutional restriction that will forever prevent the people from borrowing money no matter how pressing the emergency, and notwithstanding a great majority may be in favor of borrowing, and deliberately express themselves so at the polls.

As I remarked when I rose, I had at this time but few words to say, and those in earnest, but when the subject comes up hereafter I shall endeavor to give certain positions claimed to be democratic, a review that will show what is democracy and what is not.

A motion to adjourn was made and disagreed to.

SEVERAL VOICES. Question! question! Mr. TAYLOR. I hope that gentlemen will not demand the question and prevent debate when many gentlemen upon the opposite side have not been heard.

Mr. WATTS. I was not aware that the gentleman desired to speak.

Mr. TAYLOR. When I was addressing the chair before in opposition to the motion to strike out, several gentlemen called for the question.

I am sorry to see gentlemen so excited as they appear to be upon this question of borrowing money. It is a simple question of whether or not we will do our duty to the people who sent us here. Whether we strike out this clause or not is a question of no importance to me personally, but I see no cause for haste or heated feeling. And I call upon gentlemen who a few minutes since voted in favor of allowing the counties to incur a debt when a majority of the voters demanded it, to stand up to the support of this section which proposes to allow the State to borrow money when a majority of the people of the State deliberately vote that they deem it good policy to incur a public debt, and especially when that money is to be borrowed under the ample guards and checks provided in the same section. I say, sir, that I call upon those gentlemen to be consistent and support this section as it came from the committee. Why not forbid the counties to do that which you say is wrong in the State? For my own part, I voted against allowing the counties to run in debt, but I was overruled and yet I have no disposition to indulge in any excited feelings because I was overruled.

I have no doubt of the power of the Convention to adopt such restrictions as it may see fit, but I do think that it would be a very unwise act to strike out the latter part of this section, which, as I before remarked, is virtually saying that the people shall not be allowed to judge of the necessity and policy of loaning money.

I shall vote to retain the section as it came from the committee; and allow me to say to those who hold similar views to my own, that I trust they will not be intimidated by the excitement and the disposition to press this matter to a vote which has been exhibited by the friends of the pending amendment. This excitement is another argument for submitting the question of incurring a debt to the people, to be sepaately voted upon; for the Legislature may become as excited as this Convention now is.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. I am willing to stay here and debate the question as long as it is the pleasure of the body to hear discussion. I came here to represent between three and four thousand "burnt children," as the gentleman from Tippecanoe has aptly termed the people of Indiana in regard to the State debt and public works. And, sir, I do not believe that among the whole number there are five persons who would stand up and publicly avow their willingness to see the state contract another public debt, and who would, if they were here, tell me to vote against the proposition to strike out the latter part of this section, which provides that the Legislature may pass laws for incurring a State debt, by submitting the same to a separate vote of the people.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I came here not to restrict the people in their liberties any further than they have instructed me to restrain them. They have instructed me to vote for such a provision as is really effected by my motion to strike out the latter clause of this section. They wish thus to restrict themselves in their time of calm deliberation. I think, therefore, that we should be allowed to vote to carry out the plainly expressed will of our constituents, by opposing any provision leaving it in the power of the Legislature to contract another public debt, without having it continually thrown in our teeth that we are "distrusting the people," and that we dare not and do not repose confidence in them.

We come here for the express and sole object of representing and carrying out the will of the people; and I know that there are many delegates here who feel instructed to vote against the incurring of another debt, whether or not submitted to the people.

The present embarrassments of the State have come upon us because the representatives went ahead of the people and succeeded in leading them astray. Now, what the people want is a constitutional provision that shall make it forever impossible that the scenes of 1836 should be re-enacted. It was represented to the people of that day, by the political leaders, that they might go on with that gigantic system of internal improvements without incurring any additional tax upon themselves; in fact, the proposition was made that the State could borrow money to construct these public works, and never have any tax to pay thereon out of their own pockets—that the debt, in other words, would pay itself. I say that of such propositions the like was never known in any other country before or since. The people listened to these propositions; they plunged madly into the system of internal improvements, and the gulf of financial ruin into which they landed holds them in its almost hopeless depths to this day.

And, sir, the same thing may occur again, unless we now place constitutional barriers that cannot be overleaped, in opposition to the contracting of a public debt for any purpose except that named in the preceding section—the payment of interest on State debt.

I hope that the Convention will agree to strike out the latter clause of the section.

On motion by Mr. HOVEY,

The Convention adjourned.

THURSDAY, Nov. 21, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. CRESSY.

ABOLITION OF THE COMMON LAW.

Mr. TAGUE asked and obtained a suspension of the rules, to enable him to offer the following:

Resolved, That the committee on laws and law reform report an article to this Convention as soon as possible, for the purpose of abolishing the common law of England.

Mr. RARIDEN. That might leave the English government in a horrible position. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT. The resolution lies over one day.

NEGROES AND MULATTOES.

Mr. FOSTER made an ineffectual motion to suspend the rules for the purpose of taking up the consideration of instructions to the select committee on the rights and privileges of negroes and mulattoes, offered by himself on yesterday.

Mr. BORDEN. It will be recollected, that, some time since, I presented a couple of petitions upon the subject of the rights of negroes, and that they were laid upon the table, with the understanding that they might be taken up again and referred, at any proper time. I ask now for a suspension of the rules, in order that these petitions may be taken up and referred to the select committee which was created yesterday.

The petitions were accordingly taken from the table and referred to the select committee on the rights and privileges of negroes, by unanimous consent.

PROHIBITION OF A LICENSE LAW.

The PRESIDENT having called for the presentation of petitions and memorials,

Mr. HAWKINS presented the petition of sundry ladies of —, asking the Convention to insert a clause in the amended Constitution similar to that contained in the new Constitution of the State of Michigan, prohibiting the Legislature from passing any law of license for vending intoxicating liquors: and upon his motion, it was Ordered, That said petition be referred to a select committee of one member from each judicial district of the State.

POLL TAX.

The PRESIDENT having called for reports from select committees,

Mr. McCLELLAND, from the select committee to which was referred the petition of sundry citizens of Randolph county, praying for the abolition of all laws for the assessment of a poll tax in the State of Indiana, reported the following section, recommending the same to be adopted as a part of the amended Constitution, and asking that they be discharged from the further consideration of the subject:

"SEC. —. No poll or per capita tax shall hereafter be levied, either for State or county purposes."

The committee were discharged accordingly; and the section passed the first reading, and was ordered to be read a second time on to-morrow.

PUBLIC DEBT.

The PRESIDENT. The first thing in the order of the day is the consideration of the second section reported from the committee on the State debt and public works, which was engrossed and ordered to be read a third time on yesterday.

The section was now read by the Secretary as follows:

SEC. —. The General Assembly may contract debts to meet casual deficits or failures in the revenue, for the purpose of paying the interest on the State debt; but such debts shall not, at any time, exceed the amount of such deficits: Provided, That the State may contract debts to repel invasion, suppress insurrection, or, if hostilities are threatened, provide for the public defence.

Mr. RARIDEN. Are these sections subject to amendment now?

The PRESIDENT. No, sir.

Mr. RARIDEN. I move to re-commit the section with instructions to add these words:

"Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent the State from using its credit to found a State Bank."

A VOICE. That subject will come up in the consideration of another report.

The PRESIDENT. Does the gentleman withdraw his motion?

Mr. RARIDEN. It looks to me that such an amendment would be appropriate here. It will be a test question at all events, and might as well be taken now as at any other time.

A VOICE. Consent.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman will send up his instructions in writing.

Mr. DOBSON. I think the gentleman need have no apprehensions in regard to this matter. The Legislature have now all the power which he asks for; and we may authorize them to go further. The question may come up in connection with the consideration of the very next section.

tion. Every government should possess within itself the power to perpetuate its own existence—to carry on its own affairs with its own means, or upon its own credit. The meaning of the language of that section is, that the Legislature may contract debts for certain purposes, and we may go on further and say, for other purposes. But with respect to the sections now before us, they are all right as they stand.

Mr. RARIDEN. I do not wish to divide the friends of the proposition by interpolating in an improper place. All I want is to secure the adoption of the principle.

The PRESIDENT. If the gentleman will examine these sections, he will find that they refer exclusively to the power of providing for the revenue.

Mr. RARIDEN. If that is the case then, I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BORDEN proposed to re-commit the section with instructions to strike out the words inserted yesterday upon the motion of the gentleman from Lawrence, (Mr. Helmer,) namely: "the amount of such deficits," and insert in lieu thereof, the words "two hundred thousand dollars;" and he explained and showed the necessity of this amendment.

Mr. B. said, it seems to me, sir, that this section ought to be re-committed for amendment. In my opinion the section as it now stands is very imperfect, and prevents the borrowing of money for any other purpose than to meet a deficit which may occur in the taxes levied for the purpose of paying the interest on the State debt. It strikes me that the General Assembly ought to be permitted to borrow to a limited amount in case of failures in the revenue for the ordinary purposes of the State Government. And I further think that they should be permitted to borrow for any cases that may occur, and which cannot now be foreseen, some one or two hundred thousand dollars. But as the Convention has decided against this, I am not at all disposed to resist the action of the body.

My principal object in desiring to see this amendment, and without which I cannot go for the section, is that the amendment of the gentleman has made very uncertain that which before was definite; for the section as reported by the committee, limited the borrowing to one hundred thousand dollars. It seems to me that the section as it now stands, offers an inducement to those administering the government, to use the revenue of the government set apart for the purposes of paying the interest on the State debt, and then supply the deficit by borrowing. And as the interest on the debt, may in time when we come to pay full interest on our State indebtedness, amount to nearly a half million, they have only to use the revenue, and borrow to that amount; and thus the State officers would be enabled, and even tempted to do that by an indirection, which the Constitution would not allow them to do directly. It seems to me, therefore, that the section ought to be re-committed with instructions to fix a limit beyond which they should not go for any purpose. And also it would be well to authorize borrowing in cases of failure of the ordinary revenue, to a very limited amount, and also for contingencies which cannot now be foreseen; but in no event, for any and all purposes, to exceed the sum of two hundred thousand dollars.

The motion to re-commit was rejected.

The PRESIDENT thereupon directed the Secretary to proceed (under the standing rule) with the call of the yeas and nays, upon the third and last reading of this section; and the Secretary reported—yeas 111, nays 6—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Badger, Balingall, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Berry, Biddle, Blythe, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Carr, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hugin, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, Mathis, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Taylor, Todd, Trimble, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President.—111.

NAYS.—Messrs. Borden, Conduit, Crawford, Dick, Kilgore, and Robinson—6.

So the section was passed to a third reading, and ordered to be referred to the committee on revision, arrangement and phraseology.

The PRESIDENT. The next thing in order is the consideration of the section last but one of the report from the committee on the State Debt and Public Works, presented by their chairman on the 26th of October, upon which the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Hovey) is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOVEY said, if there is any one class of principles within the broad scope of Constitutional reform in reference to which I consider myself instructed, it is that class embraced in the sections reported by the committee, and one of which is now under consideration.

Throughout the whole of the county which I in part have the honor to represent, the question of involving the State in debt was canvassed, and every candidate, so far as I can remember, advocated the adoption of sections similar in all respects to those reported by the committee. I am certain that I heard from neither candidates nor voters one single dissenting voice. I advocated the adoption of these principles there, and I shall advocate them here, because I feel myself instructed and pledged to do so, unless some strong reasons shall be given that will convince me to the contrary—reasons so strong and overwhelming that they might not only govern my mind, but the minds of my constituency.

Let us consider, Mr. President, what cause gave rise to the proposed reform. What was it? Where did it originate? It was the immense State debt fastened upon the people by the Legislature a few years ago. And now, sir, I ask if it is probable that the people at that time would have agreed to that grand legislative scheme had they enjoyed the right to have vetoed that law? I know they would not. Had the same Constitutional sections now proposed been at that time a part of our organic law—had it then been necessary as it would be under this section, that the same act that authorized the loan should have provided by taxation for the payment of principal and interest within the short space of twenty-five years, the "Mammoth Scheme" of 1836 never could have become the law of the land. It is a well known fact that that odious law was fixed upon the State of Indiana by a most infamous system of bargain and intrigue, of log-rolling and corruption. You may corrupt a few men, but you cannot corrupt the masses—you cannot succeed with political log-rolling with the people at large.

And now, sir, let us examine the reasonableness of the section under consideration. In the first place when a debt might be proposed under a section like this, it would be the subject of discussion before the people when electing their Representatives and Senators. The Legislature thus chosen would then have to act upon the question, and if they should enact a law authorizing the borrowing, it would then be submitted to the people for their sanction or rejection. Thus it may be truly said that the people would three times deliberately pass upon every law contemplated by this section; first, in electing their representatives; secondly, by the act of the Legislature, and thirdly by the final vote given before it could become a law. Some time must necessarily elapse during these operations, and the public mind, if it should happen to become excited, would have time to cool, so that there would be but little to apprehend from dangerous or mischievous impulses.

Again: as the section provides that the law authorizing the debt must provide by taxation the means to pay both principal and interest within twenty-five years; a period less than a single generation; it compels the same men who caused the debt to be contracted to pay it themselves, and does not entail it upon future generations.

We have also in favor of this section the experience and sanction of other States, and I think we should never turn a deaf ear to the voice of experience. What has New York done in reference to this subject? The section in her Constitution with regard to State debts agrees almost verbatim with the section before us, except that their limit is one million instead of one hundred thousand dollars. What has Kentucky done? Her Constitutional section on this subject is the original from which the section under discussion was taken. It is a literal copy with the exception that their limitation is five hundred thousand dollars instead of one hundred thousand dollars. Iowa also has a similar provision in her Constitution.

The amendment offered to the section would indeed be a radical reform. Throughout this broad Republic no State has as yet gone the length which this amendment proposes. No State has as yet dared thus to tie her hands. No; it has been left for Indiana and her bold reformers to take this broad leap in the dark. It seems to me to be truly dangerous thus to bind and fetter the energies of our young and prosperous State. I ask gentlemen to pause and examine the section and amendment—I ask them to hesitate before they thus shackle her, without reference to coming events which may make it necessary to exercise that power which she now possesses and of which they wish to deprive her. What is the duty of the Constitutional Reformer? Surely not to try experiment—surely not to try in how many ways he can impose checks and restrictions upon the people. He should leave the people as free and untrammelled as a due regard to their prosperity and happiness will admit. Every unnecessary restriction that he imposes on the people is but an additional link in the chain that deprives them of their liberty. This wild course of adopting untried restrictions seems to me to be striking at the very root of government.

In favoring this section and opposing the amendment I do not wish to be misunderstood. I am not in favor of the section because I wish the State to borrow money to embark in internal improvements or banking. Far from it. I believe the true duty of the State is to attend to her internal police and see that her laws are fully and fairly administered.

But I contend that it is wrong in principle to impose this restriction upon the power of the people, embraced within the amendment to the section under discussion. I think it is taking away a right that pre-eminently belongs to them, and which may eventually result in great injury to the State.

And now, sir, suppose you adopt the amendment and vote down this section, what is it, in effect, saying to your sovereigns the people? It is, in effect, saying to them, "You cannot act with sufficient deliberation, and although we know that all power belongs to and emanates from you, still you might do wrong in borrowing money; you might bankrupt the State and ruin yourselves, and therefore we will deprive you of that power." That people must be "gloriously intelligent" indeed who would submit to such an argument as this. That people that could not be trusted under the restrictions in the section under discussion, would be truly in a lamentable condition—not to be trusted, sir, even though they should three times decide unanimously in favor of a law! Surely this is the day of progress and reform.

But we have been told by the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) that such arguments are demagogueical; that this referring laws to the people for their adoption savors of demagogueism. In reply, I would say, that that sentiment, as expressed by him, savors more of dogmatism than the submission of any law to the people does of demagogueism. I, sir, for one, shall not be driven by such charges to pin my faith to any man's skirt. I think I heard that gentleman, in his manly, stentorian voice, but a few days ago, say that the people should have the right at all times to elect their own officers, without restriction being imposed in regard to eligibility; that they should be untrammelled, and stand boldly forth in the exercise of every attribute of sovereignty. Here is his language:

"Sir, I despise and spurn the principle. I maintain that you will have better officers by holding out the assurance that if their conduct shall undergo the proper scrutiny of time, their services shall be appreciated. Sir, if you prevent the eligibility of your officers you take away their amiability and stifle their better feelings, and you curtail the rights of the people. To such a principle I never will give my sanction."

He never would curtail the rights of the people, yet here, by the action of this body, he proposes to cut off the power of the people to borrow money, and that too under restrictions which would assuredly prevent injury.

The course of the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles) is also very singular to me. A few days ago we heard his voice raised in the most eloquent strains, setting forth his entire confidence in the people, and his readiness to trust them in the management of their own affairs. He said, in substance, that the more we trust the people the more they will be worthy of being trusted. I admired his arguments then, and acted in conjunction with him to carry out his views, but now he seems to have entirely cast off his former opinions in favor of the people's capacity, and thinks, in this case, that they should not be trusted. He and the gentleman from Tippecanoe seem to apply the principle before referred to like an old coat, which is cast aside when it is no longer useful. Where is the consistency in applying the principle in the one case and not in the other? Gone.

"Gone glimmering with the dreams of things that were,
A school-boy's tale, the wonder of an hour."

But now, sir, let us ask if these restrictions in the amendment are adopted, what will be the probable consequence? The Legislature of the State would be restricted from borrowing money, even with the unanimous consent of the people, except in four cases: first, to supply the casual deficits in the revenue to pay the interest on the public debt; secondly, to repel invasion; thirdly, to suppress insurrection, and fourthly, if hostilities are threatened, to provide for the public defense.

She cannot borrow a dime for any other purpose, no difference what the emergency might be, or however important the call.

Suppose there should be another commercial convulsion such as was experienced a few years ago, what would be the effect upon the treasury of the State? If we look back upon the tax books in the different counties from 1839 to 1843 we shall easily be prepared to answer. Look at the delinquencies; more than half the lands in the State returned delinquent, and your State treasury more than empty. Let but such another revulsion take place under our present embarrassment, and unless we are permitted to borrow, where will be the money to move the wheels of State?

Again: suppose the public buildings should be consumed by fire, where would the means be found to re-build them? We would have to wait until we could accumulate from our annual revenue a surplus sufficient for that purpose.

Look at this in another point of view. It might be desirable to change our public creditors. Suppose we could borrow money at four per cent. to purchase our State bonds, which are now drawing six, would it not be a most desirable operation? Yet nothing of that kind could be done; no such advantages could be acted on by the State; she would be tied down, hand and foot, and must submit to her fate. I have given these instances to show that the amendment to the section might materially injure the best interests of the State. How many emergencies may happen in the course of time in which credit might materially benefit us, no human eye can foresee.

It seems to me to be impolitic and unwise to shut the door against all the contingencies that may happen. I think, in all such cases that may hereafter arise, we ought to have the power to help ourselves.

There is still another contingent event which might happen which would call for the exercise of the full sovereign power of this State. I approach its consideration reluctantly and with diffidence. I allude to the dissolution of our glorious Union. The storms and black clouds that seem hovering over the Northern and Southern horizon, may break upon us much sooner than we anticipate. I hope and pray that such will not be the case, but unless a better state of feeling shall calm the phrensied passions of the madmen of the South and the fanatics of the North, such a result is not to be classed among the impossibilities. And now, sir, in that event Indiana would resume her sovereignty with a Constitution prohibiting her borrowing, if necessary, the means to sustain it. If the dissolution should be peaceable, no invasion threatened, no war, no public insurrection even though the people in mass should feel disposed to fortify our frontier, not one cent could be borrowed to do it. For these reasons and a thousand more, that time may teach us, I think we should reject the amendment, and adopt the section in the form in which it came from the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I wish to inquire into the state of the question—whether the next question is upon my motion.

The PRESIDENT. Yes, the question is upon the gentleman's motion.

Mr. SMITH. I suppose then, that I have a right to modify or change the motion which I have made.

The PRESIDENT. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH. I move then to strike out the entire section, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"There shall not be established or incorporated in this State any banking corporation or moneyed institution for the purpose of issuing bills of credit or bills payable to order or bearer; but nothing herein contained shall prevent the General Assembly from establishing a State Bank and branches, not exceeding one for any three counties, to be established at such places, within such counties, as the Directors of the State Bank may select; provided there be subscribed and paid, in specie, on the part of individuals, a sum equal to thirty thousand dollars; and for the purpose of establishing such Bank, the Legislature shall have full power, on the part of the State, to create the stock of said State Bank and branches, on loans made on the credit of the State, or upon the existing Bank funds of the State; and for that purpose the Legislature may extend or renew the existing loans for Bank purposes on the part of the State."

Mr. S. then said—Mr. President: I suppose that having made this motion to amend, it will, at least, be necessary for me to give some kind of an explanation. I take exceptions to this section. I am opposed to the principle of submitting propositions of law to the people; they ask no such power or provision at our hands.

When I made this motion at first the idea of a State Bank, or of banking powers, did not occur to me at all. I moved to strike out the section because I was opposed to it. But unfortunately, that motion seems to have excited a feeling upon the subject, which I was not aware of. The gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Rariden,) seemed to discover that it was, perhaps, an insidious intention on my part, to destroy the present banking system of the State of Indiana. But I really had no such intention. I was induced to make the motion simply on account of my opposition to the principle laid down in the section.

But now, since I discover that upon this article of the amended Constitution, the question of Bank or no Bank must be mooted,—let me remark, that when the first section came up, the gentleman, (Mr. Rariden,) discovered that it was adverse to the banking system of the State; so the gentleman proposed banking powers as an amendment to the first section. The gentleman's proposition was, however, withdrawn, it will be recollected by the express understanding that it was to lie over only, until the question should fairly come up. In view of this fact also, it must be apparent, that I did not understand that this section had any reference to banks or banking powers. But, as I remarked before, it is as important now as at any other time; that we should meet this question.

And here, Mr. President, let me explain that in taking my position before the country, I took ground in favor of the bank power in the present Constitution.

Mr. President, I wish to redeem the pledges which I have made to the country with reference to this subject; and for this reason, I would like to know the mind of the Convention in regard to it. Because if it is the intention of the Convention to refuse to grant this power, I desire to know it; because, then I shall be enabled to regulate my position by that which may be taken by the Convention. For this reason, I desire that the question should now be taken in regard to the continuance of the State Bank power of Indiana.

But, sir, allow me to say a few things in regard to the section proposed to be stricken out. As I before remarked, I am opposed to the section, without reference to the question of banking powers. But the gentleman from Wayne seems to think that if we pass upon this article without providing for a bank, we shall foreclose and cut off our power to act upon this subject hereafter. But, sir there is a separate article which we have yet to consider with reference to banking powers and the establishment of a bank: and when that subject shall come up, we shall have the power to declare the manner in which the necessary funds shall be raised for this purpose, and the amount (as it may be) which shall be borrowed for that purpose. Surely, when we shall come to consider the question of banking alone, we shall have the power to say, in that article, the manner in which we will raise the necessary funds for that purpose: and if we do pass these sections as they are, it cannot follow that we conclude our powers with reference to making a bank, or granting all the necessary means for carrying it into effect. But, in regard to the matter to be stricken out—I have said that I was opposed to it—and why? Why, I ask, should we leave any question open, which we propose to consider and adopt? Why should we submit any questions separately to the people? I agree with the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit). If that gentleman ever made a good, strong, stirring remark—and he never makes any other kind—it was his remark which was directed to this point on yesterday. I agree with him fully, that the doctrine of this section is calculated to promote the feeling of demagoguery in the State, and that agitating and unimportant matter will always be kept open before the people by demagogues. But it was insisted by the gentleman last upon the floor (Mr. Hovey) that if this salutary and wise provision had been in the constitution of the State of Indiana at the time of the adoption of the internal improvement system, which he designates as a corrupt system and as being passed corruptly at the time,—if this wise provision had been in the constitution at that time, the system would not have been adopted.

I have some recollection of those times and of the adoption of that system. I was here at the time, and the gentleman on my right (Mr. Kilgore) was here, and some five or six others were also present, here, upon the passage of that internal improvement bill. I think the gentleman (Mr. Hovey) was not quite correct in the data which he has assumed, upon this subject, nor in all his conclusions. I am of the opinion that if this very clause had been in the constitution at that time, that still the system would have been adopted. The gentleman may be somewhat mistaken in regard to the getting up of this system and its progress to the final passage. I was here at its inception—but the bill itself was passed a year afterwards. The great battle for internal improvement was fought a year previous to the passage of the internal improvement bill. I shall be sustained in this assertion by my friend (Mr. Kilgore) on the right. In the session 1834-'35 this great battle was fought here, in the old Court House. It was sprung upon a proposition to appropriate funds to carry on the work of the Wabash and Erie Canal. My friend on the right (Mr. Kilgore) was a leader upon that occasion. They undertook to tack the general internal improvement system upon that bill, and they spread their net very wide and laid it very artfully, extending their system by lines drawn over all portions of the State: especially over such portions as would be likely to gather up and enlist in its support all the speaking and influential members of the House at that time.

I was a young man at that time, and gentlemen will recollect that I almost tread the "wine press" of opposition to the system alone, upon that occasion. But the lazy and agricultural members of the House came to my relief, and we voted down the manmouth bill, as it was called. But gentlemen were not content with that. They understood the system of log rolling very well, and they understood the people. After the first bill was voted down, they proposed and carried a simple survey bill, and sent out their surveyors, and corps of engineers, and marked out the lines of the projected works; and the next year they brought up to the Legislature a sentiment in its favor that was perfectly overwhelming: and, sir, if you had sent out a tax bill for twenty millions of dollars at that time the people would have voted for it. And might not such a thing come up again? Might not certain systems and projects of public improvements, or other matters of great absorbing interest, be presented to the people at some future time. Any such excitement as this, begets a feeling of passion and interest amongst the people, and you may send out a bill paying interest annually, and in twenty-five years redeeming the principal and all that, and the people themselves, will be found willing to tax themselves for the sake of establishing a system of this kind, or something else.

Sir, I object to the principle laid down in this section, and the idea that we are limiting the power of the people. I can see no sense in this at all. We grant to the Legislature the power to make laws; not the mere power to make propositions for laws, for the people to decide upon through the ballot box. They ask no such power; they think it trifling with the high function of law-making.

When I made the motion to strike out, as I have before intimated, I had no other object in view than to cut off the section. But for the purpose of setting myself right and defining my position, I beg leave to say, that having declared to the people that I was in favor of preserving the present State Bank power, and that I should sustain it; (and if I know myself, I have never yet in all my life made a declaration to the people in a representative capacity, which has not been redeemed) and I have concluded, for the present, to support the present Bank power of the State; and when that shall be voted down, as it may be, I shall be able to select another system by the proper exercise of a sound judgment and discretion, in regard to the best interests of the State with reference to this matter.

Mr. President, what I have presented to the Convention, by way of amendment to this section, is a copy of the present Banking power, granted under the present Constitution, with the addition of a new provision to this effect: that for the purpose of creating stock, the Legislature shall have full power to make loans of a sufficient amount; that is, that the Legislature may renew the present Bank laws for the purposes of creating stock. This is all the new provision which I have offered.

Mr. President, I am well aware that this is not a perfect proposition, and doubtless might be amended if it should be taken as a provision of the Constitution. I admit that it may be bettered, but it is not my province to suggest anything more. For myself, I am under obligations to sustain the present Banking powers. As I have before said, I have placed myself under this obligation to my constituents, and I shall be certain to fulfill it. But that does not preclude other gentlemen from offering amendments and proposing restrictions. I know it is the wish of the people whence I come that the present State Bank power should be sustained.

Permit me to remark here, that I am one of those who have not a very great affection for Banks at all. I was present, however, in the Legislature when the present State Bank charter was passed; and I am proud, upon this occasion, that I can say, our State Bank has maintained a high credit, not only at home, but in all the surrounding States. And if it has inflicted no injury upon the people of Indiana, the institution is certainly entitled to a great deal of credit; for I apprehend that this fact forms an exception in favor of our Bank amongst most of the Banking institutions in the United States. This institution having operated well, and sent out a salutary influence upon the people of Indiana, I am, for this reason, reluctant to let go our hold of it. I have my doubts in regard to the independent free Banking system. If you should break down the present Bank, and allow the people to issue their paper ad libitum, under the free Banking system, I have little doubt but that in a short time there would be an universal failure all over the State of Indiana. I would like, of course, to avoid any contingency of that kind. And now, that we have come to understand the present system thoroughly, and because it has identified itself with all our commercial and business interests, I do not know, and I rather think, it would be the wisest course to continue it.

My friend on the left, (Mr. Read of Monroe,) takes this ground: that the State authorities should have nothing to do with the business of making money; I would like to know whence he got that idea for I hold the opposite idea, that it is one of the attributes of the sovereign power to fix the standard and declare the value of money. But my friend on the left, (Mr. Read of Monroe,) is of the opinion that money should have no connection with the sovereign power, but this business should be left wholly to the management of individuals—but of this more hereafter.

Mr. President, I have not come up here to day prepared to make a speech upon banking matters. My only object, in rising, was to set myself right with reference to a matter of great public interest. As I have before stated, when I first offered my proposition to strike out, what I honestly conceived to be objectionable in the proposition proposed to be inserted in the Constitution, I had nothing, with reference to the subject of banking in my mind's eye. I had not that subject in view at all, but I find myself compelled, this morning to come up with the proposition, which I have now made, for the purpose of setting myself right before my constituents and the country; and I do hope now, since the question is fairly broached, that it will be met and decided upon, and that without delay, so that we may understand ourselves. If the Convention are determined to vote down the present banking powers, it is time we should know it, in order that we may set ourselves to work in the business of devising, if possible, a better system. I know that there is a very large proportion of the people—(notwithstanding the highly respectable operations of our State Bank) who are opposed to all banks. But, the fact is, we are a commercial people as connected with the union and our interests require that some system of banking should be maintained. Therefore, it is, that I have said, the sooner we know the purpose (if indeed such be the purpose of the Convention) to strike down the present system the better it will be for us, in order that we may set about immediately and fix upon some other system, which may accord better with the wishes of the whole people of the State of Indiana, and which may be better calculated to promote their interest.

Mr. TAGUE moved to amend the amendment by striking out the words "one for every three counties," and inserting the words "not to exceed two in one county."

Mr. STEVENSON. I regret very much, Mr. President, that this section has been brought up for consideration at this time, because I do not believe the Convention is ready to take up the bank question, and discuss its merits at the present time. I look upon it as a loss of time to investigate this question now.

If I thought I had any influence with my friend from Ripley, (Mr. Smith,) I would request of him to withdraw his motion and settle this question when the bank question comes up for consideration. Settle them both together. If he is not disposed to withdraw it, I do not know whether I can be induced to vote against it or not, although I am anxious to see the Convention take a vote upon the question now properly before them, that referring to State debts. The question now before us is whether the State can, under proper restrictions and limitation, be trusted with the power to borrow money or not.

Now, sir, we are very much disposed to run into extremes; when we find that we have committed one error, we frequently go to the extreme and commit another error of greater magnitude. We know that the State has committed a great error in incurring the great debt hanging over us, for internal improvements, and then we run into an opposite error when we declare that we will not contract debts under any circumstances whatever. These are the extremes, sir, into which we run, which we should, I think, avoid; the proper course to pursue is to take the middle ground.

It has been stated that the system of internal improvement was brought about by a system of log-rolling. It may be true that the bill was passed in this way. But the people were brought to sustain it in a very different way. The principal error by which they were deceived, was the supposition that the system could be completed mainly without taxation. It was urged that loans could be made to complete the works in a given time, and, that the loans could be made to complete the works in a given time, and that the interest could be paid out of the money borrowed, and so soon as the work could be completed they would then pay the interest on the loans made to complete them.

Thus were the people induced to give their continued support to the system, when a very different result would have followed, if a tax had been levied to pay the interest as it accrued from year to year.

That the people may not deceive themselves nor be deceived by others, it is wisely provided in the section under consideration that no law shall be passed by the Legislature authorizing a loan without providing at the same time that a tax shall be levied to pay the interest. This will prevent any deception hereafter upon this point, and the people will be brought to consider carefully their ability to pay. A provision of this kind in the old Constitution, would, in my opinion, have saved the State from its present indebted condition.

But the section under consideration does not trust the Legislature here; but provides that a tax shall be levied equal to one twenty-fifth part of the principal, so that the whole, both interest and principal, may be paid in twenty-five years. Is it to be presumed that money would be likely to be borrowed under such restrictions? Yet this is not all. The section provides further that no such law shall take effect until the question is submitted to a vote of the people, and has received a majority of all the votes cast for and against it; so that it is made the direct act of the people, with a full knowledge that they must pay the interest with one twenty-fifth part of the principal annually, to check their improvident action.

Now, sir, who need fear that under such restrictions as these the people would be in any danger of contracting any unnecessary indebtedness. But it is said that it is safer to prohibit them altogether, and for all purposes (except the one in the next pending section, and which is provided for). Who can tell what necessity may present itself? Who can comprehend the future and determine that there are no causes there that may not imperiously demand of us means that we have not? It is not at all necessary that I should specify what may occur in the future to demand a loan. It is enough to know that the future is full of uncertainty—and that we should not bend ourselves before we meet its dangers.

Having provided, as this section does, that the Legislature shall not borrow money unless authorized by the people at the ballot box, under all the restrictions here provided for, it would seem to me unnecessary and unwise to go further. It is manifesting a distrust in the capacity of the people to govern themselves which is contrary to all the principles of self-government.

Believing the provisions of this section entirely safe, I am prepared to vote for it. It will prevent the evils heretofore experienced, and leave the State in a condition to meet any unforeseen emergency that may await it.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford moved to lay the pending amendments on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALL said, that he desired to state how this section was brought before the Convention. At an early period of the Convention, several resolutions were referred to the committee that reported this section, suggesting the propriety of adopting the proposition contained in it, and as one of the resolutions was imperative in its character, the section was reported as it now stands.

He should not have said anything if this section had not been looked upon by some members as giving authority to the Legislature to involve the State in debt. If gentlemen supposed that the committee desired by it to involve the State in debt for any internal improvement, they were entirely mistaken; and if they would refer to the report of the sixteenth article of the Constitution, which came from the same committee, they would find that the objections referred to by gentlemen opposed to this section were thereby obviated.

The sixteenth article provided—

SEC. — The General Assembly shall not engage the State in the construction of any internal improvement or public work, without having first obtained the consent of a majority of the voters of the State, at a general election, upon a distinct and separate proposition submitted to them at such election, stating the nature of the proposed work—its probable cost—its utility or public benefit when completed, and how it is to be paid for, whether by taxation or otherwise: Provided, That this provision shall not interfere with the right of the State to rebuild or repair the State House, or Penitentiary, or to build or repair buildings for scientific or beneficent purposes: Provided, also, That not more than one proposition relative to internal improvement or public work shall be submitted to the people at any one election.

Mr. ALLEN moved to strike out all after the word "article," in the third line of the Section.

Mr. ALLEN said—

MR. PRESIDENT: I do not rise for the purpose of making a speech, but merely for the purpose of placing myself right upon this question. On yesterday, Mr. President, I was disposed to go for the section as reported by the committee, with some slight modifications, as the report of the committee very nearly embodied the amendment contended for by me before the country, and which was sanctioned by the people. But, Mr. President, I am satisfied, upon further reflection, that further restrictions are necessary and ought and will be adopted by the people. Sir, the question is not whether we will tie up the hands of future legislation, nor whether we can or ought to trust the people, as gentlemen contend; but it is the simple question, as I conceive, whether we will insert a provision in this Constitution prohibiting the Legislature, or the people through the Legislature, from taking or appropriating that which does not belong to them, and which is not a proper subject of legislation. Sir, when the Legislature contracts a debt which is to be paid by those that are to come after us, do they not virtually appropriate the revenues and tax the resources of posterity, and that, too, for purposes which may or may not be of any value or importance to them? I ask if the Legislature that contracted the present State debt, which now hangs over us, and which will continue to hang over our posterity for generations to come, did not virtually levy a tax upon and appropriate the resources of those that are to come after us, and what benefit can they hope to derive from it? What advantage is likely to result to them, or even ourselves, from such taxation? Sir, the right of the Legislature of a State, or of a people, as a State, is to levy taxes for the purposes of State government, and for the purposes of repelling invasion or self-preservation, and for the faithful administration of the laws; and beyond this, they should not be permitted to go. Whenever they go beyond this, and contract debts for other purposes, they virtually appropriate the revenues and resources of those who are to come after us, and, I contend, take that which does not belong to them. Sir, their duty is to transmit to posterity a government free from incumbrances—unclogged with debts or liabilities—her revenues unappropriated—her resources untrammelled. This I conceive to be the legitimate end of government. If I am correct in my position, then the question is simply, whether we will or will not incorporate a provision in this Constitution prohibiting the Legislature from taking that which does not belong to them, and which, I contend, they have no right to take. Mr. President, it does seem to me, that, if there is any principle in the world, which ought to be incorporated in the organic law of the State, it is this. It does seem to me that this principle is as well settled, and its land-marks as well defined, as any principle in the world, and is, therefore, a proper and legitimate subject of constitutional law; and, sir, I do hope will be incorporated into the Constitution which we are about to form.

Mr. DOBSON stated that he should not have made any remarks but for the observation made principally by the gentleman from Posey, and reiterated by others. The doctrine laid down by the gentleman from Posey was, that they had no right to incur debts for future generations to liquidate; that they had no right to bind those who might come after them.

The gentleman from Monroe takes the ground that a public debt was not a public blessing. Now, he proposed to consider these statements briefly.

If it was not right to bind future generations, he would ask if the legislators of the people had any right to appropriate the revenues of the State, or if they had a right to say to the people that they should not appropriate a dollar of the revenues during the next ten years? If they had no right to say to the people that they should not appropriate a dollar of the revenues during the next ten years, had they any right to say to them that they should not contract a debt during ten years from the present time? It appeared to him evident, that, if they had no right to anticipate the revenues of the people, they had no right to dispose of the standing revenues.

Again, with regard to a public debt being a public curse, he would say that a public debt, wrongfully contracted, would be a public curse. A just public debt was just like a debt made by an individual. An individual might contract to pay a certain sum a year during ten years, for an improvement on his land, to another person. Now, these improvements, at the end of that time, either the individual or his descendants would get the benefit of. This right which he (Mr. O.) had been contending for, then, he believed, should be inserted in the Constitution of the State, of course under suitable restrictions. He regarded it as one of the fixed facts of the day.

He had been very much surprised to find the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Pepper) in favor of striking this principle out, and that, too, after he had, not long since, submitted a resolution, imperative in its character, on which this very section had been reported.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio remarked, in explanation, that he had offered the resolution referred to, supposing, at the time he offered it, it was the best that could be presented on the subject; he now thought they could adopt something more advantageous in its results.

Mr. DOBSON considered that the proper course to pursue was to strike out all after the word "article" in the third line of the section. By the section, it was provided that the General Assembly could contract debts to meet deficiencies in the revenue, and then the section went on to state the manner in which other debts could be paid off. Now if that part of the third section after the word "article" was stricken out, then all difficulty would be obviated. If it was desired by the people that the Legislature should pass other laws for the construction of works of internal improvement, whereby new debts would be incurred, he was willing to delegate that power to the Legislature. A section embodying this principle had been reported by the gentleman from Gibson, (Mr. Hall,) and he thought it would be adopted. If this provision was made, the evils that some gentlemen had apprehended would not probably overtake them.

He would here remark, that in a purely democratic government, all the people would unite in making provisions and pass laws; but in this country that power was delegated by the people to representatives of different classes. He was in favor of approximating as near as possible to this characteristic of a pure republic. He desired that this question of constructing public improvements should be left for the action of the Legislature, and that their action should be finally submitted to the people for their approval or disapproval.

Mr. READ of Monroe said:

Mr. President, I must claim the indulgence of the Convention for a few moments. I impugn the motives of no gentleman upon this floor. I will presume that every member of this body acts from a high and honorable sense of duty, and under a sense of responsibilities which, upon considerate minds, are calculated to produce staid action, prudent councils, and sober words.

While I accord this to others, placed in circumstances in no way of my own seeking, and to which I will make the least possible allusion, it will not, I trust, be deemed personally indelicate, to show what have been my uniform declarations on the subject before us, well known in the district I have the honor to represent, and much beyond it.

If there is, sir, a gentleman upon this floor who, above others, stands irreversibly pledged before the people of his district, and before the people of the State, to opposition to State debt and to all alliances and connections calculated to create a State debt, I am that man.

Happily I am not left to uncertain recollections of the declarations of opinion which I made on this and on other subjects. They were published months since in the Bloomington papers, in the Constitution published at New Albany, and transferred into newspapers in different parts of the State.

In a circular addressed to the people of Monroe county, bearing date June 4, I use the following language:

"What is the voice of bitter experience in regard to those laws called PLUNDER LAWS, that is: 1st, laws for constructing works of internal improvement by the State; 2d, laws for banking by the State; 3d, laws for loaning the credit of the State to individuals, or forming partnerships with individuals. Under one or the other of these classes of laws, the debts of the States are now the enormous sum of two hundred millions, costing the several indebted States an annual interest of ten millions. Experience says, the State has no capacity for any of these departments of business, and is always cheated and plundered; while the State agents and partners amass vast fortunes. Experience says, let all such powers, and all power to contract debt for any purpose, except in case of invasion, be stricken from the Constitution."

My action in this body conforms itself exactly to this declaration. I oppose the power of the State to contract debt except in the case of invasion. But I went further than this, and in the same circular, use the following language:

"There should be restrictions upon counties, cities, and towns, in regard to the power of creating debt or loaning their credit."

I stated to the people of my district, that the following were the very words which I would propose and support in carrying out this principle:

"The Legislature shall never authorize any county, city, town, or township in this State, by a vote of its citizens or otherwise, to become a stockholder in any company or association whatever, to raise money for, or loan its credit to, or in aid of, any such company, corporation or association."

Again, in the same circular, I declared I would vote for no man who went for that part of the plunder system, which consists in the State government banking on borrowed capital in company with individuals. I say that from voting for any such man, I am precluded by the most solemn convictions of my mind.

But there is another address to the people of Monroe county. It was copied in several newspapers of the State, and I have it before me, re-published in the Franklin Democrat of Brookville, and will read an extract:

"To the Citizens of Monroe County:

My opinion has been requested in regard to the propriety of retaining our present State Bank provision in a new Constitution.

A provision of this kind is not incorporated in a single State Constitution formed or changed since the fall of the State credit system; and is, in my view, simply a remnant of an obsolete policy. It belongs to a condition of things and a state of public sentiment, not any where existing to a considerable extent, and found, as I think, with few of any party in the year 1850. It is of a family, upon which is broadly and boldly written, tekel, tekel.

State debt, State road and canal making, the loaning of the State credit to companies, and State partnership with corporations, are either twin sisters or part and parcel of State Banking. They belong to the same ruinous system of public policy.

The very first step towards a State Bank is a State debt. The very second step is State partnership with individuals.

The State has no money to bank on. Then in order to bank, the people must be taxed, or run in debt for the capital. That would be a bold man, who would propose taxation to raise money for banking! State debt is the alternative, and is accordingly chapter the first in State banking. This too is the actual history of Indiana banking. The State, in order to start the Bank borrowed not only its own stock, but that also for the individual stockholders, taking mortgages for re-payment; and the debt of the State for banking is, at this moment, two and a half millions, thereabout. Let it be here noted, as a part of the experience of this operation, and as strongly illustrating the beauty of State borrowing, that the State lost at one fell swoop a million of money in bonds issued, for this very purpose of increasing the bank stock, to the ever memorable Morris Canal and Banking Company. This million so lost, forms a heavy item in our State indebtedness."

But in the same article I express doubts as to the constitutional power of a State to create a State bank, in the following words:

"In this view, I have not adverted to the impropriety of introducing into a State Constitution doubtful powers. The clause in the United States Constitution prohibiting States from omitting bills of credit is believed by very many of our wisest and ablest lawyers and statesmen, to extend to bank bills issued by the State; nor has the decision of the Supreme Court settled the public mind on this subject to a different conclusion. In framing a State Constitution, it is surely a consideration which should have weight with those disposed to a careful construction of constitutional principles.

Against the State Bank, I utter no syllable of reproach. I trust it will honorably fulfill its mission, and in its own full time, be suffered to depart in peace. It is with the principle of State Banking as existing in the Constitution of 1816, and the question of retaining that provision in the Constitution of 1850, that I have to do. I here say to the praise of the Bank, that it is a prodigy of discretion and honesty, that its funds have not long since been plundered and squandered, as in the case of most State Banks, and the State left, as elsewhere, to pay or repudiate. If in the final winding up, we as a people shall be saved harmless for the debt incurred for bank stock, let pillars of stone and brass be raised to the memories of its managers; and as an enduring memorial of our escape, let similar powers forever be blotted from our Constitution."

In an article published in the Constitution at New Albany, and also at Bloomington, I express my approbation of the following provisions: The State shall not become a subscriber to the stock of any corporation or joint stock company. The credit of the State shall not directly or indirectly be loaned in any case. In order that both of these principles may go into our Constitution, I moved the amendment (which I supported by some remarks on yesterday) to the reported section which embodied one of them. When the section and the amendment are called from the table, I shall support both, and in doing so, I am but carrying out my well known views.

To my friend from Ripley (Mr. Smith) I would say, I may hereafter have occasion to speak of that attribute of sovereignty which consists in coining paper credits into money; and to my friend from Owen (Mr. Dobson) I may or may not have occasion to speak of the blessings of a public debt.

But my present purpose has been, to show that the views which I advocated prior to my election to this body, and since I have been a member of it, are precisely the same; and that no man was elected to this Convention with a position more unmistakable and more clearly defined as to all public debt, as to State partnership with corporations, and as to State Banking, than myself, and that from that position I have not in the slightest degree swerved.

[Messrs. Ritchey, Owen, and Walpole here addressed the Convention; their speeches will be published hereafter.]

Pending the question,

On motion, the Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The PRESIDENT. When the Convention adjourned, the pending question was upon the amendment of the delegate from Ripley, (Mr. Smith,) to strike out all that part of the section under consideration which provides that the General Assembly may contract a public debt by a law to take effect after a majority of the people had voted in its favor at an annual election, at which the question had been submitted. As amended the entire section would read as follows:

No act of the General Assembly shall authorize any debt to be contracted on behalf of the State, except for the purposes mentioned in the — section of this article.

Mr. ZENOR. As I am not a public speaker, Mr. President, and as it may be the last time I shall occupy the attention of the Convention, I ask the indulgence of gentlemen while I endeavor in a brief manner to express my views. I remarked that it was the only time I should probably address the Convention, and, sir, after this Convention shall have closed its labors my voice will no longer be heard as a representative of the people. I therefore desire to speak in behalf of the people whom I now represent upon this question, for I have considered it one of the greatest importance to the whole State.

I represent a highly intelligent portion of the people, a people that take a great interest in all that shall be done here, and I should be wanting in my duty to them if I neglected to express their sentiments here.

I have the honor to be one of the committee which reported the article in debate, and, sir, I heartily subscribe to the provisions of the sections of that article. I thought it would meet the views and wishes of my constituents, as well as those of the people of the State generally; but, believing that the amendment of the delegate from Ripley, which has been stated by the Chair, to be better than the original section, I shall support it.

Mr. President, many allusions have been made in the course of this debate to the system of internal improvement projected and undertaken by Indiana in 1836. I was a member of the Legislature at that eventful period in the financial history of the State; I was here when the "mammoth internal improvement bill" was fought through, and I am proud to say that I was one of the Spartan band who opposed it at every inch of its progress from its first introduction until the final vote. But did its friends give us a fair fight in the matter? What were the circumstances of the case? That bill was got through both Houses, not upon its merits, not because a majority of the people wanted it, but by a system of "log rolling," which bore down all opposition. One member voted for the bill on condition that his constituents should have a portion of the benefit, and so on until enough votes were secured to pass the bill through both branches. I had no participation in the system, but I know that the bill was passed by a combination of interests too strong for successful resistance. I believe that I fired the first gun in opposition to the bill, for when it first came up I made a motion to commit it to a committee of the whole; but that motion was very decisively voted down. But the majority did not quite dare to pass the bill. I am now speaking of the mammoth bill, as it was called. They did not quite dare to pass it the same day that I moved to commit it to a committee of the whole, but they laid it over for one night, for the purpose, perhaps, of hugging it once more. [Laughter.] But, sir, the next morning when the bill came up the previous question was sprung upon us, and the bill was forced through, and became the law of the State; and as such we were bound to yield to it.

There are several gentlemen now in this Convention who voted with the minority, and some who voted with the majority, on the passage of that bill. There are five here who voted with me upon that occasion, and I will give the minority vote on that occasion:

Smith of Ripley, Nave, Edmondson, Carr of Jackson, and Zenor.

I allude to this matter to show the fallacy of that doctrine which declares that the people can do no wrong under any circumstances. For one, I deny that doctrine, and I deny the right of a majority to tax, without restriction, a dissenting minority—a majority should never be allowed to put their hands in the pockets of a minority, and draw therefrom what money they please.

In the case of the passage of the mammoth internal improvement bill in 1836, it was not only the representatives who did wrong; it was the people who instructed them to do just what they did do. And, sir, what were the scenes enacted in this city of Indianapolis immediately upon the passage of that bill? Why there was a general rejoicing; every pane of glass in the city was illuminated; and the population turned out on the streets as upon a great holiday. And I think that upon the occasion of the exhibition of fire-works in different parts of the State, in honor of the passage of the mammoth bill, two or three persons were killed.

A MEMBER. Three persons were killed.

Mr. RARIDEN (in his seat.) A sacrificial offering!

Mr. ZENOR. A few days after this a grand ball was given here in honor of the passage of the bill, at which there was music, feasting, and dancing.

Now what has happened may occur again. It will always be possible to raise such an excitement, and to induce the people under its influence to do that which in more sober moments they would condemn.

The next year the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) and myself, came up to the Legislature, and while we condemned the passage of the mammoth bill, we were obliged, in order to satisfy the people of our district, to ask for an extension of the system to them, and to other parts of the State, not included in the great bill. Our constituents were opposed to the system, but inasmuch as they were taxed for the appropriations expended in other portions of the State, from which they received no benefit, they instructed us to ask an extension of the system to their part of the State. In accordance with their wishes, and in conjunction with members whose constituents were in the same position with ours, we got up what is now known as the "calf bill." As is well known we failed in securing its passage. At the succeeding election I endeavored to place the matter distinctly before the people. Two candidates were running that year for governor. One of them, Mr. Dumont, was a candidate of the classification party, who were in favor of commencing and finishing one of the public works at a time. The other candidate was the gentleman whose seat is just before me, (Ex-Governor Wallace,) and who was in favor of the simultaneous prosecution of all the public works; and he was comfortably elected. Thus I have shown that the people fully endorsed the internal improvement system in all its breadth and width. And it is in view of this experience that I say the people are capable of doing wrong. They have made fatal errors in the past, and under the same circumstances may err in the future.

The second year after the passage of the internal improvement bill, public opinion underwent a change, and the representatives in the Legislature were instructed to vote for a classification in the construction of the public works; that is that the energies and resources of the State should be concentrated upon the construction of one work at a time. A proposition to this effect was made by Mr. Smith, of Wayne county. Upon that immediate proposition the yeas and nays were not called, but upon another occasion where the principle of classification was involved, Mr. Owen and myself both voted for classification.

Now, sir, in conclusion, I have to say that I am most decidedly in favor of "putting up the bars for the future." I never wish to see the State again involved in the embarrassments and in the financial ruin which has so long hung over her. To prevent the possibility of incurring another State Debt, I am in favor of restricting the Legislature, as will be done by the sections of this article, after the adoption of the pending amendment, the effect of which was stated by the Speaker at the opening of my remarks.

I am a State Bank man, but at the same time I am decidedly opposed to the creation of another State Debt for any purpose whatever. I desire that we should at least get one benefit from all the immense sums of money squandered by the internal improvement system, and that benefit is the lesson dearly bought to be sure, and but well applied if it has the effect to place in the amended Constitution the strongest restrictions upon the power of the Legislature to contract a public debt. And I want that restriction so strong and so broad in its operation that the Legislature cannot contract a debt even by first submitting the proposition to the people and obtaining for it a majority of all the votes cast at an annual election. The provisions made in a preceding section for incurring a debt to meet a deficit in the revenue, or for the payment of interest on the State Debt, are ample enough.

I have made these remarks in haste, but I trust that I have made myself understood.

The gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) has remarked that the position I support is democratic ground. Sir, I cannot help it; if it be democratic it is the right position, and I shall not be deterred from maintaining it because democrats may also support it. We are not acting here as whigs or democrats, but as Delegates of the people, laboring solely for their good, and the happiness and prosperity of our posterity.

I have said thus much to set myself right, and explain the position I occupy and my reasons.

It may be that I shall be denounced by some of my constituents, but, sir, I must do my duty as I understand it; and I believe that I am acting for the best interest of the people of Indiana in supporting this section as proposed to be amended by the Delegate from Ripley (Mr. Smith).

I am obliged to gentlemen of the Convention for the attention with which they have listened to me.

Mr. KILGORE. I have been an attentive observer of the debate upon this section, and I have observed gentlemen rise all over the Chamber, proud of the opportunity to declare that while they were members of the Legislature which passed the mammoth internal improvement bill, authorizing the survey of routes for contemplated public improvements, they voted against it. There are gentlemen enough to proclaim their opposition to a system which has now become universally unpopular. It is much safer and more politic for them (and I do not particularly refer to the gentleman who last addressed the body) to do this than it would be to state the real reasons which operated upon their minds in 1836, and prevented them from supporting the system of internal improvements. I shall, however, in a few remarks, make a simple exposition of the real facts of the case, which may be useful as a codicil to the speeches of some gentlemen who are proud to say that they voted against the mammoth internal improvement bill.

As I remarked the other day, I appear to be the last survivor of all the members of the Legislature of 1836 who voted for that bill. Although I know there are many still living, they seem to have been afflicted—perhaps in judgment for their political sins—with a loss of their memories. [Laughter.]

Mr. GREGG (in his seat). I was in the Legislature and voted with the majority.

Mr. KILGORE. I am rejoiced to hear the able Delegate from Jefferson admit that he voted with me. It looks manly to see gentlemen stand up and plead guiltily when the minds of the jury are so prejudiced against the case.

The unfortunate results of the projected improvement of 1836 seem to be an argument, in the minds of some gentlemen, why the Legislature should forever hereafter be prohibited from borrowing money for any purposes or under any circumstances. For my own part I am willing that the people should be governed in the future by the experience of the past. I am not carried away with this general cry against internal improvements, and against the power of a Legislature to contract a debt. If, with the light of the past to guide them, with the heavy burthens of the present to remind them of past errors, the people coolly and deliberately decide at the ballot-boxes to again borrow money, I shall aid to place no Constitutional barriers in their way to prohibit them from carrying out their will; provided, sir, that at the time they give the Legislature authority to contract a debt they provide by direct taxation for the payment of the interest, and the canceling of the principal, within twenty-five years. Right here, sir, and nowhere's else, was the great error committed by the people and their representatives in 1836. Gentlemen may confine themselves to the simple assertion that the people of that day were mad; I shall not deny it: they were mad, and very mad; but, Mr. President, had a provision been made before the public debt was created that a direct tax must be levied, high enough to pay the interest and to wipe out the whole debt in eighteen or twenty-five years, all would have been comparatively well. A provision of this kind, sir, would have brought the people to their right senses, and my word for it, before State Bonds to the amount of four millions of dollars had been sold, they would have risen and denounced the whole system as projected.

But what was this mammoth bill relative to which so much has been said? We provided in that bill for a general survey in different parts of the State in order to ascertain the most practicable routes for the lines of public improvements then contemplated. The bill directed that examinations should be made with a view to construct those works through such portions of the State as would be likely to give the greatest amount of satisfaction to the people generally.

It never entered into the minds of those who voted for the bill directing those surveys that all the public works therein contemplated should be carried on simultaneously. We sent out engineers, chain-bearers, and workers, to get useful information of different routes and localities upon which to base a good and practical system of internal improvements. But, sir, the very fact that those surveys were made in different parts of the State, made the people lose their mental balance; every neighborhood became so intoxicated with the idea that a railroad or canal was to pass near it, that the people became mad, as it were, and were unable to judge of the propriety or impropriety of any measure for the prosecution of the system, or of the amount of taxation they could safely impose upon themselves. And added to this, certain political leaders in different parts of the State aided in misleading the people in this regard; but, Mr. President, I can say without fear of successful contradiction, that I was not one of them. I told the citizens of Indiana, whenever I addressed them, either individually or collectively, that we might talk about internal improvements and the prospect of their paying for themselves as much as we pleased, but there was no escaping the conclusion that ultimately the burthen of that enormous public debt would fall upon the shoulders of the people, and that they must prepare for the most onerous taxes if the system was urged to completion.

But such counsels were not listened to, but the declarations of leading politicians, who openly told the farmers of the State that to bear all the additional taxation that would result from finishing all the public works in the State, would only require the profit derived from an additional hen and chickens!

Gentlemen in the course of this discussion have talked as though the Representatives and Senators who voted for the mammoth bill were actuated by their own excited feelings or by motives of personal interest. Sir, I could point to men who now glory in declaring that they opposed the internal improvement system in such a manner that they would be fain to retreat in haste from the imputation of wrong motives upon those who voted for the Survey bill, and who are still frank enough to admit their participation in that matter.

And for the purpose of placing this matter properly before the country, I propose, Mr. President, to briefly review the course of those who were members of the Legislature at the inception of this mammoth system of internal improvements, as well those who opposed as those who favored it; and in doing so, I must be pardoned for speaking plain in relation to the motives which influenced the action of certain gentlemen who now claim the credit of having possessed political sagacity which enabled them to foresee the result of that system; and hence their opposition to it. With all the facts connected with the original survey bill, as well as the bill which provided for the commencement of the system, I am perfectly familiar. And a brief history of those matters may not be uninteresting to some gentlemen in this Convention, and may enable some other gentlemen here (who seem to have forgotten that they were here then) to bring to mind the peculiar part they acted upon that memorable occasion.

At the sessions of the Legislature of 1834, 1835, the members of that body, believing that it was high time for Indiana to engage in some system of internal improvements, set about the work of devising a plan for action upon the subject. A bill was introduced in the House of Representatives having in view that object. The bill, as originally introduced, was not such as met the approbation of the majority. The objection to it was, not that it contained too much, but that it did not contain enough. And some of those who are now most loud in their denunciations of the system, were amongst the foremost in adding amendment to amendment until we had literally checkered the whole

State with imaginary canals and roads of different kinds. That bill, sir, became too ponderous to be carried by its original friends; and those who were the true friends of the State and her best interests, by common consent, laid it upon the table to sleep the sleep of death. But they did not abandon the hope of adopting some system that might, in the end, prove beneficial to the people. As yet no provision had been made for the further prosecution of the Wabash and Erie Canal, which had been commenced some years before; and to the friends of that work other portions of the State looked for aid in the commencement and prosecution of a well digested system of improvements. And for the purpose of securing that aid, we were unwilling to see that work provided for alone. A proper feeling was evinced from that quarter towards other interests. And although, as I before remarked, we had laid what we then called the mammoth survey bill upon the table, we had not given up all as hopelessly lost, but expected, with the aid of the friends of the Wabash Canal, and those of the Central and Eastern Canals, and one or two other works, to be able to provide for the necessary surveys and examinations preparatory to the commencement of a proper system—such a one as we could reasonably hope to prosecute to a successful completion. But whilst we were devising some safe and proper plan for such a system, to our great astonishment, a messenger from the Senate announced the passage of a bill through that body, providing for the further prosecution of the Wabash and Erie Canal. This, sir, was unexpected, and produced that confusion in our ranks that might well be expected under such circumstances. All knew full well that if that bill passed, it would take from us many votes upon which we had been confidently relying to aid us in what we conceived to be an important and laudable undertaking. What is to be done? was the first inquiry made by every man who felt an interest in the matter. All knew, sir, that whatever was to be done must be done quickly in order to be successful. Now, Mr. President, for the information of gentlemen who have been so free in charging the friends of that system with bargain, sale, and corruption, (terms, sir, which I seldom use, and never apply unless I am properly posted up on the subject,) I will say that I never in my life used more untiring industry than I did on that memorable night, in order to secure strength enough to amend the Senate bill so as to provide for the survey of other works. I well recollect calling upon the lamented James H. Wallace, then a Representative for the county of Jefferson, at a late hour in the night, to see what strength he could bring to the bill in case we would provide for the Madison road. He gave me the desired information, and pledged the support of a certain number of members who were interested. And this secured to the citizens of Madison and Indianapolis, and the intermediate country, that important work which, costly as it was, has proved so useful and profitable to all concerned. From him I passed to other gentlemen; still leaving each to propose a short description of his favorite work; until, with my tally paper in hand, I could count sufficient strength to amend the Senate bill, and thus prepare for a general survey. And, sir, upon the reading of the message from the Senate next morning, containing the bill before spoken of, the rules were suspended, the bill read a second time, and to the astonishment of its friends, a sufficient force was there organized to amend or defeat it. I offered the amendment which was subsequently adopted, providing for this ruinous system of internal improvements. Sir, it had for its object the obtaining of useful information, such as would afford a proper basis for the commencement of just such a system as the people of the State, in their cool moments, would have been satisfied with, and in the end could have completed without serious injury to themselves or their posterity. The true friends of the State's best interests did not at that time contemplate the prosecution of more than some three or four works: the Wabash and Erie Canal, the Central Canal, the White Water Canal, and perhaps one Railroad. And here, Mr. President, let me remark, that if those gentlemen who are now so clamorous about the misfortunes of Indiana, and seem to glory in their opposition to the system, had come forward at the proper time, and instead of laboring as they did to add MILLIONS to our public debt by increasing the number of works, given us their aid, no other works would have been commenced, and Indiana would this day have been one of the proudest States in the Union, and her people independent and happy.

I have, Mr. President, briefly passed over the history of the survey bill; I have disguised nothing. It was carried by a union of interests; it could be carried by no other means; and the same means, sir, would have given it the aid of every man then in the Legislature. It would have secured the support of my venerable friend from Ripley, (Mr. Smith,) who was then a member. It would have secured the support of my friend from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) had he been a member, which I think I shall be able to show before I close my remarks, by his subsequent acts as a representative of the people of Posey county. As I have said before, sir, the survey of the various works, designated, unsettled the public mind, dethroned reason for the time being, and prepared the people for their own ruin. The next session found each one of these various projects amply represented; and each Representative urging the superior claims of his favorite work. We had sought information, we had obtained it, and we were by force of public opinion, required to use the information most profitably, as was supposed, by commencing a SYSTEM, embracing every practicable work which had been surveyed. We were not only required to commence, but each interest being jealous of the others, all had to be prosecuted simultaneously. Then, sir, those who now profess to have foreseen the disasters that followed, were again invoked to stand forward as the true friend of the people, and aid us in the adoption of a proper system. But they turned a deaf ear to our calls, disregarded our earnest entreaties, and refused to come unless we would increase the system by additional works for the benefit of their immediate constituents. That, sir, I again repeat, would have secured their support to the system, which they now tell us they then knew could never be completed, and would ultimately bring ruin upon the whole people. These, sir, are the friends of the people who have been so vigilant of their interests, according to their professions, but who by their acts would have made their ruin more complete.

It was not a system of internal improvements, Mr. President, that these gentlemen opposed. It was the system. I mean, sir, the one that made no provision for their constituents. I know, sir, such was the case with my friend from Ripley (Mr. Smith); he voted for adding other works to the system; and this he surely would not have done unless he was for the measure. And so with my worthy friend from Harrison, (Mr. Zenor,) for whom I entertain the highest respect. He, sir, voted for additions to the amount of one and a half million of dollars. If, sir, those measures had been adopted, he too, would doubtless have given it his support.

I have then briefly, sir, attempted to show that the opposition of those gentlemen to this system, was not because it embraced too much, but because it did not embrace, as they thought, enough. So it was with the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen). His far-seeing eye enabled him to penetrate the veil of the future and behold the ruin and oppression of the people, that would ultimately follow this mammoth system. But unfortunately for the people, they had not the advantage of his sagacity to aid their counsels, until this system was riveted upon them. He came upon the political stage the year after its adoption. And unfortunately for that gentleman when he did come, his vision did not seem so vivid and clear as it now is, until the scales of self-interest were removed from his eyes, by a refusal on the part of the Legislature to pass his favorite measure, providing for additional works to the amount of something like three millions of dollars, as a part of that odious system. Its adoption was strenuously urged by that talented gentleman, with more than his ordinary zeal, and not one whisper was he heard to make against the extent of the system within the legislative hall, until his darling project was voted down; then, sir, for the first time, the ruin and bankruptcy of the State seemed to stare him in the face, and has been haunting his imagination ever since. And for my life, Mr. President, I have never been able to see how the addition of three millions to our indebtedness, as proposed by the gentleman, would have lightened our burthen or saved our character.

I have now passed over the history of the great source of what gentlemen are pleased to call our misfortunes. I have spoken of things as they are; I have disguised nothing; I have aimed to render every man his due, and to give each man's true position, and the motives by which he was governed. I have shown, sir, that both the bills, of which I have spoken, were passed by a union of interests which we were forced to ingraft. Fewer interests, however, would have sufficed if the high-minded and disinterested gentlemen, who are proud of their opposition to the system, had come forward with the spirit and magnanimity of statesmen and patriots, and given us their aid. This, however, they failed to do, and of that failure they boast. Sir, they are welcome to all the honor and glory their acts and motives merit when properly understood. Allusion was made by my friend (Mr. Zenor) who preceded me, to the scenes that occurred in this city on the evening after the passage of this bill, and to similar scenes all over the State when its passage was made known. I very well remember those scenes, and many other circumstances connected therewith. I well recollect the brilliancy with which the city was illuminated, and not only this city, but towns and villages throughout the State. All of which tend to prove what I before stated, sir, that the system was forced upon the people by their own action; and that if blame is to attach any where, it should attach to the people themselves, without regard to party or party politics.

I do not like, Mr. President, to speak of myself, but I hope I will be pardoned, sir, for referring to a conversation had on the evening after the passage of this mammoth bill, between the distinguished gentleman who represented the county of Vigo, and myself. We were, I believe, alone at my room, and whilst others were enjoying the glee and hilarity of the city, we calmly reviewed our action, and the state of public feeling in relation to it. We looked to the future with fearful forebodings. We, sir, there predicted all that has followed; we agreed, and that too without the spirit of prophecy, that in less than five years the joy of the people would be turned into mourning, that they were then looking at the bright side of the picture only, and that they would soon learn by experience, their precipitate and inconsiderate action. I am not certain, sir, that we did not also predict that there would be a great shifting and shuffling of responsibility upon the part of members of the Legislature, about the time public opinion began to react. A few more words, sir, in relation to this matter, and I am done with this part of the subject. Although, sir, I am not one of those who consider a public debt a public blessing; yet, sir, disastrous as our public works have proved, I have no doubt that in many respects we are at least twenty-five years in advance of what we would have been, had our system of internal improvement never been commenced. By our misfortunes our people have learned by dear experience what they could not otherwise have known so well. Individual enterprise has been pointed to proper objects, and individual capital has found proper investments, which in the end will redound to the wealth of the State, and the general prosperity of the people. I hope you, Mr. President, and gentlemen of the Convention, will pardon me for having, traveled out of the proper line to say what I have in relation to this system of internal improvements. I should not have done so had not almost every gentleman who preceded me, traveled out of the way to attack it, and all those who were connected with it in any manner, whatever. What I have said seemed necessary in self-defense. And I do think, sir, if some gentlemen who are now so violent in their denunciations of that measure, and the men connected with it, would occasionally recur to their own acts in the premises, they would find enough to seal their lips forever in relation to it. Now, sir, to the subject properly before us, with the lessons of experience which the people have had in relation to public debt, I do think we may safely trust their discretion in the matter, and should not deprive them of the power of deciding for themselves.

Mr. President, it has been remarked that some delegates opposed the pending amendment [to strike out all that part of the section which provides that the Legislature may contract a public debt by first submitting a bill for that purpose to the people at an annual election] on the ground that it would prevent the re-charter of the State Bank.

My own position in this regard, I will briefly state: I am no friend to a State Bank. I am one of the fourteen who stood in opposition to that Bank when it was created. I rose and moved to reject the bill for its charter when it was first read at the Clerk's desk, and I fought it at every inch of its passage until it finally became a law. I am no friend of Banks—I would go almost as far to kick one as John Randolph said he would to kick a sheep [laughter]. But, sir, suppose the people shall hereafter decide that they desire a State Bank. With the restriction proposed by the pending amendment, the State would be prohibited from borrowing money for the basis of the capital of such an institution. Opposed as I am to a State Bank, I still say that they have an undoubted right to charter such an institution whenever a majority of the people express themselves in favor of it. And I will lend my support to no Constitutional provision which will restrict the people from borrowing money for such a purpose, whenever they declare their desire to assess a direct tax upon themselves sufficient to pay the accruing interest, and to pay off the whole amount borrowed in twenty-five years. I believe in deferring to the will of the majority; and a public debt can only be created, under the provisions of this article as it came from the committee, by a direct vote of the majority of the people of the State. The restrictions upon the debt-making power are abundant.

Gentlemen have complained of the hardship there is in allowing a majority to rule the minority. Why, sir, ours is a government founded upon the principle that the majority governs. Unless this principle be clearly recognized, you can never pass a law having for its object the taxation of the people for the wants of the State; for there always will be, in every community, a minority who will object to being taxed at all. And, sir, it must be admitted, that it is also a hardship not to be endured, when there is a remedy, in being subject to the will of a factious minority.

Although I make it a principle to submit to the will of a majority clearly and fairly expressed, it is not because I have never had occasion to be dissatisfied with the decisions of majorities; far from it. Not long since, a majority of the people of the district in which I reside, decided that another man was better qualified to represent them in Congress than myself. [Laughter.] I did not believe a word of it, sir, [renewed laughter,] but I submitted quietly to the will of superior numbers.

I have no time to remark upon other topics that I had desired to, but I will say that when this anxiously looked for Bank question fairly comes before the Convention, I shall have occasion to refer to the opinions of the same distinguished man (Gen. Jackson) from whose message the gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Read) read us an interesting extract a few days since. But I shall read from another portion of the written opinions of that statesman with regard to State Banks.

I shall also refer to the journals of the Legislature which chartered the State Bank of Indiana, for we shall there see whether this is a whig or a democratic Bank. I have no disposition to allude to party distinctions on this floor, but it has been called a whig Bank, and I wish to examine into the truth of the statement.

Mr. CHAPMAN. We democrats have progressed since the charter of the State Bank.

Mr. KILGORE. Ah! and so has the Bank progressed. [Laughter.]

If the Bank was democratic when it was chartered, it is democratic now. For myself, I can exult in the fact that I am not and never was under any obligation to any Bank, and never will be. I never asked for any money at a moneyed institution, nor endorsed a note for any one to be put into the Bank for discount.

Notwithstanding all this, I might be induced to vote for the re-charter of a State Bank, on account of the difficulty (perhaps the impossibility) of having a good currency in Indiana without such an institution, owing to the circumstances by which we are surrounded.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. President, I should have been content to let this matter pass with a silent vote, had I been permitted to vote in silence; but, from the course taken by members on this floor, I am compelled to give my reasons for the vote I shall give upon the pending question.

In addition to this, I feel called upon, by what has been said, to set myself right with regard to personal matters.

On yesterday, in calling the attention of the Convention to another section of this report, I declared that, for myself, I should always be found on the side of the people in opposition to the encroaching spirit and influence of corporations; and if, for saying that, I have drawn down upon me the personal indignation of gentlemen, I beg pardon for unintentionally rousing their anger; but I cannot take back the sentiment.

It is very seldom indeed, sir, that I am at all personal in my remarks. I have always more important and more pressing work before me than indulgence in personalities with any member. Still I do not hold myself under that responsibility to any gentleman here, that I should quietly submit to be catechised for my public acts, or to be assaulted for my political conduct.

As to my connection with the system of internal improvements projected and commenced by the State in 1836-7, I never had anything to do with that system until after its inception, and considerable progress made in the construction of the public works.

I was then called upon to serve in the Legislature, not because I was a run-mad "internal improvement" man, but because the people considered me conservative upon that subject. In the winter of 1837-8 I was a representative of the people in this Hall. I was never in favor of the extensive system of internal improvements into which the State had plunged, but was anxious to curtail the gigantic proportions of that system so as to enable the people to carry out and perfect some part of it, rather than have a total wreck of the whole scheme, already entered upon. I was here, the representative of a peculiar interest, but was opposed to the profuse squandering of the public treasure upon detached portions of the public works, and upon such works as the Whitewater Canal and the Madison Railroad.

I labored to secure the completion of the Central Canal, because my constituents wished me so to act. Sir, I never dodge a responsibility, and shall freely declare what my course was. And I say that the history of those years of our State will bear me out in asserting that the prudent course which I took, after the whig Fund Commissioners had almost exhausted the funds of the State, and after I was called upon to act in an executive capacity in the Board of Public Works in the years 1839 and 1840, I saved a very large sum that would otherwise have been lost. I took the responsibility of expending ninety thousand dollars in finishing and bringing into use a valuable portion of the Central Canal, and was the man under whose authority the first water was let into that canal by which it was put into operation. That work was partially constructed, and I was directed to proceed to its completion. Did I, or do I seek to shun responsibility?

Acting as a member of the Board of Public Works, I expended the public money for the purpose I have described, took legal and proper vouchers for all my disbursements, and got an honorable acquittance from the State for all the monies that I ever handled in the discharge of my duty.

But gentlemen do not seem to be satisfied to let the matter rest here—they desire to make some political capital out of the matter. An attempt has been made to fix an odious responsibility upon the members of the Board of Public Works, because that Board did not spread upon its records a special order of appropriation to each work, as the progress of the work demanded expenditure. The law of the State was supreme—the order of the Board was only secondary, and was not generally regarded as at all obligatory, but was frequently disregarded as being merely formal. Long after the suspension of the works, in consequence of the inability of the State to furnish further means, and in the face of the wrath of the people which was impending over the heads of those reckless politicians who had so wantonly and thoughtlessly brought bankruptcy upon the State, a band of political stock-jobbers, in the Senate of the State, undertook to digest a scheme to hide their own political deformity, and to screen their favorites from public reprobation. They organized a "scape goat" committee, with inquisitorial powers, to interrogate, by written questions, the members of the Board, whose duty it had been, under the law, to expend the money on the works. These questions were propounded in a Jesuitical spirit, and with lawyer-like technicality, implicating in the premises, every member of the Board. The members of the Board, conscientious of the legality of their actions, and the correctness of their official conduct, promptly and fully responded to these malicious interrogations. Their answers were honest, and should have been conclusive; but to drop the matter then, would have defeated the designs of the originators of the farce; so, therefore, they, in order to escape from their dilemma in the smoke of the battle, ordered the commencement of suits on the part of the State, for an alleged illegal disbursement of the public monies. Notwithstanding this great flourish of trumpets, no suits were brought against the members of the Board, for it was easily found, on legal examination, that the expenditures were made in accordance with the law of the State, and that the Legislature had legalized the expenditure. Thus exploded and fell dead this attempt to manufacture political capital, and to shift censure from those who were actually culpable, to be borne by those who had faithfully and honestly discharged their duty in pursuance of law.

Although, often invited, these suits never were brought—never will be brought—and never can be brought or sustained.

I regret, Mr. President, to digress thus much from the immediate question in debate, but the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) has traveled out of the way to call up this personal discussion upon personal matters, and I am forced in self-defense to take notice of it. It is sometimes much easier to show talent in a strain of personal invective and in the stirring up of political animosities, than calmly and patiently to discuss a subject in its legal or philosophical bearings, or in a statesmanlike manner. I seek nor envy no such notoriety.

I said not, in reply to what has been said, deny, that I am a democrat, in the original sense of the term, But I am entirely averse to arraying party against party in this Hall. But notwithstanding my indisposition to excite party strife, I cannot go back to that old federal doctrine promulgated by Alexander Hamilton, that a "national debt is a national blessing;" and I must say, that if the whig party consider the gentleman (Mr. Walpole) as their organ, and the exponent of their political creed, I shall join issue with the gentleman and his party upon that ground. We hold different sentiments here from those entertained in England with regard to a national debt. There it is one of the strong pillars of kingly power, and there it may be good policy, for the interest which the higher classes have in the debt constitutes one of the strongest ligatures which bind together the colossal British Empire, and the nobility and men of influence defend their own purse when they defend the existing government—a change would destroy them and their fortunes.

It is not so here. If we incur a public debt, the people are taxed directly to pay the interest on that debt. This is not necessary to attach them to their country—they labor for their support, and are not dealers in stocks and government bonds, but the interest paid by them as is well known, generally goes into foreign purses.

The people of this State, have, since 1836, expressed themselves as strongly opposed to the creation of another public debt.

Mr. HALL said, if the gentleman thinks that the whig party, as represented in this Hall, are in favor of the creation of an additional public debt, he is mistaken; and I will further say, I have authorized no man to speak my sentiments for me. The section under consideration was reported to the Convention in accordance with instructions embodied in the resolution offered by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Pepper).

For myself, and so far as I know, gentlemen of the political party with which I act when at home, there is anything but a disposition to bring partisan politics into the discussions in this Chamber.

Mr. MORRISON. I am happy to hear the gentleman disclaim such doctrines, and I am confident that there are other members of the whig party upon this floor, who will not subscribe to the doctrine that the Legislature shall be left free to contract another State debt. I only spoke of this matter as a whig principle so far as the gentleman from Hancock assumed to be the organ of that party.

Mr. WALPOLE. I did not say that it was whig policy to incur another public debt.

Mr. MORRISON. The gentleman charged me with supporting the opposite doctrine, and with saying that I did so as a democrat. I did not say in the course of my former remarks that that opposition to the incurring of another State debt was the democratic side of the question, but I can say so, if the gentleman wishes to drive me into a declaration upon that subject.

The gentleman from Hancock also delivered us a lecture upon the doctrine that the people are capable of self-government, he asserted repeatedly that he recognized the omnipotence of the people in whose judgment he reposed the fullest confidence, and that we, who are in favor of restricting the Legislature from borrowing money or contracting a State debt, set ourselves up here for thinking machines for the people. There is no assumption of that kind among those who are in favor of a strong restrictive principle in this regard—on the contrary, we are simply and faithfully representing the solemnly and often expressed will of the people. I know that those who have chosen me to represent their opinions in this Convention desire the Legislature to be restricted by means of a constitutional provision forever, from contracting a public debt except for the purposes specified in the section which was ordered to be engrossed yesterday. They wish effectual constitutional protection against the recurrence of the events of 1836. This being the case, I do not know what becomes of the splendid figures as to the exalted position of those who have too much confidence in the people to wish to restrict them. I, too, respect the will, and repose confidence in the judgment of, the people, and I will say, that "he that knoweth his master's will and doeth it not, the same shall be (or should be) beaten with many stripes."

Mr. RARIDEN (in his seat). Amen.

Mr. MORRISON. No, sir; I am not through yet.

Mr. RARIDEN (in his seat). I was only saying amen to the gentleman's sentiments; not as the conclusion to his speech.

Mr. MORRISON. The rightful duty of delegates in this Convention is to stand here and protect the interests of the people, by guarding against the encroaching tendency of all combinations, of an unholy character, which may extend their potent influence into the legislative halls. It is a notorious fact, mortifying as it may be to our pride, that hitherto the agents of corporations have been able, in the capacity of lobby members, to carry through the Legislature almost any measure which their principals deemed of sufficient importance to expend money enough to carry. Corporations and combinations of wealthy men, have this immense advantage over the people: they can act as an unit; they concentrate all their power under the direction of one will; the objects to be accomplished are of such financial importance and are sure to bring such abundant pecuniary returns, that they can afford to bring all their influences to bear, first in the formation of the Legislature, by the selection and election of their friends, and then to influence and control the Legislature after it assembles here. And, therefore, I desire so to frame this new Constitution that future Legislatures will not be subject to such influences, brought to bear by corporations and combinations of men of wealth, to secure special privileges and partial legislation. I wish to have it explicitly declared in our organic law, that the Legislature shall have no power, under any circumstances, to contract a State debt, except for the purpose specified in the following section, which has been passed to a third reading:

"The General Assembly may contract debts to meet casual deficits or failures in the revenue or for the purpose of paying the interest on the State debt, but such debts shall not at any time exceed the amount of such deficits: Provided, that the State may contract debts to repel invasion, suppress insurrection, or, if hostilities are threatened, provide for public defense."

As to the question of a State Bank, which has been introduced into this debate, I cannot now discuss it because the half hour rule would cut me short before I had fairly begun. But I will remark, that I have heard no democrat propose to make the State bonds of Indiana the basis of a banking capital. I believe that no democrat wishes it. I certainly do not. Nor do I know that any whig will make such a proposition; but I am unwilling to allow the gentleman from Hancock to charge such a design upon the democratic party or upon the members of that party upon this floor, for the sake of the resulting political capital.

Were I disposed to recriminate upon the gentleman, I should not have far to go for abundant materials for his discomfiture. I could easily point to the loss of four millions of dollars lost to the State of Indiana, by the Agency of whig Fund Commissioners, and through the agency of, and by means of, the United States Bank—that beau ideal of banking of the old whig party. In the investment by which the State lost that four millions, no democrat had any part—it was solely and exclusively managed by whigs, from its inception to its final catastrophe.

If party politics are to be drawn into this discussion; if the speech of the gentleman from Hancock is to be clearly understood as the tocsin of his party, I am prepared to go into the war, to go through the campaign and, as it will probably become necessary, carry it into the enemy's country. When in the board of public works we acted under the laws of the State, we acted in accordance with the will of our constituents, and were severally representing local interests, the board being organized on the representative principle and no party lines were drawn. But whenever gentlemen wish to take a tilt at me in regard to my political acts or the policy of the party with which I act, when outside of this Convention, let those who live in glass houses beware how they rashly throw stones.

I am decidedly in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Ripley (Mr. Smith) to strike out all the latter part of the pending section, so as to positively prevent even an attempt to impose, in the future, a State debt upon the people of the State.

Mr. WOLFE said he was opposed to this political discussion. In his opinion delegates were not elected to the Convention with reference to party lines, but rather for their good looks if not for their good principles.

In order to put a stop to this discussion, which had degenerated from debate upon principles to personal allusions, he would demand the previous question upon the adoption of the pending motion to strike out the latter part of the section.

Mr. OWEN hoped that the motion would be withdrawn, to give the delegate from Hancock the privilege of speaking.

Mr. WOLFE. If it is the pleasure of the Convention, I shall not insist upon the call for the previous question.

Mr. DUNN. I rise, sir, for the purpose, if possible, of bringing this debate to a close. If any gentleman wishes to make a personal explanation, however, I will yield the floor.

Mr. OWEN. If the Convention will indulge me for a few minutes, I shall be glad to make one or two remarks.

And first, sir, I wish to offer the following amendment: to insert, after the word "article," the words "and for the discharge of the existing debt of the State."

Upon looking carefully over the whole subject in debate, I do not see any contingency likely to arise which is not provided for in the section, save the one which is the subject of the amendment I have read. I am not sure that this provision is really necessary, still it may be wise to provide against a possible contingency by inserting the words of the amendment.

While I am upon the floor, I will say, because I think it useful not only at the present time, but useful for the future, that I hold him to be no true friend to the interests of the people of Indiana, who suborns, in this Chamber, in support of some proposition which he despairs otherwise to carry, the spirit of party. [Applause.] I came here as a delegate to the Convention of the people of Indiana. I am a democrat, as all the world—our world here in Indiana, at least—well knows; but while I am, and always have been, a member of the democratic party, there is another position which I hold—a position more important at the present time than a membership in either of the two great political parties that divide our country. I am a citizen of the State of Indiana. As such I came here. As such I act here. When I entered this Convention I left partisanship behind.

The gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) remarked, that he hoped no whig would be found supporting a provision restricting the people from incurring a public debt, whenever, through the ballot-box, they expressed a desire to do so.

I do not now see the gentleman from LaPorte (Mr. Niles) in his seat, but it was only yesterday that he (no undistinguished member of the whig party) made a most decided speech in favor of restriction, and expressed the hope that no provision would be adopted giving the Legislature, under any circumstances, the power to contract a debt on behalf of the State, except for the specific purpose of providing for a failure in the revenue and for paying the interest of the State Debt. And so have other whigs expressed themselves. With what show of reason, then,—with what chance of success,—can the gentleman sound the rallying cry of party, and cast upon all who go not with him, the reproach that they distrust and condemn the people?

It is unparliamentary to impute unworthy motives to gentlemen, and I shall therefore impute none to the delegate from Hancock. This I will say, however, that since the gentleman began his speech, I have been in search of a good motive for the course he has pursued, and that, after using due diligence, I have been wholly unsuccessful in finding one! [Laughter.]

A few words now, sir, in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Hancock relative to my course in the Legislature in 1837-8. His excuse for alluding to such a subject is remarkable. Some of my friends, he said, thought me infallible, and he desired to prove to them the contrary. I am sorry any of my friends should have been so far mistaken. The gentleman added, that he desired to show, that, for once in my life at least, I had been in error. A useless labor, sir! If he had asked me before he commenced his speech, I should have confessed, not to once only, but to fifty times. [Laughter.]

As regards the internal improvement system I have this to say, that, with the lights now before me, I should not have supported what was called "the calf bill." Yet there was much to be said in defense of that move. If the State is to undertake internal improvements at all, their benefits ought to be as diffusive as possible. Otherwise, certain portions of the State are taxed for the construction of works from which they derive no benefit. At the time those public improvements were commenced, the feeling among the people of Posey and the adjoining counties was: if we must be taxed for the support of this system, let us, at least, have a share in its benefits.

But again, sir. We who came into the Legislature after the system was adopted, considered it already fixed upon the State beyond recall. Since the gentleman has read passages from one speech of mine, I may be permitted to quote a few words from another. He will find it on the files of the "Democrat" for February, 1838:

"It is too late to talk of receding now. That was the question before you, sir, and before those who served with you in the session of 1835-6. You assumed the responsibility. You decided that question. Be your decision for good or for evil, it is made and cannot be recalled. We have put our hands to the plough, and may not look back. We have spent, not hundreds, not thousands—we have spent MILLIONS already. The system is fastened on us, in spite of ourselves. You remember, perhaps, sir, the old story of Sinbad the Sailor; how, deceived by his humanity, he took a deformed old wretch upon his back; how the creature twined its legs about its victim; and when the luckless sailor sought to cast it off, clutched him by the throat, till he was fain to desist. Sir, Sinbad's case is ours, &c."

I have a word, now, in reply to the gentleman from Delaware, who spoke of those living in counties not benefited as assuming to themselves undue credit for their opposition to a system that has turned out so ill. In proof that I have claimed no such credit, I read a few words from a communication of mine printed in the "Indiana Statesman," in May, 1845:

"I pray you to observe, that I am laying no claim to especial merit for my opposition to this system, however confident I am, that classification would have saved from reproach and temporary insolvency, our State. I resided in a county not immediately benefited by that system, and therefore, to some extent, out of the blinding atmosphere," &c.

And, finally, if, even as a classifier, I too much leaned towards the internal improvement system, the crime, if as crime it is to be imputed, was one of which every single individual of the hundred and fifty who composed the Legislature, was guilty equally with myself.

I should be glad to hear from the chairman of the committee who reported this section, his opinion as to the utility of the amendment which I have suggested.

MR. HALL (doubtfully heard). Certainly, I can conceive of no harm at all that can result from the incorporation of this provision into the Constitution; and if it would be to the interest of the people so to do, I have no objection to offer.

THE PRESIDENT. The Chair would say to the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) that, as matters now stand, this proposition would not be strictly in order.

MR. OWEN. I withdraw it, then.

MR. PEPPER from Crawford. Would it not be still in order to amend?

THE PRESIDENT. It would be in order to amend the original section.

MR. PEPPER. I had intended to offer some remarks upon this subject, but I will defer them, I believe, and offer the following amendment to the original section, as embracing my views:

Add the words "Provided, however, That the State shall never engage in any internal improvement system or systems."

MR. WALPOLE said—

MR. PRESIDENT: My remarks to-day, on the question now under consideration, were not intended by me to give offense to either the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) or the gentleman from Marion (Mr. Morrison). So far as these gentlemen were alluded to by me, it was to show and satisfy this body that the policy of the State, in her system of internal improvement, which they now so loudly deprecate as being the extreme of folly and imbecility, they at one time thought and acted quite differently from what they now do, in regard to it; and that, while they have attempted, in the course of this debate, to insinuate, if not expressly to declare, that they had ever opposed it from its inception to its explosion, that in truth and in fact, the one (Mr. Owen) was for an extension of the system, and the other (Mr. Morrison) was a devotee to the original system.

The gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) in his replication, has attempted to avoid the implication. At the time I addressed this body this morning, I spoke from verbal memory alone. I had not consulted the history of his course upon the system for years, until after the adjournment this morning, and I am now happy in having it in my power to fortify all I have said by written history. I assumed that he was not opposed to the system of internal improvement at the session of the General Assembly, after its passage—that he was not then for classifying the system, but was for an extension of the same, to a large amount. Such were his views until he was overwhelmed in his efforts to extend the system. That the Convention may know which of us is in the right, I refer to the Journal of the House of Representatives, for the session commencing in the month of December, 1836. On page 252, will be found the following proceedings and resolutions:

"MR. OWEN, after having obtained leave, offered the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to extend the system of internal improvement entered upon last year, to an amount of, not exceeding one million and a half of dollars.

"Resolved, That a committee of two from each Congressional district, be appointed, with instructions to prepare and report to the House, without delay, a bill embracing such works, not exceeding a million and a half, (as above,) as shall, in their opinion, give the most general satisfaction to the disaffected portions of the State, having reference—first, to the probable productiveness of the works embraced; secondly, to their being located, so far as practicable, in such portions of the State as have been heretofore unprovided for in the general system."

Upon the adoption of this resolution the yeas and nays were recorded, and among those who voted for the resolution, I find upon the journal the names, among others, of John P. Dunn, Abel C. Pepper, Joseph A. Wright, and Robert Dale Owen,—the total who voted in the affirmative being 39. In the resolutions I have just referred to and read, you find the emphatic declaration, as well as the vote of the gentleman, that it was expedient to extend the mammoth system of 1836, to an amount not to exceed one and a half million of dollars. But, Mr. President, the hasty remarks that I made this morning, in relation to the gentleman's internal improvement proclivities, are sustained further. On the 14th day of December, 1836, Mr. Eggleston introduced in the House of Representatives, a bill to extend the system. The extension, all admitted at the time, to approximate to near three millions of dollars. Mr. Owen was found to be in favor of the bill. It was understood, at the time, that it was prepared under his counsels. He addressed the House in a speech of much plausibility if not of persuasion. I will read some extracts from it. It may be found printed in the Democrat, published at the time by Bolton & Livingston, under the date of the 23d December, 1836. I had the pleasure of seeing a copy of the paper to-day at the Sentinel office, in this city. Any gentleman who will take the trouble, can see it. I will here read a few extracts from the speech, to show this body that he favored an extension of the system:

"Mr. OWEN said: I never rose, sir—I never expect again to rise, to address a legislative body on a subject more vitally important than is the subject before us, to the State of Indiana. Were my opinions thereon less decided, or were the duty I owe to my constituents to express these opinions, less imperative, I should give a silent vote.

"The subject, sir, naturally resolves itself into two great questions. Last year, an internal improvement bill passed, appropriating ten millions for State works. Now, the first of the two questions, is, 'shall there be any addition to the system of last year?' and second, 'shall this bill be that addition?'

"First, sir, as regards the propriety of any addition, have you ever calculated how many counties had the benefit of our ten millions worth of improvements last year? Thirty-nine counties out of eighty-five: leaving forty-six unprovided for;—say one-half. What does this neglected half ask for? An equal appropriation to that of last year!—or eight millions!—aye, six, or three? Two millions is the amount of their moderate—their modest equitable demand.

"What is the reply? That, to grant such a request, is to endanger the safety of the State. Indeed, sir, we are richer, by a million and a half of surplus revenue, than last year we were; and because we propose to appropriate this God-send—this wind-fall, with one poor half million more, to satisfy the demands so just, we must needs have this cry about the ruined credit of the State rung in our ears.

"Look at our bill, sir. Is it not a moderate—ay, an humble one?—do we not deserve credit for our moderation? Was there not temptation to over-step the limits of prudence?—yet have we done so? Have you never thought of the possibility of demands being raised until the whole system was broken down? For myself, I will lend my aid to no such plan."

Again, he says:

"Can you expect, sir, to move on?—I say not without consent and harmony of action. But can you expect to move on, without finding the wheels of government clogged at every step, if you deny to us such common justice as this?

"Consider, sir, what questions are coming up—The surplus revenue question—the three per cent. fund distribution—the specific appropriation to meet the interest of the mammoth debt. Are gentlemen prepared to vote on these? I, for one, will oppose every measure that goes to tax my constituents, until this or some similar bill passes.

"Think of the wide-spreading gratitude that will spring up through the land, to bless you, if this bill pass,—gratitude, not ostentatiously expressed, perhaps—not loudly obtruded on your notice—but yet not less deeply felt or warmly remembered on that account."

I need not comment upon the extracts I have read. His argument went to establish that justice demanded the extension, and that we were a million and a half richer than when the system was adopted; that the proposition to extend was a modest one; that, by their proposition for two million more, they had not overswept the limits of prudence; that he would never lend his aid to break down the mammoth system; that, if the system should not be extended, the wheels of government would be clogged at every step, and that common justice demanded the additional improvements.

Such, sir, were the views of the gentleman on the 23d day of December, 1836. And, connected with this scrap of history, is this additional proof of his desire to augment the public indebtedness: On the 16th January, 1837, Mr. Vandever introduced the following resolution, which may be found on page 254 of the journal of that session, in the following words:

"Resolved, That it is inexpedient, at this time, to add any new works to the system of internal improvements."

Upon the question of the adoption the vote is recorded, and I find the gentleman voting in the negative, and thereby declaring, on the 17th January, 1837, that it was expedient to add works of internal improvements to the mammoth system; and not until every effort was exhausted to increase the system, did the gentleman enlist in the opposition, in which he has attempted to avoid his connection with.

As to the gentleman from Marion, (Mr. Morrison,) I will read, in support of my position as to his identity with and support of the system, the following extracts from the report of the Senate's committee, at the session of 1841 and '42. It may be found in the legislative documents of the session of 1841 and '42, commencing at page 144. The committee was composed of Joseph C. Eggleston, Nathaniel West, Thomas D. Brenel, Samuel W. Parker, and E. M. Chamberlain, and their duty was to inquire into and report upon the official acts of those who were charged with the prosecution of our system of internal improvements; and the gentleman from Marion, (Mr. Morrison,) having been a member of the board of internal improvement, the committee report of him as follows:

"Mr. Morrison was limited by the board, and without due regard to the ability of the State to pay, as indicated in the order of the board, proceeded to make unauthorized lettings to the amount of $91,000 or $92,000. If all the members of the board had acted in the same manner in the exercise of lettings, over and above the probable means of the State, in that short period of six months during which he acted, would have amounted to $828,000, or $1,756,000 in one year."

"These lettings were not harmless in their consequences, as they added to the amount of the indebtedness of the State to contractors, and resulted in an increased emission of treasury notes, which are stopping the resources of the State revenue and operating injuriously on the currency of the country."

In reading these extracts, I do not wish to be considered as at all implying that the gentleman wantonly done wrong, but to remind gentlemen that we all are apt to commit error in public matters—that, while we are afraid to trust the people with power, we are not safe depositories of power—that, when the gentlemen from Posey and Marion assume that they can settle the question, and, therefore, the people should not exercise the power—that they themselves are the creatures of error. I say this without design of giving the least offense to either of the gentlemen, both of whom I believe would do no intentional wrong to the public interest.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson. From the very wide range which this discussion has taken, I think that we should all be admonished hereafter to resist the very beginnings of this evil. We have had here a very good illustration of that ancient and venerable sentiment: "Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth!"

I regret, as much as any gentleman upon this floor, that there has been any allusion made to parties in this debate. I say this in no spirit of rebuke whatever. I do not attack any man's sincerity at all; but, for myself, I would just as soon think of carrying a political party question into the sacred pulpit, as I would think of introducing such a question upon this floor. [A voice—"Consent."] And so long as I may be called to remain in my place in this Convention, I shall be very careful not to utter one word which may indicate even the existence of two such parties in this country as the whig and democratic parties. I do not know so much as one question which has been, or is likely to be, brought before this body, upon which we can be divided as partisans. Even upon the subject of banking, which would be most likely to divide, I find many whigs who are in favor, and many who are against a State Bank. I find, also, among whigs and democrats, many of the most ardent friends of banking; therefore, I can see no propriety, whatever, in bringing party distinctions into this body. But because there has been ultra and irritating matter spoken upon both sides of this question, and by men of both political parties, I do not think the Convention is now in a situation to come to the vote with that calmness with which it is desirable they should approach the adoption of a measure of such importance as that before us. I do not think gentlemen are prepared as they should be to act upon this question.

Mr. RARIDEN (in his seat). Yes, they are.

Mr. DUNN. I never saw a man who was excited in my life, but what he was ready to act—

Mr. RARIDEN (in his seat). I am not excited at all.

Mr. DUNN (continuing). And for that very reason, sir, I say we ought to wait, and forget our excitement before we come to the vote. This question naturally connects itself with banks, and we have already postponed the consideration of the first section because we considered that we were not ready for a division upon the subject of banking. The section now under consideration, in the opinion of many, is just as intimately connected with this important subject; and so far as this discussion has progressed, it has at least produced one useful result—that of directing the minds of the members to the important points embraced in these amendments. Let us now take time for their consideration. Let us lay the subject upon the table for a short time—a few days, at least—and proceed with the consideration of other business. I should prefer that the subject should lie over till we come to the consideration of the principal report upon the subject of banking, and that no vote should now be taken which would commit the body for or against the State Bank. For these reasons, I move that the section and pending amendments be laid upon the table.

The motion was lost.

The PRESIDENT. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Crawford (Mr. Pepper).

The question being taken upon this amendment, it was rejected; and again the question recurred upon the amendment of the gentleman from Ripley, (Mr. Smith,) striking out from the section all after the word "article" in the third line.

The yeas and nays upon this question were now demanded, and seconded by ten members.

Mr. STEELE. Before going into this vote, I wish to state a few impressions of my own mind, and report myself to my constituents. It is my impression, Mr. President, that our constituents have only required at our hands that we should restrict the power of their representatives to borrow money. But we are called upon by this section, since the latter clause was stricken out, to take out of the hands of the people, the exercise of the right to borrow money. I want gentlemen to mark my consistency here. It will be recollected that some days past, I refused to vote so as to sew up the rights of the people at the ballot-box. I refused to go for a section, the object of which was to deprive our fellow-citizens from the exercise of the right to vote for whom they please. And now let me say, once for all, that when we undertake to restrain the exercise of the sovereign power of the people at the ballot-box, we strike a blow at the very foundation of our republicanism—the very foundation of that great fabric of freedom which I have been endeavoring to sustain for the last forty years. I am well aware that the people of Indiana have sustained a great loss on account of their imprudence, or the imprudence of their representatives, in the matter of borrowing money; and I well know that the people in my section of country have learned something from this lesson of experience.

I was surprised to hear my friend from Posey (Mr. Owen) affirm his belief that the people of the State in 1836, were so much under the influence of the internal improvement excitement of that day, that they would have voted for the mammoth bill if it had been submitted to them.

Let me say to my friend from Wayne, (Mr. Rariden,) that during a portion of the time of which I am speaking, I was before the people, and one of their servants here; and that I was uniformly opposed to borrowing money to carry on the Wabash and Erie Canal, and I was opposed to borrowing money for the purpose of banking. I was for shielding and protecting the people against these measures, and this has been the principle which has guided me in every act of my public life. [Laughter, and cries of "question," and "go on! go on!"]

Mr. President, if gentlemen want the question, they shall have it. [Cries of "go on!"] I am only telling my experience, sir, and I have had a great deal of experience, and if I have exhibited some humble share of patriotism, I had supposed it might not be amiss to tell it. I thank God to-day, Mr. President, that none of the fire-brands of partisan strife have ever offended me. No gentleman upon this floor shall be the exponent of my opinions in regard to the rights of the people. They are all the product of my own experience, and the reflections of my own mind. I will go for no restrictions of the people, at the ballot-box; but I am at all times ready and willing to restrict the agents of the people—I am ready to deprive them of the power of borrowing money, because I believe that the exercise of this power has already made the most dangerous inroads upon the rights of the people of Indiana.

With reference to the idea of borrowing money to pay the interest on the public debt, it is my opinion that we can rid ourselves of debt much easier than by direct taxation; and I have long wished that this course might be taken, so that our politicians would no longer have occasion to make a hobby of this idea of borrowing money.

I have only to say in conclusion, that I am extremely sorry to-day, that we are expending so much time uselessly in this Hall. Let us pass upon the business before us with more expedition. Let us have less contention, and more voting. Let us in no case vote as partisans. [A voice—"consent."] Let us vote what we honestly believe will subserve the highest interests; and, as God is my judge, with my hands uplifted, I do most solemnly profess that my vote shall not go upon the journal, neither to gratify any evil feeling, nor to support any measure which I may not believe, conscientiously to be right, and for the best interests of the people of Indiana.

The Secretary now proceeded to call the yeas and nays upon Mr. ———'s amendment—striking out from the section after the word "article" in the 3d line, the following words:

"Unless provision be made therein to levy and collect an annual tax sufficient in amount to pay the interest thereon, and to discharge the debt within twenty-five years; nor shall such act take effect until it shall have been submitted to the people at a general election, and shall have received a majority of all the votes cast for and against it."

And the vote was reported—yeas 64, nays 53—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Berry, Biddle, Borden, Bracken, Bryant, Carr, Chapman, Coats, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Fisher, Foley, Gibson, Graham of Miami, Had-don, Hardin, Hendricks, Johnson, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kindley, Mather, Mathis, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Richey, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Tague, Trimble, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—64.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Balingall, Barbour, Beard, Blythe, Bowers, Brookbank, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Cole, Conduit, Crawford, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Gordon, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Kilgore, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Murray, Nave, Newman, Prather, Rariden, Schoonover, Shannon, Steele, Stevenson, Taylor, Todd, Wallace, Walpole, and Wolfe—53.

So the words were stricken out, and the question recurred upon ordering the section to be engrossed.

MR. RARIDEN. I move now to amend the section by adding the following.

"Unless provision be made."

MR. MORRISON of Marion, and Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. That is the same which was stricken out.

MR. RARIDEN. No, sir. Widely different from that.

MR. MILLER of Gibson moved to lay the amendment upon the table; which was agreed to.

Mr. HALL. We might as well now, as at any other time, I suppose, insert a provision authorizing the State to engage in banking; because the section, as it now stands, excludes the State from borrowing money for the purposes of banking.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman that the committee has already laid the first section upon the table, in order to amend the Bank question.

Mr. HALL. This section, as it now stands, leaves the State without the power to borrow money for any other purpose than those prescribed in the second section. Therefore, I offer the following proviso to be added to the section now under consideration:

"Provided, That nothing in this section shall be so construed as to prevent the General Assembly from taking stock in a State Bank, and providing the means therefor."

Mr. BERRY. I move to lay the amendment upon the table.

SEVERAL VOICES. "Yeas and nays."

And the demand was seconded by ten members.

Mr. RARIDEN. I would like to have a call of the House before this vote is taken. It seems to me there must be nearly fifty members absent from their places. I move a call of the House.

But the Convention refused to second the demand.

The PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed with the call of the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays being taken by the Secretary, the vote was reported—yeas 65, nays 55—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Berry, Biddle, Borden, Bracken, Bryant, Chapman, Chenowith, Coats, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Fisher, Foley, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Haddon, Hardin, Helm, Hendricks, Hovey, Howe, Johnson, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Mather, Mathis, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Taylor, Trimble, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—65.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Balingall, Beard, Blythe, Bowers, Brookbank, Carr, Clark of Hamilton, Cole, Conduit, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Dobson, Farrow, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hawkins, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Huff, Jones, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Moore, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Prather, Rariden, Schoonover, Shannon, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Todd, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Zenor, and Mr. President—55.

So the amendment was laid upon the table; and the question again recurring upon ordering the section to be engrossed—

Mr. NILES. I beg leave to remark, that I have been engaged in the argument of a case this afternoon, in the court sitting below stairs. I was exceedingly desirous of recording my vote upon the question decided a few moments ago; and I had made arrangement to be sent for, but it was overlooked. I would be glad if I could be now permitted to vote upon that question.

SEVERAL VOICES. "Consent," "consent."

Mr. NILES. I vote "yea," if I can have the privilege.

So Mr. Niles was permitted to record his vote as above, by unanimous consent of the Convention.

Mr. WATTS. I now give notice that on to-morrow I will move so to amend the rules that any member shall be allowed to record his vote, if he shall be any where in the Hall when the vote is taken.

Mr. KILGORE. I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

But this motion was lost.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. I rise for the purpose of inquiring, what is now the section under consideration?

The PRESIDENT. The section remains as it was reported by the committee, only the Convention have stricken out all after the word "article" in the third line.

Mr. PEPPER. I move that the section be now ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The PRESIDENT. That has been a standing question, without motion, for the last three days.

Mr. MILLER of Gibson. I demand the previous question.

But the Convention refused to second the demand.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson. As there appears to be a disposition to bring the Convention to an immediate vote upon this section as amended, I desire to say a few words, that the reasons for my vote may not be misunderstood. I shall vote against the section as it now stands, without any reference to its effects upon the future banking operations of the State. And it may be proper for me here to say that if I am compelled to take my choice between a State Bank system and a well regulated Free Bank system, I expect to be found voting with the friends of free banking. [Cries of "good, good."] Nor, sir, shall I vote against the section out of any desire that the State should hereafter engage in works of internal improvement. I oppose the adoption of the section upon the broad principle that it is an extraordinary, unreasonable, and unnecessary restraint upon the free will of the people of a sovereign State.

It is the nature of man to fly from one extreme to its opposite, and this propensity of our nature is now being fully developed and illustrated in the action of this body. Since this question has been under consideration we have had the old system of internal improvements dug up from its grave, and day after day its dry bones have been kept clattering about our ears to frighten us from our propriety. And now, sir, a majority of this Convention appears to be ready to vote that it is unsafe to trust the people with the power of ever contracting a debt of a few thousand dollars for a temporary purpose, for fear they may "ruin themselves by their extravagance." This course, in my humble judgment, betrays an unjustifiable want of confidence in the intelligence and prudence of our constituency. Sir, I never indulge in the cant referred to by the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit). I have never been a flatterer of the people. I know that they often err, but I would not therefore deprive them of the exercise of their free will under such reasonable restraints as prudence may dictate. I regard the principle that they are capable of prudently managing their own affairs as laying at the foundation of all systems of free government, and I cannot therefore vote to deprive them of a power which the unknown exigencies of the future may render necessary for their good, for fear they may unwisely exert that power to their harm. Sir, every useful power may be abused, and if for that reason it must be withheld, there is an end of all government.

Let us look at the effect of the adoption of this section as amended. It provides that "no act of the General Assembly shall authorize any debt to be contracted on behalf of this State, except for the purposes mentioned in the — [previous] section of this Article." The previous section, as adopted, reads as follows: "the General Assembly may contract debts to meet casual deficits or failures in the revenue, for the purpose of paying the interest on the State Debt, to an amount not exceeding such deficits; provided, that the State may contract debts to repel invasion, suppress insurrection, or, if hostilities are threatened, provide for the public defense." Under the operation of these two sections the General Assembly will have the power to contract debts for the purpose of paying the interest on the State Debt, to repel invasion, suppress insurrection, or, if hostilities are threatened, provide for the public defense, and for no other purposes whatsoever. Are these all the cases we know of, or if so, do we know that these are all the cases that can possibly arise in the future history of a great and growing State, wherein it would be proper or necessary for her to contract debts? Is this the full extent of trust and confidence that we think can be safely reposed in the people for the prudent management of their affairs? Shall we go to them as an anxious mother to her thoughtless child and say, this power to contract debts is a dangerous toy; pray let us have it that we may place it beyond your reach?

Now, sir, it is the furthest possible thing from my wish that this State should ever contract another dollar of debt except under the most imperious necessity. I consider a national debt a national calamity, and I regard the debt of Indiana as a very great misfortune to the people of the State. I do not wish to make it an easy matter to increase our indebtedness. I would throw around the power of contracting debts every reasonable restriction, and would give to the people the amplest security against the imprudence of their representatives. I would place it absolutely beyond the power of the General Assembly to contract any debt, except for a very limited amount for a temporary purpose, without the consent of the people being first obtained on a submission of the whole subject to them. But, sir, I would not in this Constitution lay a constraint on the people which no prudent man would lay on himself. What prudent man, though out of debt, and possessing an abundance of this world's goods, would be willing to enter into an obligation that he would never again contract a debt under any circumstances whatever? In a night his dwelling may be consumed, or his barns may be laid in ashes. Shall his family be homeless and his grain be permitted to waste in his fields until he can accumulate the means of restoring his losses? When his neighbors surround him and offer to advance him money or labor, shall he be compelled to refuse their assistance because he has entered into a foolish obligation that he would not contract a debt? And yet, even such a restraint is now proposed to lay upon a sovereign State. This stately edifice in which we are now assembled, erected at an expense of some seventy or eighty thousand dollars, may, before we meet again, be laid in ashes! The Legislature, under such circumstances, ought to borrow the money to re-build it, and assess a tax to discharge the loan in such a manner as not to make the burden fall too heavily at once upon the people. But under such a Constitutional provision as is now proposed, they would have no power to make such a loan.

The full weight of this misfortune must fall at once upon the people, and in the course of one or two years a largely increased amount must be raised from them by taxation.

But, sir, suppose it should happen, by some imperfection in your revenue laws, or for any other cause, that the revenue of any year should be insufficient to discharge the current expenses of your State government; must the wheels of government be stopped, or must your Governor, your Executive, and Judicial officers, your Legislators and all who serve the State, no matter in what capacity, be put upon short allowance until the deficiency can be supplied by taxation? And we must be subjected to all this inconvenience because, if the people retain the power to contract debts for useful and necessary purposes, they may run wild in extravagance!

Sir, I have now less fear of the people of this State unwisely contracting debts, or of their entering upon wild schemes of improvement than if they had no previous experience on this subject. Experience is a hard school, but it is a good one. Its lessons are not easily forgotten. The people of Indiana have learned a lesson in this school that will not be forgotten for many generations yet to come. Whatever other follies they may commit there is but little danger of their recklessly running into debt.

Since the abandonment of internal improvements by the State, private enterprise has been appealed to to undertake that which the State had failed to accomplish. It was necessary that the people of this rich agricultural State should be supplied with facilities for reaching the markets with their surplus products. To induce capitalists to embark in these enterprises liberal charters of incorporations have been granted, and in some instances, valuable donations have been made. Here is this National Road, constructed at the expense of the General Government, and extending from the eastern to the western limits of the State, that has been parceled out to corporations, without demanding from them a farthing for the vast expenditures upon that road. The Michigan Road, extending from the southern to the northern limits of the State, opened from the proceeds of lands liberally granted by the Indians, for that purpose, has been parceled out in like manner. We have railroads, and plank roads, and canals now, extending in all directions, being constructed by private enterprise combined in charters of the most liberal character. The number of these works is rapidly increasing. The volumes of your local laws are filled with acts of incorporation—acts granted under the pressure of circumstances, made liberal to induce their acceptance, and containing privileges, the value of which, were not properly estimated when they were granted. In a few years toll-gates and toll-collectors will meet you wherever you go, and soon there will arise as great a clamor against the exactions of these corporations, as ever existed against the mammoth internal improvement system. And when the people turn to their common mother, the State, and ask for relief, they must be told that she is powerless. They will then learn, that in many of these acts of incorporation, the State reserved the right of taking again into her own possession, and under her own control, these public works, upon paying to the corporations a specified amount, but that her Constitution forbids her to borrow money, and therefore the value of that reservation is lost. And thus a power, the very possession of which might operate as a wholesome check upon the charges of corporations, even if it should never be used, is surrendered out of an extreme timidity—a groundless fear of the common sense and common prudence of the people. [A voice, "We will take away their charters."] You will take away their charters! I know, sir, there are men who would trample vested rights in the dust, and walk boldly over any legal obstacle that might oppose their progress. But I regard a contract made between the State and her citizens, as sacred and obligatory as a contract between one citizen and another. A State that keeps not her own faith sacred, sets a most pernicious and corrupting example to her citizens.

Mr. President, I wish now to direct the attention of the Convention to the effect which the adoption of this section will have upon the rights reserved to the State, in the act incorporating the Madison and Indianapolis Railroad Company. It may surprise some gentlemen to hear me refer to this subject, and to receive from me a suggestion that the State has some rights under that act of incorporation, which this Convention ought to consider. Repeatedly, upon this floor, the delegates from Jefferson county have been charged with efforts to secure peculiar privileges and advantages to that Company. In answer to all such imputations I wish to say, so far as I am concerned, that I stand upon this floor as the representative of no local or special interest. I have come here with an honest desire to aid in the formation of a Constitution that shall operate beneficially and equally upon the people of every part of the State, and, in my humble way, I shall labor, industriously, to accomplish that object. In the act previously referred to, the right was reserved to the State, to purchase out the interest of the private stockholders in that road, on certain terms, supposed by the Legislature to be advantageous to the State. That purchase cannot be made without money, and the amount necessary can only be raised by a loan. It would, at least, be proper for this Convention to examine into this matter before they part with a privilege that may be of more importance than they imagine. I know, sir, that many persons entertain very extravagant notions of the profits this road yields to its stockholders, and that they set too high a value upon the State's interest in the road. But as it is the great trunk, from which branch roads are now projecting in so many directions, and, as before many years, there must pass over it an immense trade, collected from a widely extending portion of the State, it may become a matter of great importance to the people that the State should have the control of that road. But, sir, if the section under consideration should be adopted as a part of our organic law, so long as it remains in force, it will be impossible for the State to obtain this control, or avail herself of the privileges she retained in the act of incorporation, no matter how important the future may prove these objects to be.

I confess, Mr. President, that I was taken by surprise at the result of the vote by which the latter part of the section was stricken out. The section originally stood: "No act of the General Assembly shall authorize any debt to be contracted on behalf of this State, except for the purposes mentioned in the — [previous] section of this article, unless provision be made therein to levy and collect an annual tax sufficient in amount to pay the interest thereon, and to discharge the debt within twenty-five years; nor shall such act take effect until it shall have been submitted to the people at a general election, and shall have received a majority of all the votes cast for or against it." The amendment, by striking out all after the word "article," has converted a section which originally presented the conditions upon which the General Assembly might contract debts, into a prohibition of their contracting debts, except for the purposes enumerated in the previous section. I believe I never, until within a day or two, heard that such a proposition as we are now called to vote upon, was favored by any body. I thought we were all agreed that some stringent restrictions ought to be imposed upon the power of the General Assembly to involve the people in debt, and that they should be made secure in the control of their own purse strings; but that the people themselves could not be trusted on this subject; that they must be deprived of a power which appears to me to be inseparable from the idea of sovereignty itself, the power to use their own credit when they deem it useful and necessary so to do, is certainly something new under the sun. So important a principle of political economy as this, it seems to me, ought to have been announced to the world with something more of pomp and ceremony. It at least deserved a herald to proclaim its approach. Its importance would certainly have justified it in being brought forward as a distinct proposition, instead of its being indebted for its existence to a skillful surgical operation, performed upon a section intended for the very opposite purpose. I had no intention of addressing the Convention on this subject, nor indeed did I think of doing so until by the vote just taken I saw a disposition manifested by its friends to carry it through by a sort of coup de main.

I hope by my remarks to have at least directed the attention of the Convention to the true nature and effect of the measure, and to have divested it of the collateral matters that have been drawn into the discussion. I have suggested such cases as have occurred to me at the moment in which it might hereafter be of importance to the State to have the privilege of using her credit. But if no such instances had occurred to my mind, I should still feel it to be my duty to oppose the adoption of the section as it now stands. The emergencies of the future we cannot anticipate, but we know that crises occur in the affairs of States, as well as of individuals, when they must resort to their credit. I would secure this power from abuse by any reasonable restraint not inconsistent with the ultimate right of the people to manage their own affairs in their own way. I would prefer even more stringent restrictions upon the power than are contained in the part of the section just stricken out. But, sir, I would not place in our Constitution a restriction, that is not only not found in the Constitution of any State in the Union, but is not to be found in the Constitution or laws of any civilized nation on the globe. I would not place shackles on that arm upon whose power and freedom may some day depend the welfare, if not the safety, of the State.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley took the floor in reply, but as a disposition to adjourn seemed to prevail throughout the Hall, upon his motion, which was agreed to,

The Convention adjourned till to-morrow morning, 9 o'clock.

FRIDAY, Nov. 22. 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by Rev. Mr. LONG.

RICHARD M. JOHNSON.

Mr. RARIDEN rose and said: I desire to have a suspension of the rules for the purpose of enabling me to offer a resolution, which, I believe, will be heartily responded to by every member of the Convention,—with reference to the decease of the late Colonel Richard M. Johnson, of Kentucky.

The rules being suspended, by consent,

Mr. R. continued: I offer the following preamble and resolutions; and I regret that I have not had time to prepare them with more care:

WHEREAS, This Convention has learned with profound sensibility, that Col. RICHARD M. JOHNSON, late of Kentucky, has departed this life; and Whereas, the service of this distinguished patriot and soldier, as well in the field as in the councils of the nation, has constituted him the property, and justly entitled his memory to the grateful notice, of Indiana, in common with the citizens of the whole Republic; therefore,

Resolved, That, whilst cherishing a just sense of gratitude towards this distinguished citizen for his many important public services, rendered in behalf of his country, during the course of a long public life, as the able, faithful statesman, and brave soldier, we most sincerely condole with his numerous friends and relatives, in the irreparable bereavement they have sustained, in the loss of an affectionate and devoted friend; and with our sister State, Kentucky, in being thus deprived of his valuable services in her public councils.

Resolved, That ——— be appointed a committee, on the part of this Convention, to tender to the relatives of Col. Johnson the expression of our heartfelt condolence on the melancholy occasion, and that the Secretary of this Convention transmit to the Executive of the State of Kentucky, a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions.

Resolved, That the editors of the several newspapers in this State be requested to publish the foregoing in their papers respectively.

The preamble and resolutions were adopted, by unanimous consent.

PUBLIC DEBTS.

The PRESIDENT. The Convention will now resume the consideration of the section last but one, of the report from the committee on the State debt and public works.

Mr. WOLFE. Is it in order to amend the section now?

The PRESIDENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOLFE. Would it be in order to strike out and insert?

The PRESIDENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOLFE. Then I move to strike out all after the word "section," and insert the following:

"The General Assembly shall never pass any act to create any State debt, except as named in section —, unless said act provides that the interest shall be paid annually, and the principal liquidated in 20 years. Nor then, until it shall have been submitted as a distinct proposition to the people at a general election, and received their sanction by a majority vote."

The PRESIDENT. Does the gentleman from Sullivan propose to strike out the entire section?

Mr. WOLFE. All after the word "section."

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I would inquire whether this proposition is not identically the same with that which has been stricken out?

The PRESIDENT. It is not. The Convention has only struck out the words of the section following the word "article," in the third line.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I understand that; but it seems to me that the gentleman proposes to insert substantially the same matter which has been stricken out.

Mr. WOLFE. I have been somewhat fearful that we were going too far in this matter. At home, and wherever I am known, I have usually been considered rather ultra in my notions. But this section is going a little further than I am willing to go. I voted against striking out the latter clause on yesterday; and, for that reason, and in order to set myself right before the Convention and the country, I desire now to make a brief statement. I shall be very brief, and I hope to have the attention of the body.

The question arises in these premises, whether the people are capable of self-government? That is the question. We have, as a people, long since declared to the world, that all power is inherent in the people, and that they are capable of governing themselves. And now it is proposed to restrain them from the exercise of the power to borrow money. I stand, upon this question, just as I stood with regard to the proposition to make all of the officers of the State elective. I was then in favor of short terms of office, and in favor of restraining the servants of the people—not the people themselves. I think there is a great difference between the servants, or the representatives of the people, and the people themselves. Certainly we have the power and the right, (and, as I believe, it is expedient as in this section, it was originally proposed, and as I now propose,) so to restrain the power of the Legislature, that they cannot merge the people in debt, unless the people themselves consent. And, as we are going to have biennial sessions of the Legislature, I am of opinion that the time which would necessarily elapse before a proposition to borrow money could be passed and become a law, would be a sufficient guarantee against the danger of all hasty action in the premises.

But the question arises, whether it would be good economy to pursue this course? I think that economy which is good in the management of the affairs of a family, is just as good in the management of the affairs of a county or a State. Would it be economical, then, or even proper, to restrain an individual—the head of a family, by saying that he should not do this or that thing, even though he might think it would be for his interest to do it? Certainly it would not. Again, in reference to county affairs—if the people were to deem it proper to do a certain thing, would it be proper, or prudent, or wise, to take the power to do that thing entirely out of their hands? I think it would not. And in like measure, it would be improper and unwise, as I think, so to restrain the people of the State at large, that they cannot come up and vote upon any proposition they please; and I think, also, that if this Convention were to fix upon and establish this principle, the people would finally reject the amended Constitution.

Where, I ask, is the necessity thus to attempt to paralyze the arm of government? I am sure it would be going too far. We have had frequent occasions to borrow money in the history of the State governments of this Union, as well as in the history of the general government; and but recently, on account of the late war with Mexico, we had occasion to borrow money which could not have been dispensed with. And if the people of Indiana have, by the exercise of this power, heretofore brought upon themselves a most extravagant and oppressive debt, is that a good reason for taking away from them the power to borrow money for all future time? Because the people have done wrong once, is that any reason that they will always do wrong? But in case the people do wrong, upon whom falls the penalty? and who is to judge the people? We all know that it is human to err. And in this case, it is only human judging human. And may not we also err in our judgments? But whenever I look at the history of these errors of the people, in every case where the people have been misguided, I find that it was the leaders of the people that caused them to err. It was so anciently, and it has been so recently, in 1835-6; and so it ever has been, and ever will be, that whenever the people err, in such a case, they are constrained so to do by the inflammatory speeches of their leaders. It has been the few that have always caused the many to err. Let the people alone, and they will always do right; or if they get wrong, (the burden falling upon themselves,) they will be sure to get right again.

We have agreed to extend the elective franchise, so that all officers, those which have been hitherto appointed and elected by the Legislature, shall hereafter be elected by the people; that the people shall elect all their public servants. This, in my opinion, is right. But now, how inconsistent is it to say, that the people are capable of choosing their public servants, and at the same time declare that it is imprudent to trust them with reference to this matter of borrowing money!

But when it comes to looking into the question of restraining the power of the people to borrow money for any purpose of which it is impossible to see the result, we should remember that we are establishing organic law, to reach, we cannot say how far, into the future; that we are setting up rules to guide the people for time to come; and this consideration, I think, should induce us to hesitate and reflect much before we decide.

I voted against striking out last evening, for the reason that the people are capable of righting their own wrong doings. I remembered that in 1796 the people elected the elder Adams to be President of the United States; and it was ascertained by many that they had done wrong in that thing, at the proper time. Upon the next proper occasion, in the year 1800, they elected Thomas Jefferson to be his successor. This is the way the error was corrected, and who would not say that this was a much better way than it would have been for them to have declared, that because the people erred in the election of a President in the year 1876, therefore, they should never elect a President again. Would it have been right and proper for them to have restrained the people in that way? Certainly not. It was much better in the year 1800 to correct their error by the election of Thomas Jefferson. Again: in the year 1828 the people elected Andrew Jackson to the Presidency of the United States, and some people thought that to be an error; but no man demanded that, therefore, the people should never elect another President. Again: in the year 1840 Gen. Harrison was elected over Mr. Van Buren, and a great many people thought that to be an error. Since that time, in almost every part of the country, it has been conceded that perhaps that error was best for the country, on account of the events which followed: but in a short time, whether right or wrong, that decision was peaceably reversed in 1844; and again the latter decision was reversed in 1848. Such is the tendency of man to err; and these are good examples of the power of the people to correct their own errors: and they furnish also good grounds for confidence in the perpetuity of our institutions.

But to return to the consideration of this section. I stand here to say that the people can govern themselves. I acknowledge that we have been traveling very slowly over this ground, and our progress has reminded me of the old times of barging upon the rivers from New Orleans up to Pittsburgh; when we would eat our breakfast at a certain point on the river, and after barging it up stream all day, at supper we might sometimes find ourselves very near the same point where we took our breakfast. This seems to me very much like the progress of this body upon many questions before us. In these days of steamboats and railroads, it would seem that we ought not to go back to the times of barging upon rivers for examples of our progress.

Gentlemen should remember that when the half-hour rule was adopted, it caused a great deal of kicking and flouncing, and it was denounced as a gag rule. But, sir, what are we doing now? Are we not considering a proposition to gag the people? But I see around me gentlemen who were opposed to the half-hour rule, making no opposition to the idea that the people shall be gagged.

It is from these considerations that I am induced to say to the Convention, let us be cautious about this matter; and while we assume to know so much, let us be willing to admit that the people know something too. I call myself one of the people. When I am at home I follow the plow. I labor for my living as a tiller of the soil. I have no stock in banks nor in public works. My little property is all in real estate. Nevertheless, I have still a great and abiding interest in this as well as every other question by which it is proposed to modify the Constitution. And I say to gentlemen, let us not go so far in the work of amendment here, that the people will feel themselves called upon to reject our labors.

MR. KINLEY. MR. PRESIDENT: Disavowing any intention of speaking for home effect, I am not only willing, but desirous, that every act of mine may be heard among those whom I represent. I wish to be brought to the strictest accountability. Gentlemen choose to hold up our constituents as a rod of terror over our heads. It shall always be my delight to obey the wishes of those for whom I act. The agent should be responsible to his principal. It is in view, sir, of this very doctrine, that I intend to say, as far as my vote can effect it, that future Legislatures shall never involve the State in debt, except in certain prescribed and necessary cases.

We are warned against tying up the hands of the people. Sir, we are the people's agents. If they endorse our act, it becomes their own act. It is the people, then, placing restrictions upon themselves. And, though gentlemen regard this provision as calling into question the intelligence of the people, to my mind, the people never present themselves in a more favorable light—never does their intelligence stand out in such bold relief—as when they voluntarily and calmly fetter their power to do evil. The very existence of government implies this power of restraint; and every action of government is an exertion of this power. But this position is too clear to require further argument.

But there are some subjects on which restraints should be placed in the organic law; others which belong, properly, to the State Legislature. To which of these classes does the section under discussion belong? This is the question.

There is one rule, Mr. President, by which I have endeavored to govern all my actions here. It is this: A political principle, the truth of which is well established, or a political measure, the correctness of which there remains no doubt, may be safely made a part of the organic law.

Since the adoption of the great system of internal improvement, our State has been deeply involved in debt. Have we profited by this debt? Or, to put the question in another form, had the State succeeded in the whole system, was there a single one of the public works which might not have been better accomplished by private enterprise? We have, it is true, learned a deep lesson of experience. Whether we profit by this lesson or not, is now to be seen. However much I may desire wisdom, Mr. President, I would gladly forego all the lessons our errors have taught us, if, by this means, we could cancel the indebtedness of the State. The very first act to borrow money, in the name of the State of Indiana, was, in my opinion, an error. I believe in the old-fashioned doctrine of closing the books—squaring the accounts—as we go along. Since we are in debt, we must get out; the honor of the State must be preserved. It may be well to prepare for the occasional deficits in the treasury; but, even in this case, it would be far better—safer at any rate—to have a surplus in the vaults, ready to meet these little contingencies.

I cannot see, sir, why the bank question is logged into this discussion. The committee has reported on that subject, and in due time we will have it before us, in its order. I see in this question just what is stated on the face of the report: simply the question of a State debt. And however other gentlemen may be wedded to this monster, that is every year drinking the lifeblood of the body politic, to me, I confess, its features possess no peculiar loveliness.

I know, sir, that the public debt system has extreme tenacity of life; its expiring spasms are terrible. But die it must. I take no savage pleasure in witnessing its dissolution. I am willing to pay to its exit the same honors that ushered it into existence—the beatings of the drum and the firing of cannon. Bury it, if you please, with all the honors of war. But let it die.

Experience has proven that public improvements flourish best under the direction of private enterprise. Let us, then, throw around the citizen the protection of law, and leave an open field and action free.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I cannot but think it very singular for gentlemen to come in here, time after time, with identically the same proposition which the Convention had already solemnly voted down, and make speeches upon their proposition, at the same time complaining of the tardiness of business in the Convention, and comparing our progress to the business of barging up and down the Ohio river in former times. It appears to me that this course is most extraordinary. It is very strange that gentlemen will not submit to the solemn and repeated action of this body. The Convention had twice voted down the identical proposition which the gentleman from Sullivan, (Mr. Wolfe,) in his zeal to push forward business, has presented this morning.

The PRESIDENT. It may be substantially, but it is not identically the proposition.

Mr. SMITH. Substantially the same proposition, I mean. I stand corrected.

While I am up, I desire to call the attention of the Convention, for a moment, to the point raised by the gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Dunn). That gentleman's good sense—his ability, talent, and general bearing here—entitle him to a great deal of attention and respect. That gentleman made an eloquent speech; but, eloquent as it was, I have to remark, that, if there was not before he addressed the Convention sufficient reason, according to my judgment, to strike out the proposition which he advocated, that speech alone would furnish the reasons. If we were going it blind, the gentleman's argument would be sufficient to sustain our position, without any other resource. What was the gentleman's argument. He was opposed to tying up the hands of the people, by this Convention, for the very good reason that we had a large amount of State stocks in the market, and a favorable time might arise suddenly for buying them up. That is true. I had that in my mind's eye, when I made the motion to amend; but then I saw so many other things connected with this thing of borrowing money, that I felt it would be better to forego this advantage, rather than jeopardize the great interests of the State.

But the gentleman also stated that it might be to the interest of the State, at some future time, to buy out some of the public works, and he referred to the situation of the Madison and Indianapolis Railroad. In reply to this suggestion, I would say that it might become, in process of time, very important to that Company to sell out their road to the State. It might become very important to them for the State to buy; and it is to prevent that, and if they should seek any such thing, to shut down the gate.

The gentleman from Jefferson has a great deal of forecast. He is a most perfect exponent of the interests, as well as the sagacity of the county he represents. He is looking forward to the time when the Jefferson Railroad may so depreciate in value that it would be exceedingly important to the stockholders to turn it over to the State of Indiana by a vote of the people. I would say to my friend from Jefferson that I accord to him the credit of a great deal of sagacity which he has exhibited in this matter, and I thank him for throwing out the hint which he has.

But let us hear my friend from Wayne county (Mr. Rariden) upon this subject. He, too, has been unflinching in his advocacy of the proposition to leave the way open to the Legislature to borrow money. He, also, is the talented representative of the stockholders in that great work, the Whitewater Valley Canal, running along the eastern border of the State, which has exerted such an important influence upon our political history. I understand from that gentleman that this Company is a rickety concern, and would like to sell out to the State—an event which would have been already accomplished if it had not been arrested by the executive veto.

Taking these two public works into the account, without going any further, we might make up a pretty heavy bill of expenses to be thrown upon the State whenever it might become important to the interests of the stockholders so to do.

But let us look a little further. Here is the great Wabash and Erie Canal, extending from the north-eastern to the south-western extremity of the State. And whenever the time shall come—as it will—when this great public work will become unprofitable, here will be a stupendous, & most magnificent operation for the Legislature of the State. Who cannot see what powerful influences the agents of these several companies could exert upon the Legislature, to submit a proposition to the people to purchase any one or all of these public works? The stockholders would be willing to give the State most magnificent bargains if the people would only agree to go into it, and take these works off their hands.

What are the interests which would be brought to bear upon propositions of this kind? Why, these gentlemen would say, here is a fine bargain offered; and, as we were told yesterday, by the gentleman from Jefferson, the people themselves would become clamorous in consequence of the taxes imposed upon their travel. They would feel, almost in the language of that gentleman, that they were taxed with toll for going from the kitchen to the smoke-house. Yes, sir, the people would become clamorous against unreasonable freights and tolls. They would clamor against the State, because every road would be presided over by some corporation.

Let us take notice, here, of what a combination of interests would arise on the part of the stockholders to induce the people to buy them out. The onerous system of tolls which might be inflicted by the stockholders on the one hand, and the duty of the State to release the people from this system of oppression on the other hand, while all these companies will come up to the Legislature by their agents, from one end of the State to the other. The people would be tired of paying tolls, and if the stockholders could turn their works of improvement upon the State, the State would then be able to reduce the tolls, and this would be a most desirable result with many, even if the State should have to pay interest upon the money borrowed to buy out these works. Is it possible that the eyes of gentlemen are so blinded that they cannot see this? Do they not know the power and political influence that corporations can and do exert all over the State? and they will be continually making the most strenuous efforts to slough off their unprofitable works upon the State just as sure as we leave this open clause in the Constitution. I will not charge it upon any man that this clause was left open in the section with a view to effect anything of this kind; and such a thing might not be contemplated just now. But the Whitewater Canal has attempted such a thing alone: that is, unaided by other companies; and the attempt was almost successful. In view of this fact, what might not be apprehended in this way, when it shall come to be the interest of the stockholders of the Madison road to combine with the stockholders of the Whitewater Valley Canal, and the Wabash and Erie Canal; and it is easy to conceive what multitudes of little plank roads and turnpikes would come in—all combining and presenting the most exquisite bargains, if the State would only buy them out. This peculiar interest would be awakened all over the State, and it would be continually manufacturing evidence which would convince the people themselves, and beguile them into a speculation upon a new system of this kind which would inevitably soon become even more odious than the old system of internal improvements. I am for shutting the door against this evil. I am for locking the door of State credit, and throwing away the key, that this section proposed to leave in the hands of the dear people, and the people will thank us for our wisdom and forecast. If we must borrow money, let it be for specific purposes only. Let us adopt the provision as it now stands. Let us not make an open clause.

Sir, before twenty years shall elapse, broken and unprofitable corporations will be able to influence, if not to overawe, the action of the Legislature. This consideration alone stamps the seal of wisdom upon the action of the Convention. If we have done it by instinct, the effect and result will be sound sense. Sir, the section struck out was warmly advocated by patriotic gentlemen, but in my opinion, in it lurked a most insidious power, when the time should come to involve the people in hopeless ruin again. It would be a god-send to poor failing corporations, by combinations such as could be effected under the provisions of that section, to turn their failing fortunes on the State to its injury if not ruin.

I was astonished, sir, that this proposition—the identical proposition which had been twice before solemnly voted down—should be brought forward again this morning by those men who are so exceedingly anxious to expedite business; thereby forcing upon us a reiteration of the very same arguments which we have already heard and answered, time and again.

Sir, I hope we shall soon get over the stump speech making policy here, and take up the consideration of matters with which we can make more creditable progress and show to the country that we are really doing something.

Mr. RARIDEN. I sincerely hope that the gentleman who has just taken his seat, will yet be convinced that he is mistaken entirely in the reasoning which has fallen from him. I know he is mistaken. And if he cherishes the idea that every man in this Convention who happens to entertain different views from himself, entertain those views for the purpose of carrying them out of this Hall, and using them before the people hereafter for private advantage, he is again mistaken. This idea has got abroad, that certain gentlemen flatter themselves that they are the only true friends of the people and guardians of their interests. I want to meet this idea. It is too much for half a dozen men to appropriate to themselves the character of being the only true exponents of the interests of the people, and that every body else, who happen to entertain different views from themselves, in regard to what powers should pertain to the legislative body, are laying the foundations of future impositions upon those who are to come after us. Those gentlemen who are eternally telling us that they are to be found on the side of the people when their rights are involved or discussed, not unfrequently have their purposes and views in being thus near them; they may, for aught I know, hug them to their bosoms for individual gain. It will be found that one-half of those men who are always on the side of the people, are quite as much disposed to pick the pockets of the people as any other kind of patriots. They find their advantage by getting into the confidence of the people, and sometimes of so putting their hands into the pockets of the people. And if I wanted to hunt up that kind of persons who were disposed to make money out of the people, I would look amongst that class who are eternally harping about their nearness to the people.

But what is it that we hear in this Hall? Those lovers of the people are ready to charge it upon those who are not of their own way of thinking on questions of great interest, that they love the people not, and that their measures will end in a species of the most infamous fraud ever practiced upon a virtuous community.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley (interposing). Surely I did not use such strong terms.

Mr. RARIDEN. Well, I will not misrepresent the gentleman. I understood him to say that the proposition which I made, and the peculiar principles advanced by the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Dunn,) if they were carried out, would result in the most infamous frauds ever practiced upon a virtuous community, and if adopted in the Constitution would bring about a surrender to the State of the Madison and Indianapolis Railroad, the White Water Valley Canal, and the Wabash and Erie Canal, upon such terms as would bring utter ruin and bankruptcy upon the State of Indiana, and if that would not amount to a fraud—

Mr. SMITH. I simply stated that, if there were to be placed in the Constitution an open clause—such as that which was stricken out on yesterday—the idea of a combination of this kind would be matured and brought about, by which most injurious bargains might be imposed upon the State. I did not say that the gentleman from Jefferson, or those who adopt his opinions, had any interest in proposing any such sale of any public work; nor that they contemplated any such thing; and I stated a fact which is well known, that the White Water Valley Canal Company had proposed a sale to the State.

Mr. RARIDEN. Well, I do not stand here to say anything for the Madison and Indianapolis Railroad; but I will ask the gentleman to be just to that miserable and down-trodden association, the White Water Valley Canal. I will say to him this: that in the charter of that company, the State of Indiana reserved the right to purchase back the improvement at the expiration of the term of eight years, and make it the property of the State, by reimbursing the Company for the amount of their expenditure for construction; and the corporation did offer to surrender to the State all their right and interest in that work, if the State would give her bonds for only one-half the amount they had expended. The same body also offered to surrender this work to the State without price, if the State would agree to keep it in repair, and that they would look to the liberality of the State for a reimbursement of the seven hundred thousand dollars they had expended upon it. Is that a matter to blame the Company for? They took the work off the hands of the State, at a time when the State had no credit, and when eleven hundred thousand dollars had been irretrievably lost to the State. They took the work when the estimated amount which would be required to complete it was four hundred thousand dollars, the State reserving the right to take it back by paying the amount which might be expended, with six per cent. interest thereon; and when the Company found that the burthen was too heavy for them, they offered to surrender the work without price. And now this is brought up here as evidence of a disposition to defraud the State. Because, as the gentleman said, if we leave the clause open, such and such will be the result—that the people would be easily seduced, and evil would be brought upon the State. Such men, sir, reason from very fallacious standards; first contemplating what a dishonest man might do, and then affirming that so the people's representatives would do.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley (interrupting). I hope the gentleman will allow me to explain, as I discover he has some feeling in the matter?

Mr. RARIDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH. I would like to set myself right. I was merely illustrating an argument drawn from the fact that the White Water Valley Canal Company had offered to surrender their work to the State. Surely, I was not wanting in respect to the gentleman from Wayne, or any other individual connected with the concern.

Mr. RARIDEN (to Mr. Smith). I did not understand you in that way at all. Make yourself easy in regard to that. I was not resenting any opinion which may have been expressed against the stockholders of that miserable concern. But there has been considerable misapprehension in regard to them, and I stand here to vindicate humanity and posterity and my children, against the imputations of these gentlemen, who allow themselves to reason here from such a fallacious standard. They proceed upon the calculation, that all those who are to come after us will be influenced by the same considerations with the unworthy, who have gone before and played traitor by grabbing and filching all they could out of the State.

Let us contemplate this matter calmly and see whether the doctrine is consistent with those principles which have been advocated by the gentleman himself throughout his whole life. Where before did he affect to distrust the people's capacity to take care of their own affairs? Sir, what are we doing here? We are establishing the organic law of the State. We are, it will be said, chalking down the outlines of government. We are establishing those outlines which are to circumscribe legislative action, and of which no power can be exercised even by the people. It cannot by the Legislature, because not granted, and it cannot by the people, because there is no other organization through which they, the people, can speak or act, except the Legislature, upon such subjects. Then would it not be well to consider whether its exercise might not be necessary upon some occasion. Can you pretend to see through futurity, and know just what power will be abused by a legislative body, if entrusted and how much its action should be restrained for the good of the governed in all coming time; or would it be well to leave such things to those who are to come after us and to be affected by the measure. For my part I do not entertain the idea that all wisdom and patriotism will die with the dissolution of this Convention, and that there will be an experience after ours, that the next twenty years will disclose as much as the past and might bring in disrepute our present pretensions to foresight in human events. For my part so far as temporary and pecuniary interests are concerned, I am for leaving every age ample power to direct and control its own. This is a part of the legacy left to us and I will not lessen or attempt to diminish it in the hands of those who are to come after us. If they abuse it, it is for them to do so, and they will be responsible for the abuse; but if we have acted unwisely, is it any reason why our children with our examples and our errors before them will do the same? If they do let it be so. They would have no reason to thank us for saving them from their own folly at the expense of their political freedom.

But I desire now, to take notice of a remark which dropped from the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) and was taken up by others and used as a legitimate argument. He says, he denies restrictions such as the present, if those restrictions are not to be imposed; why not simply say there shall be a Legislature, and let it do all that may be required, make a Governor, Judges, &c., and do all and what it pleases.

Well, sir, but would that constitute a republic. It would be what the writers upon government call a many headed monster, in whose hands would be concentrated the most absolute power, for good or for evil. There would be no checks and balances which are requisites in a republic. The government would be absolute—in the hands of this—if it should happen to be an elected legislative body. Such a government would be inconsistent with the genius and spirit of our institutions, and would not be received in the sisterhood of republics.

The gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) maintains that all Constitutions limit both the power of the people and the Legislature, and reads the article from our present Constitution, interdicting the Legislature from creating titles of nobility as proof of this restriction both upon the Legislature and the people. I once before denied the correctness of this position and attempted its refutation. I agree that as between the people it is conventional that they will have a government without that element in it, but it is not restrictive of these rights; but to the legislative power, it is a restriction upon the power delegated, if within the power of legislation. In the English Government, from whence we got the idea, a nobility represents a caste of society, and perhaps the landed interest, and is a hereditary element in the Government, and is repugnant to our republican theory. We could not have it and have a republic; therefore, I say that the restrictions in that case and all others in the present Constitution is upon the exercise of delegated power, and not upon the people. The right which they surrender is conventional with themselves and delegated because inconvenient for them to exercise, and the enjoyment of which, in each individual, would be inconsistent with organized society; therefore they are delegated to one common law-making power which they create by this conventional arrangement among themselves.

Now, with reference to this section, I affirm that it is right and proper to leave it for posterity to act for themselves in regard to this matter of money borrowing. One argument which has been brought up against this doctrine is: that we have no right to create a debt, the judgment of which will fall upon posterity. I admit that in this matter we have acted imprudently, extravagantly, and unwisely. But I have no hesitation in saying that the race that are to come after us are our debtors, and not we theirs; for my part, confessing freely our mistakes and miscarriages in money matters, and confessing and charging ourselves with a debt of eight millions which we shall leave posterity to pay, yet I say they have no cause of complaint, and I am ready to compare and settle accounts. We found this whole country a wilderness, and we shall leave it a paradise, except the debt upon it. Let posterity give us credit for what we have done—for our railroads, our canals, our fine meeting houses, and seminaries of learning, and private dwellings, and all the other accompaniments of the highest civilization and internal facilities, and I will go into the settlement and bring posterity greatly debtor to the present age, without taking into account the enhanced value we have given to the soil. Then do not tell me of the wrongs we have inflicted upon posterity, for we have done it none; we have made a century's travel in less than twenty years.

I beg gentlemen to consider the effect of this restriction upon future policy and legislative action; no matter what may be their views of their own interest, they are to be tied down to our conceptions of it, and we looking and judging through a cloud of twenty or fifty years at it. Why not leave them as our fathers left us, free to choose the course of policy seemed to us proper; and because some gentlemen suppose that we have trifled with and abused our liberty, that we should not trust our descendants with the same freedom of action. Will they not have understanding to profit by our errors and to steer clear of the rocks upon which it is said we have split and foundered?

Then what is to be the effect of this restriction? What do we ask here? We ask you to let those who are to come after us manage their own matters in their own way; and if they should ever think it to their interest to buy out the Madison Railroad or any other improvement, let them do it. Why should we look forward twenty years and say such a thing should not be done by those who are to succeed us? Why should we urge a specific rule in regard to the expenditure of money upon the acceptance of those who are to live after us? I am not the man to do such a thing, because I do not know what will be for their best interests. It is sufficient for me to leave them to their own choice with respect to this matter. I do not wish to tie up their hands from doing whatsoever would be right and proper in their own estimation; nor do I intend to subject them to the necessity of meeting together in another Convention, as we are now met, for the purpose of getting back that power. If the coming age is to be unwise and corrupt, and wholly disposed to do wrong—such a thing may occur—if the people of the coming age shall prefer to follow after evil advisers and prove themselves corrupt and seducible by selecting representatives who will destroy and annihilate every good within their reach, then gentlemen who are in favor of this section, without the amendment, are wise, and their advice ought to be regarded. But if it be possible that the coming generation, twenty years hence, may be as watchful as ourselves; if we can think that their representatives will be as mindful of the interests and wishes of their constituents as we are, then I hold that they will be better judges of their own affairs than we can be, and that they will manage their affairs wisely unless by some mistake. Then I will not undertake to say that in twenty years from this time, it would not be proper for the people to take this matter in their own hands. It may be, and no doubt will be, the case at that day, that every neighborhood will be cut up and intersected by railroads and plank roads; and, as has been suggested, it might be so that a man could hardly go to meeting or to his spring house without paying toll. In such case the people might become irritated and restive, and such corporations might feel insecure, which would greatly diminish the value of these works in the hands of the stockholders. The people may think it better to pay a general tax in order to buy out these improvements and have the tolls abolished, or reduced at least eight-tenths in amount. I say, sir, that if the people shall come to conclusions like these, in the course of ten, twenty, or fifty years hence, in God's name let them do as they will. Let not me, nor the gentleman from Ripley, after riding in the mud ourselves almost all our lives, say aught against it. Do not let us, frail men as we are, with our limited and restricted knowledge of their wants and interests in the future, interdict their progress by thus tying their hands with this restriction.

The PRESIDENT (striking down the hammer). The Chair is obliged to remark to the gentleman from Wayne that his half hour is out.

Mr. PETTIT. I have not designed to say anything upon this subject, but the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) has made an allusion to me, of which I must take some notice.

Mr. President, there is nothing more beautiful, in my estimation,—there is no idea in government so ennobling, purifying, and elevating, than that which results from the contemplation of a free people, assembled either by themselves or by their chosen delegates, to deliberate about what restrictions they will impose upon themselves, in order that they may be controlled as they should be in times of heated excitement, when the political cauldron may be boiling, and when it would be as dangerous to fall into it as it would be to fall into a boiling cauldron of oil. Who restricts the people? as it has been already suggested. Are not we ourselves the people? Can we not—(if we were the only, and all the people in the State,)—can we not contemplate the time when excitement may come upon us, and when we ourselves ought to be restrained, as it were, within these walls which now surround us, prohibiting our further advance in this or the other way? And are we proposing now to do more for others than we should do for ourselves in such a case? Is it not for ourselves, as well as posterity, that we propose this restriction? Has not all experience shown us that restriction is necessary, and that we should restrict ourselves? Has not the political cauldron of Indiana boiled until no one was safe upon its heaving bosom? Have we not seen the time when all was confusion aboard the ship of State—when her helm was broken—when her flag at the mast-head was all tattered and torn?—when distracting winds were blowing from every point, carrying the ship hither and yonder without rudder or helm; and have we not seen how much it would have been to our advantage then, if the ship had been balanced well and held with a secure and abiding helm, by which she might have been controlled against those tempestuous winds?

One gentleman talks to me of democracy in strains of ladies' love. I am not in the habit of canting upon words. When I use words, their meaning shall not be taken in any canting or catch-penny sense. I do not mean to deceive the community. But let me say, that my love of democracy rests upon a clear and well-defined consideration of its principles and propositions, and thus I have been led to embrace and fall in with its doctrines. It is a term dear to my bosom, whose form I shall ever cherish. What is it, in all its forms and proportions? It is, in appearance and symmetry, like the Church of Zion, as sung by the great King of Israel: without spot, without blemish, above all things beautiful and lovely. But what does democracy teach? What is democracy, or republicanism? It teaches no more nor no less than precise political equality of every member of any political body or society. That is what it teaches. It teaches, Mr. President, that I shall have no political rights above you; that your sons shall have no political right superior to mine; but that all shall stand upon the same broad political platform; to whom it may be said with truth: You stand even; the race is before you; scramble for the prize.

Sir, political equality is contra-distinguished from social equality. Political equality and social equality have no connection with each other; they are not travelers in the same direction. While we admit that all men are equal—that is, politically—all have the same political rights, whether rich or poor. But this is by no means to declare that all men are placed upon the same social platform. Laws may, and ought, to make men political equals, but laws never place men upon a social equality. Every man must obtain his own social position. It is the sympathies, and tastes, and tendencies of men that bring them together and form the social compact. And the protection and enjoyment of person and property are the foundations of the political compact. Sir, it is idle to talk to men and tell them that they can all be placed upon the same social equality—and no thinking man would make such a declaration. It is utterly impossible. The truth is, government can only secure to all men the same political rights, and that no law shall advance the interests of one citizen above that of another. This is all that law should do for the advancement of the interests of the people.

Now, sir, how is it that this restriction is anti-democratic? I have said that democracy consists in political equality. How, then, does this restriction tend to any other result? This is the test to which I bring every question here.

Whenever I am called upon to vote for the establishment of any principle pertaining to the organic law, show me that its tendency is to produce political inequality amongst our fellow-citizens, and then I will be against it, though every other man were for it; and though I should make myself an Ishmaelite, I would pursue that course. But, if I am called upon to vote upon a proposition, and you show me that its tendency is to secure the same political rights to all—though it be restrictive, and the more because of its restrictive character—I will be for it.

The gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) is mistaken when he says, "If you do not desire to restrict the people, all you would have to do would be to create a Legislature for their government; then there would be no restriction at all." But this is a great mistake. For the Legislature may restrain their own power, or they can create an executive or a judiciary, or they can administer and execute the laws themselves. We have examples of this kind in history, where the same body have enacted, administered, and executed the laws themselves.

But the gentleman says this would be a many-headed monster. Here, however, he is again mistaken. It would be precisely the reverse of a many-headed monster. He asserts again, what is not true in theory or fact, for such a government could have but one head, as it could have but one body. It would have no checks and balances. It is plain to all that it would be wanting in these particulars; however, we do not leave the Legislature to administer and execute these laws, though we might do so with or without restrictions. And still the government would have but one head instead of many. Some gentlemen are desirous of referring important questions, to be decided by the people. I would ask such gentlemen, if a Legislature of an hundred men would be a many-headed monster, how much more so would a million of people be, engaged in the solemn enactment of law?

Now, sir, why is it that this restrictive measure should be called anti-democratic? It has been already demonstrated by the gentleman from Posey, myself, and two or three others, that all our action here is restrictive; and a Constitution is, indeed, all restrictive, from beginning to end. Restriction is the great object of a Constitution. There could be no Constitution without restrictions. And yet, all power is declared to be inherent in the people, by the Constitution: that is, that it would be right for the people themselves to assemble together from the four corners of the State, and prescribe and enforce the law. Such would be a pure democracy; but it would be impracticable. Hence we are obliged to have a representative democracy. It would be inconvenient, impracticable, and impossible, for all the people to convene in General Assembly; hence, they must come by their representatives. In every free government, there is restriction from the beginning to the end. And every Constitution—the Constitution of the United States, and the Constitution of the several States, are all alike restrictive. In the first place, the people of the State restrict themselves as to the exercise of their right of coming together as individuals, to make laws. It is a restriction of their inherent power to send up delegates to frame a Constitution, and they restrict themselves of their natural rights, by creating a Legislature, an Executive, and a Judiciary; and, having done this, they go on and restrain the power of these officers and functionaries. They go on and declare what they shall do, and what they shall not do. Thus it is, that the people restrain themselves in every step they take in the matter of government.

Now one word in reference to the restriction which the gentleman from Shelby (Mr. Hendricks) advocated the other day. What that gentleman affirmed was all true. The point of difficulty consists in the matter of carrying out the law—in determining where and how you will apply the restriction. But, I believe there is no dissimilarity of opinion here about this matter.

But, how does this question of restriction differ from that which has been placed upon the election of officers? The gentleman from Sullivan, (Mr. Wolfe,) over the way, has been very clamorous upon the subject of the right of the people to elect their own officers, but now, in my judgment, the people have a right to restrict themselves directly in this, as in all other cases—that it should be left to the people wholly, to re-elect their faithful officers as often as they pleased.

But the gentleman from Shelby has said, that the people are more liable to go astray in the matter of financiering for the State, than upon any other account: that the glitter of gold has a charm which would be more likely to lead them astray, than all things besides. I believe this to be most strictly true, for it is upon this very rock that these States have nearly foundered. Then why not restrict the people in this matter as well as in others. What is more deceptive, more illusive, and more likely to mislead the judgment of men, than this subject of money? Is there anything more imperiously demanded than this restriction, by our past experience? Shall we throw away all the schooling which we have had upon this subject? Shall we forget the plain, moral, and political lessons of our history in those times, when we so narrowly escaped the gulf of repudiation? Shall we so far forget these lessons of experience as to leave ourselves any longer in a condition where we are liable to be led again upon the confines of that unfathomable abyss? I hope not. I would prevent such a contingency, if all the people demanded it. I would place it forever out of the power of politicians, by their seducing wiles to lull the senses of the people upon this subject, and lead them astray again. And there will be no difficulty about their doing so, unless we shall be able to put into the Constitution some such clause as that which is now before us. How infinitely better would it have been for us—how much prouder could we stand up as Indianians, if we could be rid of the burthen and the disgrace of financial bungling which rests upon us now. And, if we had been protected by such a Constitutional clause, we should never have been sneered at as a repudiating people; but we would have been prosperous and happy—healthy, with reference to all of our finances, and proud of our condition. Why, then, should we not put in this clause?

But it has been decided, as the gentleman from Ripley has said, by a solemn vote of this Convention, that the section, as it now stands, should be incorporated in the organic law of the State.

Why, then, urge the substitute upon the Convention, after the whole argument and reasoning has been gone through with, and the question virtually settled? I hope the proposition of the gentleman will be voted down, and after that, if no gentleman particularly desires further to discuss the question, I hope the previous question will be called upon the engrossment of the section.

Mr. McFARLAND. It is not my intention in rising, to detain the Convention with any extended remarks, but I desire to call the attention of delegates to the real question, which, notwithstanding the attempt which has been made to keep it out of the discussion, and concealed from view, is the one which is having the most influence in shaping the final result.

The simple question is, shall we adopt any provision which will allow a future Legislature to contract a State debt? and, sir, upon this naked proposition, leaving out of view, entirely, the questions of currency and a State Bank, there could have been no dissenting voice from the restrictive policy now embodied in the section. We were all ready to declare, in the most emphatic language, "There shall be no increase of the public debt," until the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) discovered that the question of the State Bank was involved in the adoption of this section. Prior to the announcement that there was a free bank cat in the meal tub, [laughter,] there was not a single voice raised against the proposition to restrict the Legislature, even in conjunction with the people, from increasing the public debt.

It is true that the gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Dunn) remarked that he desired to leave the power with the Legislature to contract a debt for certain purposes. He mentioned that it might yet be to the interest of the State to re-purchase the Madison Railroad, or some other of the public works, built in part by the State, and in part by private enterprise.

But, sir, I presume there are few gentlemen who seriously entertain an idea that the State will consider it good policy to repurchase all or any one of the Public works already constructed.

And, if it should ever be considered to the interest of the State to repurchase any of those public works, it is no argument against the adoption of this restrictive policy, because the people, enlightened and made wiser by the terrible lesson of 1836, will make such investments with their own money, and not again with borrowed capital—they will purchase by levying a direct tax upon themselves and not by contracting another State debt.

Certainly no member can advocate a proposition that will allow a future Legislature to run riot in the contracting of public debts, and sustain himself among his constituents. I know that many gentleman would excuse themselves from carrying out the plainly expressed will of the people, and voting for the restrictive provisions of this article, on the ground of the announcement made by the gentleman from Wayne, that in voting for restriction we are voting against the recharter of the State Bank.

Mr. DOBSON. I would not rob any gentleman of his desert, but I must remind the gentleman from Tippecanoe that it was myself who first sounded the alarm that the bank question was hid under the provisions of this section. If the reports of the debates are correct, it will be seen that I am correct.

Mr. McFARLAND. It may have been mentioned by the gentleman from Owen, but the delegate from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) was the first to speak of the matter upon this floor, in my hearing.

The gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) also sounded the party tocsin, and called upon the friends of the State Bank to rally in opposition to the restrictive policy. He stated on yesterday, that the real question in debate was not merely whether future Legislatures should be allowed to contract a public debt, but whether the people of this State should be allowed to have a State Bank, if they decided in favor of that institution. He (Mr. Walpole) said, "pass this provision and the free bankers have a clincher on the State Bank."

The same gentleman also argued that there could be no State Bank under the provisions of this section, because the Legislature would be restricted from borrowing money to enable the State to take stock in that institution, and "because the people of Indiana were not fools enough to take stock in a State Bank in which the State itself owned not a dollar of stock."

Indeed, sir, so strong is the feeling upon this subject among the friends of the State Bank, that I am credibly informed, that on last evening the same means were resorted to in order to rally the supporters of that institution, as were so graphically described by the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Kilgore) yesterday in his history of the passage of the mammoth internal bill of 1836 [laughter]! Yes, sir, I am told that members were visited at their rooms last evening, in order that they might be prepared to vote "understandingly" this morning. Squint at it as you will, the bank question is now the one influencing the minds of gentlemen who oppose the restrictions embodied in the section now under consideration, and I thank gentlemen for their frankness in announcing the fact.

But, Mr. President, my object in addressing the Convention at this time, is to demonstrate that the State Bank question is not necessarily involved in the adoption of this restrictive provision in a section of the new Constitution.

SEVERAL VOICES. You cannot do it.

Mr. McFARLAND. Let us see. At the expiration of the present charter of the State Bank, supposing this restrictive provision to be incorporated in the new Constitution, the State will come into the possession of one and a half millions of dollars, being the amount of the school fund—unless, indeed, it has been squandered by the Bank. If squandered, correct that fact with your mendicant cry for more, and let it have its proper weight in the consideration of this question. But, if it is not squandered, there is a million and a half of dollars, being the school fund, which the State can use as her portion of the basis of a State Bank capital. Thus it will be seen that the contracting of another State debt, is not necessary to the recharter of a State Bank.

Mr. WALPOLE. The amount of the school fund now remaining, is about eight hundred thousand dollars, the residue having been absorbed by State Scrip;—absorbed—not squandered.

Mr. McFARLAND. Admitting this to be true, the State would still have nearly a million of dollars to invest as the basis of a State Bank capital. But, suppose that the million and a half of the School Fund to be all absorbed, or, suppose that, not being absorbed, but in a condition to be paid into the Treasury, at the expiration of the charter of the State Bank, the State shall decide to invest that fund otherwise than in banking—could not Indiana secure all the advantages resulting from this form of banking, without becoming a partner in another State Bank, which would involve the necessity of creating an additional State debt?

This is the first time, Mr. President, since the lessons taught by the financial disasters of 1836-7, that it has been seriously proposed anywhere in this Union that a State should again borrow money for the purpose of engaging in the business of banking.

True, sir; Ohio has established a State Bank since that period; but how? Not by borrowing money for that purpose, but she assumes the right, as a sovereign, to participate in its management, without owning any portion of its capital. And cannot Indiana do the same?

Must she become a partner to acquire that control over a State Bank, deemed so desirable by gentlemen, which she may, without any violation of correct principles, assume by virtue of her sovereignty?

I believe that I have succeeded in showing that the adoption of this restrictive provision will not, to use the forcible expression of the gentleman from Hancock, (Mr. Walpole,) give the "free bankers a clincher on the State Bank." [Laughter.]

It seems to me, sir, that, while gentlemen have been denouncing all systems of internal improvement, and mourning over the consequences which have resulted from the system in this State, they have forgotten the lessons of the past with regard to banking by States. A careful examination of the subject will, perhaps, show that the embarking of States in banking speculations has been followed by more disastrous consequences than even the justly odious system of internal improvements by the State.

I hold in my hand, Mr. President, the American Almanac for 1840, in which is given "a summary of the amount stock of issued, and authorized to be issued, for banking, canals, railroads, turnpikes, and miscellaneous objects." From this, it appears, in round numbers, that the total amount borrowed is one hundred and seventy millions, and that nearly one-third of that amount—fifty-two millions—were borrowed for banking purposes.

I am aware that the full amount of State indebtedness is not given here; but the amounts set down approximate sufficiently near to the real sum to serve as a basis for the argument.

What is the experience of the State of Indiana in this matter? She has borrowed and invested in banking one million three hundred and ninety thousand dollars. It is claimed by the friends of the bank that that amount has not only yielded, thus far, a handsome profit to the State, but that the capital is entirely safe, and will be ultimately returned. Without stopping to investigate the correctness of this claim, all must admit that the State of Indiana has lost one million of dollars by embarking in the business of banking. It is known to every delegate here, that the sale of an additional million of dollars in the bonds of the State was authorized by the Legislature—that they were placed in the hands of the then President of our State Bank—that they were disposed of upon credit, and no considerable amount was ever realized from the sale. And I wish to be distinctly understood, that, while I do not charge the Bank with having lost the money, through its officers, it must be set down as an absolute loss, resulting from the fact that the State engaged in the business of banking.

Having shown the results of our own experience in banking, let us inquire, in addition, what has been the history of this system in other States!

I find that the State of Kentucky borrowed two millions. With regard to this, her bankers claim that the investment has been profitable, and that the capital will be ultimately repaid to the State. Next upon the list of States, in which it is claimed that the amount borrowed for banking has been profitably used, and the capital safe, stands Missouri. She has borrowed two and a half millions. And, sir, these three States—Indiana, Missouri, and Kentucky—are the only ones in the Union where it is claimed that the amount borrowed for banking purposes is safe; and I have already shown that our own State has lost one million of dollars in consequence of her connection with the business of banking.

Let us now look at those States where it is admitted that the connection of the State with banking has been disastrous; and I will commence with the one which has lost the smallest proportion of the whole amount borrowed. Louisiana borrowed twenty-two millions. Of this enormous sum, over eleven millions of dollars have been invested in banks that have already failed, and it is supposed that their capital stock will be a total loss. And, sir, let me here remark, that the consequences of State banking in Louisiana have led to the adoption of a provision in her amended Constitution prohibiting the chartering of any association for banking purposes.

Next comes Tennessee. She borrowed three millions, and a large proportion of this amount was invested in the stock of the Union Bank of Tennessee. Since 1837, the State has paid the interest upon the money borrowed, the bank having failed; and I learn from the message of the Governor of that State that the capital stock of this bank cannot be sold for enough to pay the first instalment of the debt, amounting to about one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars. Another portion of the three millions was made the basis of the Bank of Tennessee; and in reference to this investment, the Governor tells us, in his message, that the bank cannot pay the interest upon the loan without diminishing its capital, and that the interest and principal of the whole debt must ultimately be paid by levying a direct tax upon the people for the amount.

Alabama borrowed seven millions eight hundred thousand dollars, which she invested in the establishment of a State Bank. Of the fate of this investment, I can learn nothing, except by general report; but the whole amount is supposed to be irretrievably lost.

Arkansas borrowed three millions, with which she engaged in the business of banking. It is supposed that this, also, will be an entire loss.

The State of Illinois borrowed three millions, and invested in a State Bank, which has been out of existence for several years, and the whole amount invested was totally lost.

And last, sir, in this array of States, who, in the pursuance of this banking policy, have trodden to the brink of ruin, stands Mississippi. She borrowed seven millions, which she invested in the various banks of the State, and also one hundred and ten thousand dollars of a Seminary fund, derived from a donation of lands from the General Government. From the messages of Governor Brown of 1844 and 1846, I learn that nothing will be realized to the State from her investment; so that not only the seven millions have been lost, but the character of the bounty given by the General Government was not sufficiently sacred to protect it from a similar fate.

I shall not have time, Mr. President, to enlarge upon this subject, but I will conclude by asking gentlemen if they will still insist that Indiana should follow farther on in a course strewn with the wrecks of States, and where experience has every where inscribed in the plainest characters: "This is the road to financial ruin!" I beg that delegates will ponder upon the instructive lessons of the past, and pause before they decide that Indiana shall engage yet farther in Banking, when the results in other States have proved so disastrous.

With these remarks I will submit the question, trusting that the restrictive policy will be adopted by the Convention.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, it is evident that the vote about to be taken will be a close one. Strong efforts are made to-day to reverse the decision of yesterday; and an effort to prevent such a result, if made at all, must be made now.

Sir, what is the prevailing, I may say the sole idea, repeated in every form and shape by those who oppose the adoption of this section? It is, that, by adopting a Constitutional provision of this character, we evince a mistrust of the capacity of the people for self government. I ask gentlemen who oppose this restriction, and who are in favor of submitting to the people the question of debt or no debt, why not, upon the same principle, submit in like manner every other restrictive provision in the Constitution?

Take one of the first, which declares that "no preference shall ever be given by law to any mode of worship." And let us imagine that some one sect, gradually increasing, should at last obtain an overwhelming majority in the State. Are we to leave this an open clause, so that such a majority, trampling on the rights of conscience of the minority, may create an established church, towards the support of which all shall be forced to contribute, no matter whether they are dissenters from its doctrine or not? No one proposes this. Why? Because we are sure that, even if a majority did it, it would be wrong.

Take another example: "The right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate." Do we desire that this should be left open? Do we evince distrust of the people if we leave it not open? No one argues this. We know it to be an eminently wise and just provision; we are sure it ought not to be rescinded; and we act upon this conviction.

There is another instance: after a long and animated debate, this Convention adopted a section providing that no man's property should be taken for public use without just compensation first assessed and tendered. Why did we not provide, that we might submit to the people a law declaring that private property shall be taken without assessment and tender? Is it because we mistrust their capacity for self government.

And so we might go through almost the whole Constitution, clause by clause. My eye catches the provision that "printing presses shall be free." Are we in doubt about letting that stand as it is? And here again: "that no ex post facto law shall be passed." Shall we submit that also?

If the restrictive feature of the pending section be yielded, let the rule apply to the whole Constitution. If there is to be no mistrust of ourselves as a people, or rather if a refusal to leave such a restriction open to be abolished by a future Legislature, is to be construed into mistrust of the people, then let us carry out the principle consistently at once, and say that laws may be passed abolishing every restrictive principle in the Constitution, provided these laws be submitted to a vote of the people.

The reason, sir, that we do not submit the provisions I have named, the right of conscience—the right of trial by jury, a prohibition of ex post facto laws, a provision that no man's property shall be taken without just compensation—and the rest, is, that we have settled it in our own minds that they are restrictions that should be, and permanently remain, a part of the organic law. We feel that it is a matter not open to doubt. And just so I feel in regard to the restriction now under consideration. I am sure that we are right in declaring it.

We are asked, "shall it be said that the people are to be restrained from doing that which a majority desire?" Yes; when they themselves will the restraint.

If there be a spectacle truly sublime, a spectacle upon which the Great Creator may look down with approval, it is that of a man, strong as Hercules, powerful as Alexander, unrestrained by any external influence, yet restricting himself in the exercise of his strength and his power; saying, "I can do this, but I will not do it;" listening to the still, small voice of reason, acknowledging that voice as more powerful than the sword.

I remember, many years ago, reading some verses from the pen of an Italian poet. They pleased me, and I made of them a translation, still fresh in my memory, and which, as the lines embody, in strong language, the sentiment I am now enforcing, may not be out of place here:

"Crown his brows with laurel wreath,
Who can tread the field of death;
Tread, with armed thousands near,
Yet know not what it is to fear.
But greater far his meed of praise,
Juster his claim to glory's bays,
Who, true to reason's voice, to virtue's call,
Conquers himself—the noblest deed of all."

And that which is noble in an individual, is it not noble also in a republic? yet more especially in our people, all powerful as they are? in a State sovereign as she is, controlled by no power save that which controls the Universe?

Let us rejoice in our strength, in our sovereignty, in our independence. That is well. But let us also remember the words of Nature's own poet:

Oh, it is excellent
To have a giant's strength, but tyrannous
To use it like a giant.

Sir, where we know that our act is right in itself, where we know that the people will defend and approve it, let us do it boldly, decidedly. Let us take the responsibility. We shall be sustained in taking it here. Let there be presented to the voters of Indiana, the naked question: "Shall we forbid, in the Constitution, the contracting of a public debt for any purpose other than to meet a deficit in the revenue, or to pay the interest on the State debt?" the response from nine-tenths of the people will be, yes!

Mr. HADDON. I chanced to be out of my seat when the pending proposition was read, and I would ask the indulgence of the Convention to have it read again.

The proposition was read, and is in substance that the General Assembly should have no power to create a State debt, except when the law for that purpose should first be submitted to the people, and provision made by direct taxation for the payment of the interest, and the canceling of the whole debt in twenty years.

Mr. HADDON resumed. Mr. President, I hope the Convention will adopt no such principle. It is, in effect, the same as the latter part of the section which was stricken out on yesterday, with the exception of a slight alteration, fixing twenty years instead of twenty-five as the period of redemption. Sir, I am not afraid to trust the people; on the contrary, so far as the nature and theory of our government indicates that they should be trusted I am willing to trust them. But I will not give my consent that a majority shall tax and virtually rob a minority, against their own will, and in violation of every principle of equity and fair dealing. Minorities have their rights, and those rights ought to be sacredly regarded; and for one, I desire to see them scrupulously protected by this Constitution. I am here, sir, to represent the interests of the whole, and not a part, of my constituency—to protect the weak against the aggressions of the strong. Under all circumstances, sir, it is wise to guard against public indebtedness. My colleague from Sullivan has said, that in times of excitement, the public mind is susceptible of false impressions, when continually besieged by selfish and designing politicians. It is hasty and unguarded steps on their part, arising from this cause, which I desire to fortify the people against; I would here ask the gentleman from Sullivan, if he would feel satisfied to pass a law allowing his county and constituents, who might neither be interested nor consulted, to be taxed for the construction of a public work, which, by its direction, would afford no commercial facilities to them? And yet, sir, under this section the weak or remote counties, might be taxed, and that heavily too, to construct favorite railroad routes, planned and protected for private aggrandizement, and carried into effect because they passed through populous counties. I have no private ends to subserve, no sectional prejudices, or local partialities to gratify. Sir, I have the honor to represent in part three counties, viz.: Sullivan, Vigo, and Clay; and although I hail from the same county as my colleague, Mr. Wolfe, my duty compels me to dissent directly from his views on this important subject. I therefore trust in all sincerity, that the section as it has been amended by the adoption of the motion of the gentleman from Ripley, (Mr. Smith,) striking out that part of the section which provides that the Legislature might borrow money, by first submitting a law for that purpose to the people, will be adopted.

Mr. ROBINSON. This subject, sir, is one among those in which the people are most interested, for I believe that it is one of the prominent causes which influenced the call of a Convention to amend the Constitution. There is a very general desire in every portion of the State that the Legislature should be restricted from increasing the public debt, even though a law for that purpose should receive the sanction of a majority of the voters of the State. There is a universal opposition to any provision which will allow the State to embark in another system of internal improvements.

We came here to frame a Constitution for the government of ourselves, and of generations that are to come after us; and now for gentlemen to say that we have no right to circumscribe the acts of the Legislature and of the people, for the future, is to say to me that the will of the people in calling this Convention is to be disregarded. A Constitution is not of itself a restriction upon the government and upon the people, and designed to keep each within their proper spheres. The disastrous results of the debt making and internal improvement policy of 1836, has taught the people a severe lesson, and they have proved their disposition to profit by it by requiring us to provide checks and guards upon the debt making power for the future.

They remember how they were led astray in 1836 by politicians who told them that an additional hen would pay all their increased taxes resulting from the internal improvement system. That bubble has burst, and it is now found that instead of the hen it takes the cow and the horse to pay their taxes. I can assure gentlemen that the restrictions of the section as amended is not at all beyond the desires of the whole people. I represent a portion of the State which was never benefited to the amount of a dollar by the internal improvement system, while twelve millions of dollars were expended on public improvements in other parts of the State. But, sir, the people of my district are willing to put their shoulders to the wheel, and make common cause with the rest of the State in paying off our enormous public debt. But what they demand is, that having done this, the Legislature should be restricted, and the people should be restricted from borrowing money for the future.

Let them have at least this privilege, while they are bowed under their present burthens; let them have the satisfaction of knowing that hereafter there is to be no increase of the public debt. I hope, sir, that the section as amended on yesterday will be engrafted as a provision of the new Constitution.

Mr. WOLFE. I am decidedly opposed to granting the Legislature any power to borrow money except for the purpose specified in the section preceding the one in debate.

I voted against the Bank proposition; therefore, the hints thrown out by the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. McFarland) about members visiting and being visited at their rooms last evening, in order that the friends of a State Bank should be prepared to act in concert this morning, do not apply to me.

Mr. ROBINSON. I can endorse the gentleman from Sullivan in that respect. I have known him as a representative of the people for several years, and I can say that I never knew him out of his room after dark. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDRICKS proposed to amend the section so as to read as follows:

"The General Assembly shall never pass any act to create any State debt except as named in section —, unless such debt shall be authorized by a law, for some single object, therein distinctly specified, together with the amount of such debt, and such law shall provide for the collection of a sufficient direct annual tax to pay the interest on such debt as it falls due, and also to discharge the principal within — years from the contracting thereof.

On the final passage of such bill in either House of the Legislature, the question shall be taken by ayes and noes, entered on the journal thereof, and shall be, 'shall this bill pass, and ought the same to receive the sanction of the people?"

No such law shall take effect, until it shall, at a general election, have been submitted to the people, and have received a majority of all the votes cast, for or against it.

No such law shall be submitted to be voted on within three months after its passage, or at any general election, when any other law, or any bill, or any amendment to the Constitution, shall be submitted to be voted for or against.

The money arising from any loan, or stock creating such debt, or liability, shall be applied to the object specified in the act authorizing such debt, or liability, or for the repayment of such debt or liability, and for no other purpose whatever."

Mr. HENDRICKS. In order to secure the support of some gentlemen who almost reverence everything that comes from New York, I will mention that my amendment is similar to the corresponding clause of the New York Constitution.

When the vote was taken on the motion to strike out the latter part of the pending section (relative to the power of the Legislature to contract a State debt with the consent of the people) on yesterday, I could not vote my sentiments. I could not do so, because the remarks of the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) and the speeches of other gentlemen, had had the effect to make the whole question turn upon that of the State borrowing money to bank upon, and becoming a partner in the banking business.

To this we were forced by the gentleman's declaring that the clause prohibiting the Legislature from contracting a public debt, except for the purpose of meeting a deficit in the revenue, and for paying the interest on the public debt, &c., was designed to, restrict the Legislature from ever connecting the State as a partner in any banking institution. Therefore, I voted for the amendment to strike out all that part of the section which proposed that the Legislature might contract a public debt, provided the law for that purpose was first submitted to the people and by them approved.

For, sir, I am opposed to having the State in any way connected with a bank or banks, as a partner. I am opposed to the State having any connexion in interest with banks. Let her have only a controlling power over any banks that may be established. In this I am confident that I carried out the will of the people, and that is what I shall desire to do upon every vote during the session of this Convention.

The gentleman from Marion (Mr. Morrison) undertook to sound the bugle of party here, by saying that opposition to the section as it stands, allowing the Legislature to contract a debt after the people had voted to that effect, was democratic, and the position that every democrat must occupy.

Sir, the position of the democratic party upon this question has been assumed and defined by an authority generally recognized by the party—a democratic State Convention.

Two years since, I was a member of the democratic convention, at which Governor Wright was nominated for the office he now fills. Among the resolutions adopted there, as reported by the gentleman from Floyd, (Mr. Kent,) I find the following:

Resolved, That it is expedient that a Convention should be held for the purpose of amending the Constitution of the State—and that the following, among other provisions, should be incorporated in the amended Constitution:

1st. That no public debt shall be contracted without laying a tax at the same time for paying the interest annually, and for the gradual redemption of the principal, nor until the proposal to contract such debt shall have been submitted for decision to the people at a general election.

That, sir, I am prepared to endorse and support here, as I supported it there. With that, and other principles inscribed upon our banners, we went before the people that year. The result tells us most emphatically what is the will of the people relative to the provisions of the section under consideration.

A few days after the session of the democratic Convention to which I have alluded, the whig State Convention assembled, and took precisely similar ground; with exactly what design I cannot say; but I remember very well, that at the time, we thought they were endeavoring to steal what was legitimately our thunder! [Laughter.]

I do not allude to these facts, sir, because I would regard this as a party question, nor do I read the resolution for any partisan purpose—far from it, but I call them up for the purpose of showing gentlemen who wish to know the real will of the people, that their desire is to have this whole article as it came from the hands of the committee. For it is well known that the same summer that this principle was endorsed by the people, they resolved at the ballot-box to call this Convention. Therefore, I say that the principles of this section were declared to be, not only democratic, but the popular will, before the gentleman from Marion pronounced it to be anti-democratic ground.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. I did not wish to be understood as classing one side of this question as democratic and the other whig. I said that the doctrine that a national debt was a public blessing, was not a democratic position.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I understood the gentleman to say that his position was peculiarly a democratic measure, and I wished to show democratic authority on the other side; but if I misunderstood him I take it back.

In the debate upon this question, gentlemen are constantly reverting to the events of 1836.

Even the gentleman from Posey has carried us back to the disastrous proceedings of that time, and tells us that that was one instance where the people judged wrong. But, sir, I say it was not the people. I contend that it was the politicians of that day who went astray and took the people with them. It was not the people who committed the blunder, but the Legislature; and the Legislature was governed by a system of log-rolling which bore down every opposing interest; and that the people could not have been controlled by such influences as governed the Legislature. What use is there in pertinaciously declaring that the people were inflamed and excited, and that they involved themselves in the colossal debt which is now, and for these years has been, hanging over them? I tell gentlemen that the people never did it, and never will so involve themselves; it was the Legislature, at whose doors this whole scheme must be laid with all its consequences. Then, sir, I say let us restrict the Legislature by a provision that will forever prohibit that body from contracting a public debt, but let us not restrict the people, who are the source of all political power. Between the people and their representatives I draw a broad line of distinction; the one I regard as the proper subjects of jealousy and of restriction, the other as being beyond the need and the proper province of Constitutional restrictions.

In the amendment which I have read it is provided that the object and the amount of a loan which at any time might be made, shall be clearly specified, so that the people shall know to what specific object the money is to be applied, and the amount of debt created.

The next provision of the amendment is that the act shall be submitted to the people and shall not be mixed up with any other question. It cannot become confused with any other law or amendment of a law, but is to be submitted as a simple, naked proposition, to occupy the exclusive attention of the voter. Thus there is no danger of error and mistake on the part of the people in voting upon it.

Another provision is that upon the final passage of a bill for the contracting of a public debt, the question shall be taken by yeas and nays and entered upon the Journal, and shall be, "shall the bill pass, and ought the same to receive the sanction of the people?"

One of the greatest objections made to a submission of a law to the people is, that it takes the responsibility of the act from the Legislature, where it should belong. But by the terms of the amendment every member shall not only vote upon the passage of the bill for submission to the people, but shall endorse it or condemn it, and place his vote of recommendation; or of disapproval, on the records.

And now, Mr. President, I have to say that if, with all these ample, these extraordinary checks and guards, these restrictions and prohibitions, the people are not competent to vote upon the question of borrowing money, I do not know what they are competent to do. Why, sir, there appears to be no distrust of the capacity of the people to decide upon this Constitution; we are engaged in framing a Constitution which is to bind them and their children perhaps for a century, involving their most vital interests; and yet, sir, we are told that they are not to be trusted to vote upon a simple question of temporary expediency—a question of the propriety or impropriety of borrowing money! I have not been profuse of professions in the perfect ability and never erring judgment of the people, but I have too great confidence in them to vote for restricting them from contracting a debt when they shall declare at the polls that it is their will to borrow money for a specific purpose.

Mr. President, I have stated the points to which I rose to call attention. I have stated my position as a democrat upon the question, and will occupy no more time.

Mr. PEPPER. I think that it is evident from the fact that most of the remarks of gentlemen are of a somewhat personal and hasty character, that the debate upon this question has proceeded far enough, and I shall therefore move to lay the motion on the table.

Mr. TAYLOR thought this was an ungenerous course to pursue with those who are supposed to be in the minority.

Mr. BASCOM remarked, that after the "Hunkers" had got through they supposed the Convention ready for the main question.

Mr. BARBOUR of Vigo. If Gentlemen are disposed to continue to discuss, I shall not object. I will withdraw my motion.

Mr. President, the great question now before the House is this: shall we have a free or an arbitrary form of Government. Sir, this question lies at the root of the subject in debate. Now, sir, I have always understood that all power is inherent in the people. If this doctrine be true what right have we to restrict the power of the people? What right have we, through all coming time, to say that a majority of the people of Indiana, may not do as they please in reference to any great question of State policy, in which the citizens might feel a deep interest? None, sir, none. If this provision is adopted as a part of the organic law of the land; if in the Constitution you deny that the majority shall rule; if you say that the Legislature shall have no power, to exercise one of the prerogatives of a sovereign State, when approbated by the votes of the citizens—you place a tyrant over the free will of the people. And yet, Mr. President, the people are the possessors of all power, and what they will to be done—they will do.

Whenever the public mind becomes excited on any great question of State policy—when ever the great body of the people are moving in one direction—whenever the public mind is bent on the accomplishing of some great object of State enterprise—these fetters will be broken—your Constitutional barriers will be swept away, and a new form of government organized, based on that eternal principle, that all power is inherent in the people. Why, then, seek to engraft in the Constitution a principle at war with the genius and spirit of a free people!—a restriction at war with the very principle on which a free representative government is founded. Sir, it is on this ground, and not because I am in favor of a State debt, that I am opposed to this restriction.

When you say that Indiana shall never, under any circumstances, engage in any matter worthy of State enterprise, you strike at the power of the people. Who shall say that the time will never come when Indiana may not accomplish some great work, of which the citizens may feel justly proud.

The gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) and others, have asserted that a Constitution is a restriction on the people. This, Mr. President, I deny. The Constitution of a free representative government should reflect truly the will of the people. The gentleman asks, is not the prohibition against the imprisonment of the debtor, except in cases of fraud, a restriction on the will of the people? I answer, no. The gentleman further asks, if the prohibition, restraining the Legislature from suspending the writ of habeas corpus, except in cases of invasion or rebellion, was not a restriction on their will? I again answer, no. Why do we place a Constitutional barrier between the honest but unfortunate debtor, and the prison house? It is because it is a great moral wrong to incarcerate the honest man in prison because he has not the means to discharge a just debt. Why do we say that the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, except in case of invasion or rebellion? Because the citizen has the right to know that he is not unjustly and illegally restrained of his liberty. We recognize these as great fundamental truths, to guard the individual rights of the citizen against aggression. But, Mr. President, is it a great fundamental truth that there is no great public work, to which the individual enterprise of the citizen may be unequal, in which the State may not engage? I can well imagine the proud satisfaction with which the citizen of New York can point to her great public improvements,—her flourishing city, where the commerce of the world is unladen and then borne along her grand canal, to the great West. I ask, then, is it a great and fundamental truth, that there is no great work in which a State may legitimately engage? Where, then, is the analogy between the two cases? There is none, sir.

Gentlemen have told us that the popular will demands this restriction. Mr. President, I have not so read the people. The citizens of Indiana are proud and jealous of their rights and privileges as freemen. What citizen of Indiana desires to see her acknowledge before the world that she is incapable of self-government. For, turn this question as you will—disguise it as you may—it is nothing more nor less than saying to the people: You are not capable of governing yourselves. Think you not, Mr. President when this question is addressed to the citizen he will feel his State pride touched? My word for it, if this restriction be adopted, they will reject your Constitution. They will never make the humiliating confession. They will vindicate their right that the people are sovereign and capable of self-government; and this act, Mr. President, will adorn the brightest page in Indiana's history. I feel that a great blow is pending over the fair fame of Indiana. I wish to see it averted. I trust and sincerely hope, that, after careful deliberation, the Convention will reject the amendments, and adopt this section as reported by the committee.

Mr. FOSTER. This Convention has now been in session for seven weeks, and with but one exception, I have been constantly at my post. I therefore thought it unkind in the gentlemen on yesterday—

The PRESIDENT. That is not pertinent to the subject in debate.

Mr. FOSTER. I desired to explain a remark which had been made.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair decided that the gentleman should confine himself to the question in debate.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, sir, I appeal from the decision of the Chair. I wish to know if I may not be heard in reply to personal remarks.

The question upon the appeal was put, and the decision of the Chair was affirmed as the judgment of the Convention.

Mr. FOSTER proceeded to make some remarks of personal explanation relative to the action of the Convention in allowing the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles) to record his vote, when that privilege was denied to him (Mr. Foster).

He then said that he had discussed the question in debate, before the people, and had declared himself against allowing the Legislature to borrow money unless the law for that purpose was first submitted to, and sanctioned by, the people; in this I was supported wherever I addressed the people.

The gentlemen who have preceded me, have so effectually stole my thunder, sir, that I have but little to say. However, I am content, inasmuch as the arguments I had intended to use are now before the Convention, and will have their weight.

I was surprised at a remark made by the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) when last up. He was certainly unfortunate in his comparison, or in his figure, when he said there could be no social equality between the laboring man and the man of letters—had he said between the blackguard and the man of letters, I could have assented, but I cannot agree with him that there can be no social equality between the laborer and a man of education:

Sir, there are many hard working men in Indiana, whose natural refinement makes them fit to grace any library or parlor in the State. It is not true that because a man toils with his hands for an honest living, he is therefore coarse in mind, and unfit for the society of the educated and refined.

The gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) also made a remark which I will notice. He rose and said, that it was evident that this would be a close vote, and therefore he must speak. As much as to say, that the crisis was a great one, and that he must interpose his strong arm and prevent the Convention from taking a false step! This was said with an air of triumph, which, with all my respect for the gentleman, I cannot approve.

As to the question immediately in debate, I hope the amendment of the delegate from Shelby may be adopted. The section, as it now stands, is too restrictive.

On motion, the Convention adjourned until two o'clock.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the section prohibiting the Legislature from authorizing any debt to be contracted on behalf of the State, except for certain purposes.

Mr. HELM said—

MR. PRESIDENT: Modesty is said to be a virtue. It is not for me to say whether my silence during the long discussion of this subject, is to be attributed to my peculiar modesty, or to my not being able to catch the eye or the ear of the President, and that, as I am situated upon the out-skirts of this Hall, I have but few opportunities of being heard upon this floor.

The fate of the section and the amendment now under consideration, I conceive to be sealed, by the vote of last evening, and by renewing the contest this morning, we did not expect to change the decree of this Convention.

I ask, sir, what power this section confers upon the Legislature or the people? It reads as follows:

Sec. — No act of the General Assembly shall authorize any debt to be contracted on behalf of this State, except for the purposes mentioned in the — section of this article.

You discover that this section confers the power in a very indirect manner, upon the people. The Legislature has first to consent to the propriety of making a loan, and then the whole matter has to be submitted to a direct vote of the people—the next Legislature may pass an act authorizing said loan. This, sir, is all that is claimed by this section for the sovereigns of this State, and yet we are willing to deprive them of this right.

Does this look like democracy? A government based upon true democratic principles, acknowledges that all power is vested in the people, and when this power is withdrawn, the form of government is changed. Yet, sir, our modern democratic friends are willing to curtail their rights in an organic law.

I hold that it is not only anti-democratic, but that it is anti-republican.

In a republican form of government, the sovereign power is vested in the representatives, elected by the people; and, by striking out this section, you infringe upon the vested rights of the Legislature, for you refuse to trust the people, or the people's representatives. It seems to me that to deny this right, will curtail the powers that naturally belong to a democratic or to a republican form of government.

But the friends for striking out are ready to meet us at every point, with the old internal improvement system. They charge this upon the people, and make it the scape goat to carry all that they say against the rights of the people. The odium of this system belongs, not to the people; it was conceived in this Hall, and brought forth, not far distant from this Capitol. After its conception, they returned home, with gleaming prospects ahead. They told the people that we could borrow ten millions of dollars, and invest it in works of internal improvement, and that the profits from tolls would pay the interest, and ultimately the debt; that an old hen and a brood of chickens would pay all the taxes created by the State Debt, and that a market would be furnished at their doors, for all their surplus products. It was by this course of reasoning that a small portion of the people gave their assent to it. At the next session of the Legislature, the monster was brought forth with all its deformities. If this matter had been left to the people, Indiana would have this day been free from indebtedness.

I have as much confidence in the ability of the people to manage their financial concerns, as I have in this body, or in the Legislature. If we go to the honest yeomanry, who are the bone and sinew of the country, we find around them ample evidence of caution and economy, and will compare with the same number in this Convention, in point of wealth. Then why distrust their abilities to judge in matters of this kind, for themselves?

Let us, for a few moments, review our course whilst canvassing for a seat in this Convention. We appealed to them as the sovereigns of the land. We told them that all power was inherent in them, and that we only wished them to delegate it to us, and that we would reflect their will. Now is it reasonable, or right for us, whilst clothed with this brief authority, to tie up their hands and that of future Legislatures? I say that it is not.

Both political parties, in the last summer's contest, contended for the principle contained in the section about to be stricken out; each claiming the honor of having conceived the sentiments therein contained. But we are now in possession of what we were then in pursuit of, and I fear that many have lost sight of the people and their pledges. The time will come when they will hold us to an account for the manner in which we have discharged our stewardship. If we have been faithful in redeeming our pledges, we may expect them to receive our work. If not, they will reject it. I conceive it to be my duty, as a friend of the original section, to vote for the amendment of Mr. Hendricks, which is an amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Sullivan, (Mr. Wolfe,) neither of which materially alter the original section, as reported by the committee.

Mr. BASCOM. After so many gentlemen have been making speeches and given their views upon this subject, I think now it is time that the voice of my people should be heard. This is an important question, not touching the interest merely of a single county—not confined to those interested in the Madison Railroad, or the White Water Canal, but it is a question affecting the interests of the whole State. The question is, whether you will have any more public debt?

Gentlemen seem to talk here as though we were a legislative body, and they say, What right have we to come up here and pass organic laws which will bind and restrain the power of the people? Sir, our acts here are but as a rope of sand. We cannot bind the people. We are not sent here to propose certain restrictions which the people may adopt for themselves. The restrictions which we propose, if the people consent to be governed by them, are no longer to be regarded as imposed upon the people by this body—it is the people restricting themselves. I am entirely willing that the people should exercise this power. I have as much confidence in the people as any gentleman. In this matter, it is plain that the people will act for themselves. It is not for the hundred and fifty men assembled in this Hall, to say the people shall not contract a State debt, but the people themselves.

Sir, we have come up here, I hope, for the purpose of carrying out the views and wishes of our constituents; and first, for the purpose of ascertaining the views and wishes of the people, by comparison of the instructions which we have severally received. I do not speak here for the whole people of Indiana. I speak for my constituents alone. I represent their wants, and ask of no gentleman to speak for me or for them, who cannot be informed of their wishes as I am.

Mr. President, from all that I know, and from all that I have observed in this Hall, I am prepared to say, that, if there is any one thing with reference to which we are most positively instructed, it is, that we shall have no more public debt. And whatever may be our action in the premises, you will find that the people have determined that there shall be created no more public debt.

Sir, our present taxation laws are very burdensome. They rest heavily upon all. I represent a people residing in a new country—a comparatively poor, laboring people, who have all they can do to make a living. Having but just gone into the woods to acquire a home, this heavy taxation comes with a double force upon us. Therefore it is, that we want this restriction. We want the most rigid restraints placed upon the power of the State, to prevent any more public debt.

Gentlemen talk about the right of the majority to rule. But I concur with my friend from Harrison, (Mr. Zenor,) when he says that the majority have no right to put their hands into the pockets of my people, for the construction of internal improvements, which cannot benefit them, or to make a railroad or a canal to any man's door.

Sir, what is the lesson that we may learn from the debate of the last two days? What schemes of fraud and villainy have been developed in the past operations of majorities with reference to this subject of internal improvements! The gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Kilgore) has admitted the corruption to which I refer. He says that he, himself, stalked the streets of Indianapolis nearly the whole of the night before the passage of the great internal improvement bill, and literally bought up the votes of members of the Legislature. It was thus that those old and visionary schemes of the Madison Railroad, the White Water Valley Canal, the Wabash and Erie Canal, and other ruinous projects of improvement, were brought to bear upon us. In view of these facts, do you really suppose, sir, that the people will not close the door against the adoption of another system of fraud? Think you that they are not now satisfied—that they have not had enough of this system of political cheater? Do you think to beguile them again by sending out your surveyors and engineers? Will they not rather remember the lesson they have learned—that, in former times, when you got the power into your hands, instead of benefiting the State, you proceeded to carry out the most nefarious schemes of speculation, and withhold that power from you?

The gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Rariden,) who is always so anxious for the dear people, whenever you speak now of the White Water Valley Canal, he rouses himself like a turtle with fire upon his back. He calls that a miserable concern, which has cost the State so dearly, and for which we are still paying taxes while he would not be averse to throwing it still upon the State, and increasing the public burthen for that which never was nor never can be worth a dime to me or my constituents. I say, sir, that we have had enough of this. We have learned by experience that it is now time to stop. We want, for the future, most effectually, to deprive those whom we send here in a representative capacity from acting as they have heretofore with reference to this subject.

The gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) calls his Canal Company a miserable and down-trodden association, as though the people were disposed to take away and deprive them of something which belonged to that Company, by depriving themselves and their representatives of the power to create any more public debt.

The gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Dunn) gets up and tells you that it might be for the interests of the State, after a while, to buy out the Madison Railroad. But the gentleman from Ripley (Mr. Smith) supposes, as I think, more correctly, that it might be still more to the advantage of the Railroad Company to sell out to the State. But I say, if the State should ever desire to purchase any of these improvements, let them first get the money in the treasury and pay for it at once.

There has been a great deal said here about democracy, and certain resolutions passed by a convention of the people which assembled in this building two years ago. I am not disposed to find fault with the democratic party, sir, when I say that these resolutions have had nothing to do with me, nor with sending me to this Convention. They have nothing to do with my people, neither do they feel themselves disposed to be governed by them, concocted and adopted, as they were, by a convention of old hunkers.

But it has been well said by many gentlemen that this is not a question of democracy or whiggery; but it is a question involving the rights of the people—whether the people have a right to restrain themselves, or whether it is proper that the people should restrict their right of sovereignty, and submit themselves to be governed by a certain rule. This is the only question involved in this proposition; and this question is to be decided, ultimately, by the people themselves; for when you submit your Constitution to the people, unless they choose to breathe into it the breath of life, it will remain a lifeless thing—an abortion. Then the question here is this: Have the people the right to make this decision? Gentlemen who pretend to have so much confidence in the people, and make such flowery speeches to them upon the stump, will now have an opportunity to show, by their votes, whether they are willing to trust the people—whether they are willing to let the people act for themselves, and say whether or not they will ever incur any more public debt. If the people say that the Legislature shall never contract a public debt, the matter is forever sealed.

It is, then, a plain proposition in few words: Whether the people shall restrict themselves, or whether the old system shall be continued.

Mr. MAGUIRE said:—

Mr. PRESIDENT: I rise for the purpose of making an explanation. In the course of this debate a good deal has been said about the history of the past, and I desire to turn over and review another leaf in that history.

I wish to make a few remarks by way of correction, in reply to a statement made by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) when he addressed the Convention on this subject a few days since. That gentleman said, in substance, that the late Governor Noble, in his last message to the General Assembly, declared that the people never would be taxed one cent for the payment of either interest or principal of the public debt created by the act of 1836.

Now, sir, I do not wish to be understood as charging the gentleman from Tippecanoe, either in this instance or at any other time, with intentional wrong-doing. I suppose him to be incapable of doing intentional wrong to any man, but especially to one over whom the grave has long since closed. But, sir, he is mistaken in an important fact affecting the character of that lamented man, and it is just as important to correct the mistake as it would be if it were an intentional calumny. The statement has gone on the record, and I deem it due to the memory of a departed and much esteemed friend, to make the correction, and let it go along with the statement. Governor Noble was a man of excellent common sense, of more than ordinary sagacity, and a good practical financier. He could never have been such an enthusiast as to say or suppose that the mammoth system of internal improvements, adopted by the Legislature in January 1836, could be carried on and completed without taxation for the interest of the money borrowed. He never did say so, either after the system was adopted or before. I have carefully examined the last message of Governor Noble, delivered in December, 1837, and the preceding one, delivered in December, 1836—these being the only messages delivered by him after the adoption of the system—and there is not, in either of them, a declaration upon which such a statement could by any possible construction be based. I will frankly admit, for I have no wish to conceal anything, that Governor Noble did, in his message of 1835, before the system was put in operation, state, in substance, that in his opinion a system of internal improvements, costing ten millions, might be completed without taxing the present or succeeding generations anything for the principal, but never, then or at any other time, did he say that it would not be necessary to resort to taxation to pay the interest. I repeat, that I acquit the gentleman from Tippecanoe of any intentional misrepresentation, and only insist upon a correction of the mistake, which I feel assured the gentleman himself will be prompt to make upon information of the fact.

In the last message of Governor Noble, to which the gentleman in his remarks referred, there is not a word about the debt, either principal or interest. In the preceding message—that of December, 1836—the first message delivered after the commencement of the internal improvement system, I find the following remarks:

“With wise and prudent councils, some years of persevering exertion will be required to bring our works to a favorable termination, and insure speedy success. There must be foresight and stability in our legislation, so as to continue and increase the confidence of the people at home, and maintain the just credit of the State abroad. Until our success is complete, our duties will not terminate, and whilst indulging our fancies with the prospect of a bright future, it should not be forgotten, that during the progress of every public work like ours, there has been a financial pressure from which we can claim no exemption. An overflowing prosperity will follow profuse disbursements of the public funds. With its current we will be swept along and seduced by the times; we will live high, purchase freely, contract debts, and run into other extravagances, at which our present notions of economy would revolt. And when these disbursements are reduced, when the heaviest demands are made upon us for the support of the Treasury, we shall have parted with the means placed in our hands. Such a state of things will hardly fail to bring upon us a pressure.”

“To palliate, and if practicable, to obviate the approach of the evils of such a period, it will be the part of wisdom to take a prospective view, and while all is prosperous, and our citizens are able, ready, and willing to contribute, to commence the burthen with the beginning of our works; and the levies to be made should be distributed in advance, through the whole period of our operations, leaving no one year to meet the entire demands upon it. The sum to be derived from an established policy of this kind, the annual interest that may be expected from a proper disposition of our dividend of the surplus revenue, and that portion of the three per cent. fund that you will be able to set apart, will throw into the Treasury a sufficient supply for the demands upon it, leaving a handsome balance at the close of each year to be applied to the increased demands of the next.

“With these resources, and with the exacting of a just accountability and an enlightened but rigid economy on the part of all entrusted with the construction of the works, you will be prepared in a great measure for any crisis.”

This, sir, is all that I can find in the message of 1836, relative to taxation. In this connection I may without impropriety add that I was well acquainted with Governor Noble's private opinions on this subject, and that I know it was his opinion that taxes should be levied adequate to meet promptly the interest on the public debt. He never believed in the policy of borrowing money to pay the interest.

In the message of 1838, to which the gentleman referred, I can find nothing on the subject of taxation. There are, however, some very important suggestions in regard to conducting the system, a portion only of which I ask permission to read for the information of the Convention. After speaking of the progress of the several works, he adds:

“At the date of the commencement of the enterprise our State and its citizens were in the enjoyment of unprecedented prosperity. The then existing condition of things was made the basis of our future calculations. Since then, external causes have cast a shade over the auspicious prospect, and taught us with an impressive force, the duty of so shaping our policy as to be prepared for every vicissitude that may befall us. Looking, then, with a calm foresight to the future in reference to our policy and the financial condition of the State, we cannot but observe that a period will arrive when the means of paying the interest on our expenditures, will, unless derived in some degree from the incomes of the public works, multiply the public burthens. A foreign war, or any disturbing cause, affecting the prosperity of nations and communities, may, at such a crisis, by preventing the acquisition of additional loans, arrest the progress of our internal improvements. We should then be burthened with the interest on the invested capital, whilst the stationary and unproductive situation of the works would preclude our realizing any return from them. Sound policy would therefore dictate the expediency of so directing their prosecution as will have a tendency to render some of them soon available in the production of revenue. The great disparity in the length of the lines, in their relative cost, and the time requisite to finish them, indicate the evident impolicy of their simultaneous completion. The comparative shortness of some of them, and their forwardness, would justify us in making increased appropriations with a view of finishing them as soon as practicable.”

I shall not read any more. My object has been merely to show the gentleman from Tippecanoe that he was mistaken in attributing to Governor Noble the sentiment to which I have referred. I should have made the correction yesterday afternoon, but the gentleman was not in his seat. I think it appropriate to do so now before this subject shall be finally disposed of.

I wish now to make a single remark—

Mr. PETTIT. Will the gentleman allow me—

Mr. MAGUIRE (yielding the floor). Certainly.

MR. PETTIT. The gentleman from Marion does me, certainly, justice,—and, I trust, no more than justice—when he says he believes that I would not, here or elsewhere, knowingly state a fact erroneously. To prevent mistake, therefore, I will repeat here what I have before stated. In one of Governor Noble's messages—I do not know that it was the last, or which it was, for I was not here—the language which he used was to assure the Legislature that the whole system of internal improvements could be prosecuted and completed without taxing the people to the value of one dime. If that be not true, then I have done Governor Noble's memory injustice. And I say now to the gentleman from Marion, if he will furnish me with a copy of Governor Noble's messages, I will examine with reference to this matter; and if I do not find the sentiment which I have attributed to him, I will here make a public avowal of the fact, and correct the remark at the earliest opportunity.

MR. MAGUIRE (resuming). I have already said that I did not believe the gentleman intended any injustice to the memory of Governor Noble. I have the messages, and will with pleasure furnish them to the gentleman from Tippecanoe. They will fully sustain me in the declaration that Governor Noble never said to the General Assembly that the system of internal improvements could be maintained without taxation.

MR. PRESIDENT, I wish now to make a few remarks, not upon the merits of the question—for I think it has been already amply discussed—but by way of explanation. I was a member of the committee of which the gentleman from Gibson (Mr. Hall) is chairman, by whom the section under consideration was reported. In justice to that committee, I desire to say that this section was, I believe; reported in the exact words of the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Pepper); which resolution was adopted by this Convention, and came to the committee in the shape of an imperative resolution. The committee agreed unanimously to report the section. I was, therefore, no little surprised to find in the gentleman from Ohio a strenuous opposer of that very section which, on his motion, the Convention instructed the committee to report. I was also somewhat surprised to see some members of the committee rise here and denounce the section. So much for the original section, which is an almost exact copy of a section in the new Constitution of Kentucky. Now, sir, let us look for a moment at the amendment now pending, offered by the gentleman from Shelby, (Mr. Hendricks,) which is in exact accordance with a provision on the same subject in the Constitution of New York. A resolution was also adopted by this Convention, on the motion of my friend from Sullivan, (Mr. Haddon,) directing the committee to inquire into the expediency of reporting a section to that effect. That gentleman, however, is now opposed to this amendment which was originally his own proposition.

MR. HADDON. My resolution was not imperative. It only required an inquiry into the expediency of the measure. I am willing to go further, and I cheerfully embrace the opportunity.

MR. MAGUIRE. I said the resolution of the gentleman was only one of inquiry, but it is generally fair to presume that a gentleman who introduces such a resolution is himself satisfied that it is right.

Now, sir, I desire to notice an observation made by the gentleman from Monroe and Brown (Mr. Read). He remarked with an air of triumph, and as if he meant to fasten the charge upon some one, that he did not believe in the doctrine that a public debt is a public blessing. Why did he make the remark unless he meant to convey the idea that such a doctrine was advocated by the committee, or by some one who supports the section as reported by the committee? Unquestionably that was the impression intended to be made by the remark. Now, sir, I have shown that the section was reported in conformity to the direction of the Convention, and I have heard no one advocate the doctrine that a public debt is a public blessing. The charge of the gentleman was not indeed made in a direct form, but was on that account the more objectionable, because no one might feel called upon to meet and refute it. I affirm, sir, that no member of the committee is any more in favor of a public debt than is the gentleman himself. I am as much opposed to a public debt as any man in this Convention, or in this country. I am utterly opposed to the creation of a debt of any sort, or for any purposes, other than those mentioned in the preceding section, unless the people of the State, by a direct vote, shall authorize it, and unless a tax be levied to pay the interest annually, and the principal in a reasonable time. I advocated this doctrine before the people during the canvass, and if there was a single dissenting voice among them as to its correctness, I never heard of it. This has been the doctrine of both of the political parties for several years past; it was, if I mistake not, endorsed by both the State Conventions held a year or two ago, and advocated by both the candidates for the Gubernatorial chair; and being both democratic and whig doctrine, it is fair to presume that it is the doctrine of the people.

Sir, I have no fault to find with those who propose to take this discretionary power from the people, nor do I design to impute to them any improper motives. My object has been simply to defend myself and the committee by which the section was reported from the imputations indirectly cast upon us. I repeat, that I am as much opposed as any member can be to the creation of a public debt by the Legislature without the direct sanction of the people; but I do not think we are called upon, in the organic law, which will be irrevocable, to tie up the hands of the people so that they cannot, under any circumstances, or in any emergency, direct, by a vote of their own, the creation of a debt for purposes that in their judgment may be eminently useful and proper. I am not willing to say that the people cannot be trusted. I believe they would not abuse a power thus left with them, and if they should the blame would rest upon their own shoulders. The people had no opportunity to pass upon the internal improvement system of 1836; and since their experience of the events which followed the adoption of that system, I think it is not at all likely that during the present or succeeding generation they would be at all likely to embark again in any such enterprise. Emergencies, however, might arise, which, in the unanimous judgment of the people, might authorize and demand the creation of a temporary debt of a small amount, and I submit whether it be proper for this Convention to say that in such an event the people shall not carry out their own will. But, sir, I arose merely for explanation, and not to make an argument, and I will abstain from further remarks.

Mr. DUNN of Perry. Mr. PRESIDENT, I move to lay the pending amendment on the table.

The yeas and nays were demanded and ordered upon this question.

The Convention refused to second a call for a division of the question.

The PRESIDENT now directed the Secretary to proceed with the call of the yeas and nays, and the vote stood—yeas 74, nays 55—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Borden, Bracken, Bryant, Chapman, Coats, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Fisher, Foley, Gibson, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hardin, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kinley, Mather, Mathis, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Nave, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Robinson, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Tague, Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—74.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Balingall, Barbour, Beard, Blythe, Bowers, Brookbank, Carr, Chenoweth, Clark of Hamilton, Cole, Conduit, Crawford, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hawkins, Helm, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Kendall of Wabash, Kilgore, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Murray, Nave, Newman, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Schoonover, Steele, Stevenson, Taylor, Todd, Wallace, Walpole, and Wolfe—55.

So the pending amendments were laid upon the table.

Mr. PETTIT now demanded the previous question, which was seconded by the Convention, and under its operation the engrossed section was passed the third reading by yeas 89, nays 38, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Balingall, Bascom, Beach, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Borden, Bracken, Bryant, Carr, Chapman, Coats, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, &c., Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Gibson, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Hendricks, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, March, Mather, Mathis, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Nave, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Robinson, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—89.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Barbour, Beard, Blythe, Bowers, Brookbank, Chenoweth, Clark of Hamilton, Cole, Conduit, Crawford, Dunn of Jefferson, Frisbie, Garvin, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Helm, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Kilgore, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, Murray, Newman, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Schoonover, Steele, Taylor, Todd, Wallace, and Walpole—38.

So the section was passed the third reading and referred to the committee on revision, arrangement, and phraseology.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. WATTS. In conformity with notice given on yesterday, I will now move to amend the rules so as to authorize any member of the Convention to record his vote if he shall be with in the Hall when the vote is taken.

The PRESIDENT. Will the gentleman withhold his motion until we can get through with this report?

Mr. WATTS. Oh, yes. I will withhold a few days, for that.

THE SINKING FUND.

The PRESIDENT. The next thing in order is the last section of the bill; which the Secretary will read.

The section was then read by the Secretary, and is as follows:

SEC. —. The General Assembly shall have no power to pass laws to diminish the resources of the Sinking Fund, as now established by law. but may pass laws to increase it.

Mr. TAGUE. I move to amend by striking out all after the word "section."

Mr. PETTIT. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Tague), by inserting the following words in lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out, to-wit:

"The debts and liabilities of the State shall be held sacred and obligatory."

Mr. HOWE. I propose to amend the original section, which motion, I believe, has precedence.

The PRESIDENT. It has.

Mr. HOWE. I propose to add to the original section the following words:

"And a tax of fifty thousand dollars with an annual increase of five per centum, shall be annually levied, and applied toward the purchase of State Bonds, or funded, and remain a permanent sinking fund for the payment of the State Debt."

Mr. HOWE (in continuation). By a large vote, sir, it was provided that the State should not get into debt and that the Legislature should endeavor to get it out of debt as quickly as possible. I look upon this provision sir, as one of the most important that has been gotten up, or can come up for the consideration of this Convention. We are now largely involved in debt, I suppose to the amount of about six millions, and if there is any question important to the people and the State, it is the one of determining how we shall get out of debt. Undoubtedly, it is the duty of the Legislature, as a general proposition, to devise and carry out means for paying this debt; but this matter is of vast importance, and of too great importance to be left entirely to the action of the Legislature. Experience has shown us all, that not only individual, but political bodies can repudiate. The immense debts which so many of the States have incurred shows the necessity of a provision being made in the fundamental law, to avoid the necessity of getting into debt as much as possible, and when incurred, to endeavor to get rid of it as speedily as practicable. One great object of Conventions is to devise remedies for evils of great magnitude. They are, also, to make provision for the protection of rights that are liable to be infringed upon, and to carry out judicious and salutary reforms in the different departments of government. And what measure of greater importance, than this I have referred to in my amendment, can be presented? The only proposition that has been introduced with reference to this subject is of a very uncertain character, namely: that that portion of the revenue which may be left after paying the ordinary expenses of government, shall be devoted to this object, together with the mere nominal proceeds arising from the sale of the public works. We had a specimen of the avail that will arise from the sale of the public works the other day, when the canal lying north of this city, which cost the State half a million of dollars, was sold for about twenty-five hundred. This mode of paying the State debt is a very uncertain one, and we should at once fix upon some more safe and satisfactory plan. Undoubtedly it will, even if my plan is adopted, take many years to get out of debt. It may take thirty, perhaps fifty, years, to accomplish the object. If my proposition is adopted, in the course of twenty-five years there will have been paid off by this progressive ratio of five per cent. per annum, the sum of one million and a half dollars of the State debt. What amount would be paid in any number of years beyond that time I have not calculated. This provision for liquidating our debt is not an original one with me. It struck my mind, favorably on looking into the Constitution of Michigan, where the State has made provision for raising the sum of twenty thousand dollars with an increase of five per cent. annually by taxation, though that State is not badly involved in debt. Twenty thousand dollars is as large an amount for that State to raise, as fifty thousand dollars is for us. Now fifty thousand dollars is a small sum to be raised, compared with the means of the State, and will be readily paid.

And, sir, do not our means increase five per cent annually? If the addition to our capital from abroad, and the extension of our resources are taken into consideration, if it is not so we cannot be in a flourishing condition. This increase may be expected, and in addition it is quite possible that the proceeds of the sales of the public property, together with the balances of the revenue which may remain, will amount to a million and a half of dollars, thus making—including the tax I have proposed—a sum of three millions at the end of twenty-five years. This will pay off nearly one half of our debt if the interest is paid regularly in the mean time. I think, sir, to the small sum of fifty thousand dollars which the State is perfectly able to bear, there can be no objection, and I am sure that to endeavor to pay the State debt is one of the patriotic steps the Convention can take; and they have ample power to frame such a provision. If any fact can be demonstrated, it is that the interest on our debt of five per cent is a larger increase upon the capital represented by the debt than the nett profits of agriculture, upon the value of all the landed and other capital invested therein. Hence, not only duty, but policy invites us to get out of debt as quickly as possible. Bear it in mind that if the interest of the State debt be put against the nett gains of capital, the difference will be greatly in favor of the State debt. It is to the interest of the State, and all the people of the State, that we should act immediately upon this matter, and if any gentleman can present a better proposition than 'the one I have introduced, I trust he will do so. We must either get out of debt or repudiate. The dilemma is before us, and stares us in the face at every turn. I think that now is the time to act upon this matter. It will probably be twenty-five years before a Convention again assembles in this State, unless some unforeseen calamity demands it, and unless this Convention discharges this important duty, it will be left to the lingering action and delays of the Legislature, whose action upon it will be certainly dilatory—perhaps prolonged from session to session, and finally abandoned; and I think a permanent evil should be met by a permanent remedy.

The amount required to be raised the twenty-fifth year, under my proposition, is approximately one hundred and seventy thousand dollars.

But it must be borne in mind that the amount of interest is annually decreasing with the decrease of the debt. Calling the interest five per cent the decrease will be twenty-five hundred dollars the second year, and twenty-six hundred and twenty-five the third, and so on. When the subject comes up again I will exhibit a calculation.

One thing may be set down as certain: if the State debt is to be paid, it must be by the gradual and easy process of a sinking fund. All the State funds—leaving out those which have been sacredly pledged to the interests of education—with the proceeds of the public works, will never suffice, and it is much to be feared that they will be dissipated, or applied to other objects. I shall have more to urge upon this subject at another time, and in the mean time, at the suggestion of the Chairman of the committee on State debt and public works, I will now withdraw the amendment, intending to offer it again when the proper article shall be under discussion. In the mean time I trust that gentlemen will give the proposition that examination and reflection which its importance demands.

Mr. CHAPMAN. If I should be called upon to vote on striking out the section as reported, I should vote in the affirmative. I shall vote against the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Lagrange (Mr. Howe) also. But while I am opposed both to the adoption of the proposed section, and the amendment, I have no objection to sanction the general principle embodied in the proposition offered by the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) as an independent one.

The financial calculation submitted by the gentleman from Lagrange, (Mr. Howe,) may possibly be true, though I have some doubts on the subject; for I have seen many ineffectual calculations of the same sort. But whether it be, in the abstract, true, or not, I cannot see the necessity to legislate for a period of twenty-five years in advance. It seems to me, that the plea which we have so frequently heard urged in regard to other matters, applies most forcibly here. It is impossible that we can prescribe rules in such an important matter as this, without regard to the thousand contingent circumstances which may be likely to occur during so long a period of time as that contemplated.

Mr. President, this is a subject of the greatest practical consequence, and we should not act upon it hastily, but with due deliberation. I do not believe that the State debt can be paid off in the manner contemplated by the gentleman from Lagrange, but I do believe that we have the opportunity of providing for its ultimate liquidation, without imposing an unwieldy burden upon the people—a burden greater than they can bear.

The first step necessary to be taken in the settlement of the debt, is to transform its character. It is now a foreign debt, and the interest, which we have hardly yet begun to pay, will, in a few years, amount annually to something like three hundred thousand dollars, to be paid in cash, not only out of the State, but out of the country. I need not tell gentlemen how much harder it is for a country to pay interest on a foreign than upon a domestic debt. England furnishes us a sufficient example.

If we can contrive any way to make our foreign debt, a domestic one, we shall have taken a long first step towards its liquidation, and a step which is absolutely necessary, before we can possibly take a second one safely.

In my opinion, it will be as much as we can reasonably exact of the people, at present, if we require them to raise as much money as will be necessary to pay the full amount of interest on the State debt, together with the amount necessary for ordinary current expenses of the government. But we have another means within our reach, which, if we are wise, we shall bring to our aid in the accomplishment of this great object. I allude to the banking system, which will soon come under review. I well appreciate the prejudices of many gentlemen, in favor of the present State banking system. I am opposed to that system for many satisfactory reasons, and one of the chief of them is, that I desire to make any banking system which we may adopt, subservient to the adjustment of the State debt, as well as the accommodation of the commercial classes.

This can be easily done, by adopting some such system as that of New York, requiring the stocks of the State and of the United States as collateral security, (not as capital), and thus create a business demand to bring home our stocks. This is a practical and feasible measure. It is certainly worthy, at least, of consideration, and I am confident that the friends of this policy, will be able to demonstrate the propriety of it, if opportunity be allowed by the Convention.

At this late hour of the session, I have not time to discuss the policy which I suggest in detail, and I only make these rapid remarks in the hope of securing the careful attention of the Convention to this subject, as well as to justify myself in voting against the adoption of the proposition of the gentleman from Lagrange, at least, for the present, and until the subject can be fully investigated.

Mr. HALL considered that action upon this subject, at the present time, would be improper. A report from the committee on the State debt had been sent in a few days ago, and when that report came up for consideration, the subject matter now before them would appropriately come up for examination. When the report came up for consideration, he had a statement to submit, based upon a certain set of facts, which had been laid before the committee, which would enable the Convention to act more definitely upon it, than if they proceeded to consider it incidentally in this manner.

The section then under consideration, had been reported by the committee in accordance with an imperative resolution presented to the committee, and he hoped would be left out. He would not say that it would do much harm, nor would it do much good. Anything in relation to the State debt would be in order when the report of the committee on that subject came up for consideration.

Mr. HOWE said, that as it appeared from the statement of the gentleman from Gibson that there was another section coming up for consideration, to which his amendment would probably be more germane than to the present one, he would withdraw his amendment.

The amendment was accordingly withdrawn.

Mr. BERRY said, that inasmuch as the subject has to come up again upon the consideration of another section, he would move to lay the section and pending amendment on the table.

A division being called for, the question was taken and decided in the affirmative—yeas 62, nays not counted.

So the section and pending amendments were laid upon the table.

Mr. BORDEN said, that there was a section connected with this subject, in the same article, the fourth section of which they had just had under consideration; he referred to the first section, and he would move that that section, with the pending amendment, be now taken up for consideration.

The section was not taken up.

HOMESTEAD EXEMPTION.

The first section of article four was then taken up and read a second time, as follows:

"SECTION —. The privileges of the debtor to enjoy the necessary comforts of life, shall be recognized by wholesome laws, exempting a reasonable amount of property from seizure or sale, for the payment of any debt or liability hereafter contracted."

The question being upon the engrossment of the section for a third reading—

Mr. NEWMAN said, that for the present the consideration of this section should not be proceeded with; he would move to lay the section on the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BORDEN moved to amend the section by inserting after the word "property" in the third line, the words "real and personal."

Mr. FARROW moved to amend the amendment by striking out the word "or" and inserting the word "and," so that the amendment of the gentleman from Allen should read, "real or personal," instead of "real and personal."

Mr. BORDEN accepted the amendment.

Mr. MURRAY moved to amend the amendment as follows:

"And that a homestead owned by any person, the head of a family, in this State, to consist of land or town property, not less than five hundred dollars, shall be exempted from seizure and sale, by any legal process whatever, for any debt contracted after the adoption of this Constitution: Provided, That such exemption shall not affect in any manner any mechanic's lien, or any mortgage thereon, lawfully obtained; but such mortgage, or other alienation of land by the owner thereof, if a married man, shall not be valid without the signature of his wife.

"SEC. —. The Legislature shall, in addition to the present exemption of personal property, add to it, in the case of those persons who are not landholders, such additional amount in value of mechanics' tools, farming utensils, and other personal property necessary to the business or support of such persons, as the Legislature may deem expedient and equitable.

"SEC. —. The Legislature shall pass such laws as are necessary to carry into effect all the provisions of this article."

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I move to lay the amendment upon the table.

Mr. WALPOLE. I demand the yeas and nays upon that motion.

Mr. SMITH. Then I withdraw it.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. PRESIDENT: I have offered this amendment because I think it is in agreement with the original section just read, and will render the exemption more definite, and much more substantial in its benefits. I think, also it will comport with our duty, in "providing for the welfare" and happiness of the people, and is in accordance with the genius and spirit of our institutions.

At every step in the progress of our government, the condition of the poor has been ameliorated.

Benevolent and charitable institutions have been greatly multiplied; the public domain has been made more and more accessible; the amount of property exempted from execution has been gradually increased; and imprisonment for debt has been abolished.

In all this, our political institutions have displayed not less wisdom, than humanity; for it is the poor, principally, who labor, and labor only produces wealth. The rich harvest which fills the granaries of the farmer, and the gold that glitters in the coffers of the banker, have been abstracted from the earth by tolling millions.

The pearls of the seas have yielded up their treasures to labor only. But for labor, there would be no foundation for trade—no sustenance for man.

It is a perennial spring, that must be kept flowing, or we perish of thirst and hunger. How wise, therefore, as well as humane, is it to strengthen the hands and cheer the hearts of those who labor, by providing them a home where they can rest in safety, and be refreshed for the morrow's toil. Indiana is now marking a new era, in her proud march to political eminence. And I confess the desire nearest my heart, is, that this era, should be stamped with a liberal provision securing to the laborer a home, which shall be inviolable. And as in the mutations of human affairs, every person in every pursuit of life, is liable, by the sudden reverse of fortune, to become poor, I would extend this privilege to every one who is the head of a family. I desire to have it a Constitutional provision, that the door to this sanctuary may be always kept open.

I would not have it subject to the ever changing features of legislative enactments. I would have all, not a favored few, share its benefits.

I would have no man a wanderer and a vagrant, in our land.

I would elevate the laborer above the beggarly necessity of being turned out of doors, and being driven into the street for a quarter's rent. I would not see the storms of heaven pouring down upon a shivering family group, who had not where to lay their heads.

I would rob the highways, and the alms houses of this unfortunate class of its tenants, by providing a home for the homeless.

Sir, give to a man a home and he will struggle nobly with adversity. There is an irresistible charm in the word. It is a castle, against which most of the arrows of misfortune fall harmlessly. Thirst, hunger, and the essential wants of life, assail the man in vain, who has a home to refresh himself in. He has a sovereign remedy against these evils. Diligent and healthful industry will banish them from his door. A home, sir, is an essential element of prosperity and independence.

It is like a sublime alchemy in the hands of the chemist, turning the very trees to bread. It is to man what the earth is to the vegetable kingdom. Plants may vegetate upon a barren rock, but they must have root in the soil or they perish. I have heard it objected, that this measure would impair individual credit, and lead to the practice of fraud in procuring a home-stead. I admit, sir, that there might be instances of fraud, practiced under this measure, for no law is secure against abuse. It is too common to see property unlawfully sequestered under our present laws, and under the laws of every State in the Union. But I deny, that this would be the general tendency of this provision. On the contrary, it would give greater security to the creditor, and greater ability in the debtor to pay his debts; but far more than this, it would place the debtor above the dire necessity, which tempts man to misdemeanors.
